BLACKLEY UNITARIAN CHAPEL.

A BAZAAR in connection with the above place of worship will be held in the Memorial Hall, Albert Square, on Tuesday and Wednesday, the 24th and 25th inst. The Congregation, anxious to secure the services of a settled minister, hope by the help of the kind contributions of friends and of the proceeds of the Bazaar, to raise a sufficient sum to enable them to provide a small House for the Minister, near the Chapel.

The Bazaar will be furnished chiefly with articles of plain clothing, suitable for ladies and children, in the making of which the young women attending the Chapel and School have been busily engaged for some time past. Articles of clothing suitable for charitable purposes will be provided, as also some of a fancy and ornamental description.

Contributions either in money or work will be thankfully received by the minister's wife, Mrs. RUSHTON, No. 1, Alfred-street, Harpurhey; Mrs. BOURNE, Park Hill, Prestwich; or Messrs. JOHNSON & RAWSON, Market-street, Manchester.

MANCHESTER DOMESTIC MISSIONS

—ROCHDALE ROAD CHAPEL.

In the late severe storms the wall of an adjoining manufactory, which had been left standing after a fire, was blown down, and in its fall destroyed the outbuilding, heating apparatus, &c., of the Rochdale Road Chapel.

The Committee are obliged to ask for help towards Rebuilding the premises destroyed; and as the Schools have for some time past been in Want of Proper Class Rooms, avail themselves of this opportunity of erecting them on the ground where the former offices stood, and where the needful accommodation can be obtained for about £100. The street which runs behind the Chapel has to be paved, and this will require an outlay of £30. Nearly £150, therefore, is needed, towards which it is intended to devote the £40 which was given so generously by the Strangeways Sewing School, and also £10 contributed by Mr. Barry, the owner of the adjoining manufactory. £100 will, therefore, have to be raised by voluntary gifts, and the Committee trust that the liberal donations of the supporters of the truly Christian work of the Missions will speedily provide the Funds required.

Subscriptions will be thankfully received by the treasurer, Mr. R. D. DARBISHIRE, B.A., 23, George-street; Rev. W. GASKELL; Rev. S. ROBINSON, St. Oswald's Grove, Rochdale Road; or Rev. S. ALFRED STEINTHAL, 107, Upper Brook-street.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

A correspondent of the Daily News mentions that the church at Goon-Goon, which we described last week, was visited by Sir Robert Napier, who obtained the permission of the priests to have photographs taken of several of the illustrations of Scripture events with which their Gospels are largely adorned. One or two pages of the Gospel of St. Matthew in old Ethiopic were also photographed, with a view to having the whole Gospel copied, should savans consider the text valuable. As an acknowledgment for the confidence and courtesy manifested, his Excellency presented the church with a vestment of embroidered silk, bearing an inscription in Amharic, stating by whom and under what circumstances the presentation was made. This the priests, whose wants are small, and to whom money is of comparatively little value, prize immensely.

A correspondent of the Watchman, writing from Natal, says:

"The Congregationalists have churches both in Pietermaritzburg and Durban. In the former place the Rev. John Reynolds was minister for a period of six years, and had attained to a measure of popularity as a preacher; but about eighteen months ago he very abruptly abandoned his charge under a suspicion of having adopted the doctrinal views of Bishop Colenso. He is now master of an academy, and manifestly sympathises with the heretical bishop, from whom it is supposed he will by-and-by take priestly orders."

It is a little more than 400 years since the Golden Rose, just sent from Rome to the Queen of Spain, was sent to England. The last instance was that of Eugenius IV., who sent it to our Henry VI. about the time that he was busy in founding Eton and King's College, Cambridge.

A number of young Protestant Spaniards are being educated in connection with the Free Church of the Canton Vaud, at Lausanne, with a view to their becoming missionaries in their native country, where there are some circumstances that seem favourable to an effort on behalf of religious light and freedom. An American widow lady, who has resolved to devote her wealth to the cause of spreading a knowledge of the Gospel in Spain, has established an institution at Pau, with the special object of preparing Spanish boys for further studies in Lausanne, and no sooner was it opened than twelve students applied for admission.

Papal intolerance has succeeded in driving Protestant worship altogether outside the walls of Rome. As we mentioned some time ago, the Presbyterians were forbidden to hold a religious service within the city; and the ambassador of the United States, whose flag was a protection, having removed during the last summer, the American congregation are now obliged to seek a place for prayer without the walls, and have taken a room for this purpose, which had been used as a public granary, in the building in which the English Church is established. We fancy Dr. Manning would scarcely call it Christian treatment, if he and his co-religionists were not allowed to perform their rites within any of our cities.

In Italy, sixteen of the fanatical mob who some weeks ago made an attack on a Protestant evangelist and his friends, at Remedello, near Parma, have been brought to trial. They confessed having taken part in the attack, but pleaded that they were poor, ignorant creatures. In order to show that they were not animated by any revengeful spirit, the Evangelist asked that mercy should be shown to the prisoners. One of them was acquitted; the others received different sentences, varying from four months' imprisonment with a fine of 100 francs, to imprisonment for four days and a fine of 15 francs.

According to the Weekly Register, the number of clerical perversions to Rome during the past twelve months has been eleven.

The Dublin Evening Mail speaks as if it were well assured of the safety, for a while at least, of the Irish Church. It says:

"Whatever statement may be made by the head of Her Majesty's Government, we are, we think, in a position to assure our readers that no 'measure' will be introduced by the Government on the subject of the Irish Church during the present session of Parliament."

Though it cannot be said that public opinion has arrived at any definite conclusions on this same question, the London Review thinks this difficulty should not prevent the Liberal party from placing on record during the present session its opinion that the present system ought no longer to continue. The Irish people are not so unreasonable as to expect that this question can be effectually and finally dealt with during the current year, but they are entitled to receive an assurance that the Legislature is at least alive to the justice of their complaints, and is ready to apply itself earnestly to the work of meeting them.

It is stated that Archbishop Manning has ordered that all choirs shall cease after Easter Day throughout his diocese; the service in future to be Gregorian, chanted by the priests.

The Paris correspondent of the Express heard Lord Radstock preach, on Ash Wednesday, in Lady Harriet Cowper's drawing-room, to seventy or eighty people. He says of his lordship:

"The impression made upon me by a single discourse is that he has a real vocation for the work to which he has recently addicted himself. Had he been plain Mr. Smith, instead of the representative of a most respectable peerage, which was founded in 1800 by his grandfather, the Hon. Admiral Waldegrave, himself a scion of a noble house of older date, I have no doubt he would have made his way as a popular preacher in any town in England. I should think he must have been in his youth, if not like his ancestors, a sailor, at least a yachtsman. His favourite metaphors are drawn from nautical life. There is nothing in any way eccentric or pretentious in his demeanour. He does not affect a clerical costume. Without possessing eloquence of a high order, he has the art of commanding attention, and while preaching extempore seldom hesitates for, or changes, a word. The doctrines of absolute election and grace, and the worthlessness of works, which his Lordship preaches with conviction, lose nothing by being expressed in better English than is frequently heard in Dissenting chapels. At the close of the service he invited any members of the congregation who might wish for spiritual consolation to remain, and he and some fellow-workers to whom had been revealed the ways of God would be extremely happy to make them acquainted with precious promises, of which they might take advantage this very afternoon without any waiting or preparation whatever. Lord Radstock purposes to preach at Lady Harriet's every Wednesday in March, at two o'clock. He will also preach on several evenings at the American Chapel, in the Rue de Berry, and at the Wesleyan Chapel in the Rue Royale."

Mr. Lyne (Father Ignatius) has established a monastery in the diocese of London, in one of whose churches he lectures on Friday and Sunday, dressed in his monk's habit. Last Friday, having announced that he should preach on "Hell," and the vices which lead young men thither, and having expressed a hope that there would not be a single woman present, as the sermon would not be suited to them; the church was crowded to excess, and though this occasioned some little disturbance, the Father seems to have made a forcible and impressive address. He has issued the following announcement of a great demonstration for the 25th:

"O.S.B. English Congregation of St. Benedict.—The members of the second and third order are hereby certified that the Great Annual Chapter will (n.v.) be held in the Priory Chapel, at Laleham, Chertsey, on Wednesday, on the Octave of the Solemnity of Our Most Holy Father Benedict, being Lady-day, March 25. All members should try to be present, as important business will be transacted. Solemn service and chapter at 10-30 a.m. Persons wishing to be admitted into the third order on that day should make early application for the necessary papers, enclosing 6d. in stamps to Brother Dunstan, O.S.B. Benedictine Priory, Laleham, Chertsey. By order of the Rev. the Superior."

The names of about 1,600 members of the University, resident and non-resident, have been affixed to the Oxford address to the Archbishop of Canterbury against the abolition of religious tests in the universities. But it is said that a large proportion of the fellows of Trinity, Christ's, and other colleges of Cambridge, have signed a petition to Parliament in favour of Mr. Coleridge's Bill; and that the numbers will surprise many people.

On Tuesday night, Mr. Maguire opened the debate on Ireland in the House of Commons. Lord Mayo made a long statement on the part of the Government, chiefly explanatory of a policy of masterly inactivity. He deprecated any material interference with the Irish Church, and said that if there was to be equality it must be by "levelling upwards" instead of "levelling down." This, taken in connection with his allusion to Regium donum as "the miserable and inadequate provision for the wants of the Presbyterian clergy," seems to shadow forth a desire to give a sop to the Presbyterians.

The Choir has collected from Mackeson's "Guide to the Churches of London" some curious statistics as to the different hymn books now in use. "Hymns Ancient and Modern" is used in 137 out of the 545 churches, the S. P. C. K. hymnal at 111, Mercer's at 43, Kemble's at 28, Hall's at 43, Windle's at 14, and Bickersteth's at 5. The "People's," the "Hymnal Noted," and "St. Alban's (Holborn) Appendix" are in favour where the services are of the ritualist order, and "Tait and Brady," now generally superseded, is still to be found at All Saints', Knightsbridge, and St. Thomas's, Southwark. Altogether, upwards of thirty different hymn books are in use within a radius of twelve miles, not including the special supplements, which are still more numerous.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

At a meeting of clergymen of the Church of England at Nice, last spring, the questions were discussed, What are the hindrances which keep laymen from listening to preaching or being influenced by it, and how may such hindrances best be remedied. They decided on making inquiries among thoughtful laymen in every department of life, and more than forty answers were returned. The substance of these has just been published, under the title Lay Suggestions on Modern Preaching and Preachers. As might be expected, the suggestions are very varied, and sometimes contradictory. Some complain of the length of sermons, yet the opinion of most sensible men is that this should depend on the subject and the occasion. Some require more matter and thought; "humdrum platitudes" will not do now-a-days. Others demand greater earnestness and skill in delivery. Some urge more expository preaching, and more natural language, "not Galilean talk." Touching the question of extempore versus written discourses, mooted by many of their correspondents, the compilers of the pamphlet "think that whilst all clergymen ought to cultivate the habit of speaking, so as to be able readily to deliver an unwritten address in simple, natural manner, yet the majority of well-educated hearers will probably prefer written sermons, as being, in their judgment, likely to be more carefully and accurately prepared."

Referring to the idea of "comprehension," which Dean Alford and others have recently thrown out, the Freeman asks:

"How can there be cordial union between two Churches when the members of the one count the ministry of the other to be an intrusion, a usurpation, the modern form of the sin of Corah, Dathan, and Abiram? We were told the other day by an ultra-evangelical clergyman that Dissenting ministers have a right to preach the Gospel, inasmuch as he that heareth is told to say 'come,' but they have no authority to administer the sacrament. While the Church holds that the Episcopal ordination alone can give validity to Gospel ministrations, and that official position secures a value for the ordinances which no personal character can give to them, and that the Lord's Supper administered by Dean Swift or Laurence Sterne would have had an authority it would not have had if administered by Dr. Watts or Dr. Doddridge, the Church may have large-hearted men, whose charity violates their logic, and whose Catholicity draws them into a holy inconsistency; but there cannot be hearty union between the great body of her ministers, and those churches which have no episcopacy, and deem apostolical succession to be one of the most unfounded and trashy of the Popish traditions. We know that Dr. Alford does not so believe in Episcopacy as to think that the ministry of Robert Hall and Angell James was without authority; but we do not think he will deny that in the Anglican Church an increasing number believe in the necessity for the apostolical succession, and thereby make the hindrances to intercommunion greater than ever."

In summarising the late proceedings of Convocation, we mentioned that the publications of the Rev. C. Voysey, incumbent of Healaugh, were brought under discussion by the Bishop of Salisbury. Mr. Voysey writes to the Church News, in reference to some remarks which it had made on the subject:

"No dignity of the Church has given me either his 'patronage' or 'tacit approval'; the former I should politely decline, the latter would be to me worthless. If this attack is meant for the Dean of Westminster, allow me to inform you that I have received several letters of remonstrance from him on the subject of my printed sermons, and that he much regrets the course which I have been pursuing."

The Rev. F. W. Farrar, editor of the "Essays on Liberal Education," as select preacher this month at Cambridge, took the text for his first sermon out of the earlier part of Genesis. He told his hearers that he did not mind their entering into various views as to whether man was originally created in only one or a number of centres, as to whether the story of Adam and Eve was or was not an allegory, as to whether man was at once fully developed or first passed through a series of lower organisms, &c., so long as they seized the great fact which the early chapters of the Bible were meant to teach—that man was a fallen creature.

The Record, which is scandalised by the laudations that have been heaped on Lord Derby by many of its fellow-Evangelicals, gives this from a "venerated correspondent:"

"Who was the Prime Minister that appointed Dr. Hook to the deanery of Chichester? Lord Derby. Who appointed Dr. Goodwin to the deanery of Ely? Lord Derby. Who appointed Dr. Duncombe to the deanery of York? Lord Derby. Who appointed Mr. Powys to the deanery of Hereford? Lord Derby. Who appointed Dr. Claughton to the Bishopric of Rochester? Lord Derby. Who translated Bishop Selwyn to the see of Lichfield? Lord Derby. Who on these occasions, and on all occasions, passed by Dr. McNeile, the facile princeps of the English Church, and labouring so nobly, and for so many years close to his Lordship's residence? Lord Derby. Who, when the deanery of his own cathedral of Chester was vacant, put on that admirable veteran a slight which startled and pained thousands of true Churchmen? Lord Derby. Shall true Protestants proclaim this statesman's course as beyond all praise?"

In answer to a correspondent of the Guardian, who had animadverted on some of his statements in Convocation respecting the phrase "reconciling God to man," in the Lambeth letter, Dean Stanley remarks:

"What I endeavoured to point out was that the phrase, if regarded as a formal exclusive expression of dogmatic belief, was unhappily chosen, as it would condemn Dr. Neale; and, in Dr. Neale's opinion, the Orthodox Eastern Church; and even in Mr. Bright's opinion, St. John Damascene,—as well as many divines of our own Church, such as Alexander Knox, Mr. Robertson, Prof. Huxsey, the Bishop of Oxford, and others whom I need not name. If it be regarded as a merely general recognition of the Divine goodness, forming part of a friendly salutation, then the objection to it is removed. In that sense, of course, Dr. Neale might have accepted it, as he accepted the phrase to which your correspondent 'S. A.' alludes ('Remember, Lord, all for good, have pity, Lord, on all, be reconciled to all of us; give peace to the multitude of Thy people'); as St. Chrysostom might have accepted it (though in his Homilies on 2 Cor. v. 20 he writes—'The Apostle says, 'be ye reconciled to God not reconcile God to yourselves—for it is not God who is an enemy to you, but you who are enemies to God'); as several prelates who signed the Pastoral doubtless accept it; as the Bishop of Natal has actually accepted it when he says—'There is a sense, of course, in which a father displeased requires to be reconciled to his disobedient child, though tenderly loving him all along, while he corrects and manifests his anger towards him. I have thought that our Lord came at his Father's own command to reconcile his Father and our Father in this sense to us; and I have used the expression 'our reconciled or rather reconciling Father and Friend.'"

The Rev. John Hunt, "curate of Lambeth," in the letter to the Inquirer from which we quoted last week, draws this picture of the working of patronage in the Establishment:

"One thing we must ask the Nonconformists to help us to do, and that is to reform the Church. It is of no use for us to have a State Church if the State is to care no more for it than Gallio did for Sosthenes when he suffered the Greeks to do what they liked with him. The Church's property is in no way protected. What of it the Government has at its disposal is often used for party political purposes. What of it the Bishops have at their disposal is frequently given to their immediate relatives, or bestowed on some one to whom or to whose friends they have been under obligations. It is not necessary to extend our inquiries far to find that the best livings are occupied by the sons, nephews, and sons-in-law of Bishops and Archbishops. Nor is the Church's property any better protected where the patronage is in private hands. When in my last country curacy, I inquired into the history of the occupancy of several of the livings. No. 1. The incumbent married a lady whose father was able to give a certain sum for the next presentation. No. 2. The living was poor, and therefore it was given to a gentleman of private income. No. 3. The incumbent's father gave up a large living to the Bishop on condition that his son got half the value. No. 4 was bought by the incumbent's wife. No. 5 was a clever scheme of a patron who wanted a living for a near relation, and persuaded another patron to get a rich living divided and this relation presented before the death of the old rector. No. 6 was a chancellor's living, bought with the wife's money. No. 7 was given by a Protestant patron to an anti-Romanist leader. The advowson has since been sold for £6,000, a noble duke pocketing so much of the Church's money, and a rich banker making a good speculation for his son. When I was licensed to this curacy a clergyman much my junior was licensed to a benefice. His father was vicar of the next parish, and had bought it as a provision for his son. The Bishop directed all his conversation to this young clergyman, made him kneel down, and gave him a blessing with his hand on his head, which he did not give to me, my licence being only to a stipendiary curacy; and yet the Bishop knew as well as I did who had bought that living, and that this trading in the souls of men was as much an act of merchandise as anything done on the Stock Exchange. Indeed, the Bishops not only wink at the traffic, but some of them, as far as they can, legalise it. One of the commonest occurrences in the suburbs of London, especially on the Winchester side, is for a clergyman to give two or three thousand pounds to complete a church, on condition that he gets the first presentation. The speculation is invariably a good one, however unfitted he may be for the place. In rich neighbourhoods people go to church for fashion sake, if not from principle. Are these things merely accidents of a State Church, or can a State Church exist without them? It is well to stand on our nationality against such intruders as the Papacy, or such pretenders as Bishop Gray; but having done this, are we to suffer internal corruption to consume the Church's vitals?"

A writer on Christianity and Science, in St. Paul's, makes the following remarks:

"The lay mind of the country, let enthusiastic sceptics say what they will, has not learned to look upon the historical facts with which the Christian religion is bound up, as Cicero and Cæsar looked upon the battle of the augurs; but it is, I think, absolutely certain that the lay mind of England will accept those truths respecting the physical world upon which scientific authorities are agreed, and those conclusions respecting the documents in which the Christian religion is embodied on which scholars are unanimous. It is absolutely certain, also, that these scientific truths and philological conclusions differ in important points from the conceptions entertained regarding them by the divines and scholars who drew up the confessions of the various Protestant Churches. Englishmen feel themselves bound, not merely by their national character for integrity, frankness, and courage, but by their Protestantism itself, to face every statement which is true, and to face it with a welcoming smile. The clearing process which has been applied to all our knowledge must be applied to our religion. It must divest itself of every tag of superstition; and it will, we may pretty confidently infer, be in the future less ecclesiastical and less dogmatic than it has been in the past. But there is no reason to apprehend that we are passing into the Chinese phase of civilisation, or that the grandeur which envelopes human affairs when heaven's light falls upon them is to be no more seen in England. Christianity, the most spiritual of religions, presents no parallel to the religions of classic antiquity; it affords scope to all that is noble, great, beautiful, in man; it is the religion of conscience and of the affections; its harmony with what is divine in humanity is so profound, that the circumstance has been taken advantage of to represent it as a mere elaboration of natural religion. The deliberate testimony of the wisest of the moderns, Goethe, was given to the effect that man cannot recede from the point to which he has attained in Christianity. That a religion which, in its body of spiritual truth offers a comprehensive and benign response to all that is deepest in human nature, under what theory soever man is viewed, should be undermined by the discovery of new facts relating either to the formation of the world or man's place in the animal creation, is out of the question; and the historical evidence touching the fundamental facts of the Christian revelation stands at this moment on a basis which scholars taking rank with any in Europe hold to be impregnable."

After expressing agreement with Mr. Gladstone's remark in his concluding notice of "Ecce Homo," that it is "needful that popular theology, which like everything else, tends to settle down into mere formulas, should thus be shaken up from time to time and adjusted by its eternal standards," the Freeman observes:

"Small indeed is the fruit of conventional theology. We well remember in the days of our youth how the farmers dreaded to go deeper than the few inches of soil they usually ploughed; 'the hungry pan of the earth,' as they termed it, if broken into, would prove worse than worthless. Now they plough and tear it up to double the old depth, and mingle old and new soil together with a vast increase in the fruitfulness and produce. So many dread to depart from the old theological phrases and modes of epitomising Scripture truth—the conventional 'pan' of stereotyped theology. But the sacred soil of Scripture is very deep; far deeper, assuredly, than our theologians have yet reached, and as our Lord foresaw, the well-instructed scribe will doubtless to the 'end of the age,' bring out things 'new' as well as old; will go deeper into the ground, and not merely work over and over again the old and now almost exhausted surface soil of human tillage. There is a great deal more in the Gospels and in that great life which they portray than divines have yet found."

The Nonconformist takes pretty much the same view of Lord Russell's proposals for the settlement of the Irish Church as we did on their first appearance. It asks:

"Does his lordship's information as to the set of public opinion in the three kingdoms warrant him in concluding that he can carry his plan? Is he aware that its first effect would be to rive the Liberal party asunder, and to array in opposition to the statesman who proposed the measure the greater part of its earnestness, energy, and life? Can he not foresee that it would evoke from other quarters a 'No Popery' howl which it would be difficult for any minister to face? Does the sentiment of the age tend in the direction in which he wishes the Imperial Legislature to move? No doubt he might have the House of Lords, including a majority of the Bench of Bishops, with him, but would this be an equivalent for the public support he would lose? Ireland does not ask for, but formally disclaims, such a measure—Scotland would not hear of it—and it would be too flattering a description of political sentiment in England regarding it to say that the people are by no means agreed in its favour. Why should the younger statesman to whom the noble earl bequeaths the impossible task, Whig-like, build up a wall to break his head against?"

In a sermon at Whitehall, on Sunday, the Bishop of London said, he believed that all modern European experience taught that the maintenance of a national State religion was in nowise inimical to wise toleration or to the rights of individual conscience. We should like to know when his lordship's "modern" begins. We fancied that we had heard something of Ejected ministers in modern times; and even now we could point to some national State religions which we should hardly describe as friendly to toleration or to the rights of individual conscience. Again, the Bishop suggested that a national State Church could not well lose the largeness of Christian principles in the narrow disputes which occupy so much of the time of other Christian bodies. Looking at the kind of disputes which are at present going on in his own Church, we feel greatly at a loss to know what his lordship means, unless he no longer regards it as, what it is certainly ceasing to be, the national church.

There was a lively debate, last week, in the Union at Cambridge, on the subject that "The existence of any political constituencies from which Dissenters are excluded is discreditable to the country." Mr. W. Wiles, of Sidney College, who spoke with great spirit, among other strong things, said it was notorious that Cambridge and the Sister University made themselves more than usually ridiculous when they had to return members to Parliament; and in proof of this he referred to the rejection of Lord Palmerston by the former, and of Mr. Gladstone by the latter, and to the mediocrities sent in their stead. He objected to the exclusion of Dissenters on two grounds: first, on the broad ground that to exclude a man from any position in which he might do good to himself and be useful to the community, on account of his opinions on any speculative matter, was unjust, inexpedient as far as it regarded all the interests concerned, and, moreover, thoroughly absurd. And secondly, because he considered that any political action undertaken by the Church party alone must necessarily be discreditable to the country. The only argument used by his opponents that had a shade of reason in it was, that it was expedient for the sake of uniformity of opinion that the present system of repression and exclusion should be carried out against Nonconformists. If it were true that uniformity were desirable, and that it could be obtained by the means used, that would justify any measures that could be taken against Nonconformists. It was an argument that, in a recent meeting, had been pushed to a fearful extent by the Bishop of London. He had declared that if it were not for the Established Church the great body of English people would drift from Christianity to Unitarianism. If this were so, all he could say about it was, let it drift. What he meant was, that if the Church, its creeds, and Christianity itself, had so little hold upon the people of England, that without legalised injustice and the political and social supports that at present fence about the Church, the majority of Englishmen would become sceptics or deists, he would say, and every sincere believer would say so too, take away those supports and let the matter work in its own way, trusting, as every faithful man must, that in the end the truth and the right must prevail. They had attempted to produce uniformity in these universities, and the result had been that they had driven away all thinking men, and had separated themselves entirely from the progress of thought in the country. In this 19th century to require adhesion to any set of dogmas, especially to any set of theological dogmas, was to give an insult to thinkers and to make a declaration of war against all thought. The universities had obtained uniformity, but at the expense of every man and everything worth having. Instead of being, as universities should be, a light to the people, they had become mere schools for curates and refuges for pedants. The sect, which was at present the State Church of the country, had had every possible opportunity for producing uniformity, if such a thing were possible. It had always been the pet of the State; it had had all sorts of legislation for its benefit; it had absorbed a great part of the funded wealth of the country; more important still, it had had the two great sources of education for its especial use and benefit, and yet it had been expelled from Scotland, it was detested in Ireland, and it had been deserted by a majority of the people of England. He was proud that both by birth and education he belonged to a party that had always been the most important in the State, most important from its numbers, its intelligence, its high purpose. Not important to England alone, for its members had made a new nation across the Atlantic, which in these latter days had given to the world a spectacle of our old Puritan valour, and having founded a new world bid fair to be the mistress and leader of the old; and he knew the time was not far distant when the great Nonconformist party, through whose patriotism we were what we were, would be admitted to those political privileges, to that perfect civil and religious equality which was the right of every Englishman; when the last remnant of mediæval ignorance and bigotry, which these Universities rolled as a sweet morsel under their tongue, would be swept away for ever. (Cheers.) The votes in favour of the motion were 35; against, 52.

REVIEW.

The Parables of Jesus: being Twenty Sunday Morning Meditations thereupon. By John Page Hopps. London: Simpkin and Marshall.

THERE is no part of our Lord's teaching which has been so generally attractive, and none, we imagine, which has left so deep an impression, as his Parables. They have had a charm alike for the learned and the unlearned, for the young and the old, by their simple beauty winning their way to the heart, and by their deep spiritual wisdom enriching the soul. Homely and familiar, however, as they mostly are in their illustrations, owing to the references which they contain to habits and customs so different from ours, and to the circumstances in which they were spoken, a little explanation is often needed for the ordinary reader. Mr. Hopps has given sufficient of this, and not too much. Orthodox writers who have taken the same subject, as far as we are acquainted with them, seem to have forgotten the truth of what Tillotson (we believe it was) said, that a parable resembles a sphere, which touches only in a single point, and have not seldom either lost sight of the primary lesson which the story was intended to teach, or derived from what were its mere accessories and embellishments inferences and conclusions that were inconsistent with that lesson. Mr. Hopps has not been led into this mistake, but rightly confines himself in his "Meditations" on each parable to its one central idea, which is of permanent application, and brings this out clearly and forcibly, and gives it a practical bearing. To those who are acquainted with his previous writings, we need hardly say that this little work, while making no pretensions to be learned or profound, is marked by freshness of thought and tenderness of feeling, and that there are scattered throughout it many graceful touches of fancy. To those who are in search of matter for Sunday reading in the family, we can distinctly recommend these "Meditations" as likely to interest all the members of it, and at the same time as not too long; and we have no doubt they would be found, as the author himself suggests, "useful to congregations who have to depend on books in the absence of a teacher with words of his own."

Our limited space will not allow us to extract more than a single short passage out of many that we had marked which are equally good. Our readers, we are sure, will feel with us that the following, on "the woman that was a sinner," is tenderly and beautifully put:

"Here was a poor child of the world who was what the world had made her, whose sad life had been cut off from God, and from all that seemed to flow from God—from all that was pure and beautiful and good; and words had fallen on her ears which had recalled to her heart dreams that had faded, and joys that had vanished, and the light of a pure love which she thought had gone out for ever. And all the tide of her life was changed, and hope came for desperate despair; and the angels whispered to her again, and the old, old days came back to mind. For the words of Jesus—the accents of this new Evangel—had found a place in her poor sad heart, and all her strong, ardent, passionate nature was turned in a new direction, and she was now a pilgrim who had taken the first few steps on the road to righteousness, with her face uplifted to the skies. And here was the angel who had done all this, the incarnation to her of all that was holy and pure and heavenly; here, in this Jesus, was her temple, her altar, her sacrifice; and here, too, was her guiding star, that led the way her heart desired to go. And so, amid the tumult of her hopes and fears, her shame, her love, her joy, she is prostrate before the shrine of her devotion—before the one being it is all her heaven as yet to see. And nothing is too costly to give him, and no posture is too lowly, and no service too humbling, and no sacrifice too great. And so, behold her at his feet behind him, weeping, as she anoints them with her costly perfume and more costly tears, and covers them even with the hair of her head—so complete the overthrow of her pride, so gentle and lowly the perfection of her pathetic contrition and holy love."

MISTRANSLATIONS IN THE AUTHORISED VERSION.—No. XXV.

JEREMIAH xli. 25. "I will punish the multitude of No." More correctly, "I will punish Amunmo," or the city of the Egyptian Thebes. The Egyptian name of the city should be No-amunei, corrupted as above by the Hebrew writer. The name means "the great city of Amun."

Jeremiah xlix. 33. "Hazor shall be a dwelling for dragons." More correctly, "for jackals." So in chapter li. 37.

Jeremiah l. 21. "Utterly destroy after them." More correctly, "the hindermost of them," as they flee away in the battle.

Lamentations ii. 6. "He hath destroyed his places of the assembly." More correctly, "He hath destroyed its synagogues."

Ezekiel vi. 14. "Make the land desolate, yea, more desolate than the wilderness toward Diblah." More correctly, "Make the land desolate, even from the [southern] desert unto Diblah," or rather Riblah in the north; from one end of the country to the other.

Ezekiel vii. 10. "The morning is gone forth." More correctly, "The circle of events is gone forth."

Ezekiel xi. 16. "I will be to them as a little sanctuary in the countries where they shall come." More correctly, "as a sanctuary for a short time."

Ezekiel xii. 7. "I brought it forth in the twilight, and bare it upon my shoulders in their sight." More correctly, "in the dark," and "before their eyes," when they could not see it because of the dark.

Ezekiel xiii. 4. "Thy prophets are like foxes in the deserts." More correctly, "in desolate places," where the foxes are to be met with rather than in the desert.

Ezekiel xvi. 52. "Thou also which judged thy sisters bear thine own shame for thy sins." More correctly, "Bear thou thine own shame, who hast taken the blame off thy sisters by thysins." She was so much the worst that she made the others seem blameless.

Ezekiel xxi. 16. "Go thee one way or other, either on the right hand or on the left." More correctly, "Form close ranks, turn to the right, set yourselves straight, turn to the left." These are military terms, such as are used by an officer to the soldiers under his command.

Ezekiel xxi. 22. "To appoint captains." More correctly, "To place battering-rams" against the city walls.

Ezekiel xxvi. 8. "He shall slay with the sword thy daughters in the field." More correctly, "Thy suburbs on the land." The city of Tyre is here spoken of, which stood upon a rock, an island, or almost an island in the sea, of which the neighbouring suburbs were on the main land.

Ezekiel xxvi. 20. "And shall set thee in the low parts of the earth." More correctly, "in the world below," or in hell.

Ezekiel xxix. 10. "I will make the land of Egypt utterly waste and desolate, from the tower of Syene even unto the border of Ethiopia." More correctly, "from Magdolon to Syene, even to the border of Ethiopia." Magdolon is at the northern end of Egypt, and Syene on the borders of Ethiopia, at the southern end. The same correction must be made xxx. 6.

OXFORD IN DISTRESS.

IT might have been thought impossible for the Oxford Conservatives to introduce any novelty into the worn and hackneyed subject of their resistance to University Reform. The address, however, which Dr. PUSEY, Dr. JELF, and forty other magnates of the University, with some sixteen hundred graduates, have addressed to the Archbishop of CANTERBURY is a novelty in tone, if not in argument. It is one of those passionate protests which serve rather to indicate than to retard a crisis. "We cannot represent too strongly to your Grace that this is no common contest, no party question; it is not even a question between the Church and Dissent. The battle is for Christian faith and morals; it is for our very life. On behalf of our Church and our country, on behalf of the souls of the youth of this hitherto Christian nation, we solemnly, as in the presence of ALMIGHTY GOD, implore your Grace and our Christian brethren everywhere to strive with us to maintain in our university and our colleges the principle of Christian education which has been handed down to us through so many centuries, and which, if once destroyed, it will be impossible to restore." This is accompanied by the assertion that the proposed measure will produce "the overthrow of a definite creed and of a common form of prayer," whereby "the very basis of a Christian education will disappear from among us. While the intellect at the most critical period of life, and in an age of great and increasing excitement, will be highly stimulated, the conscience will be injured by the exhibition, in the very home of education, either of a bitter conflict on first principles or of a lax and careless indifference." And yet what is it which calls forth this almost pitiful tone of apprehension and entreaty? Simply this, that Mr. COLERIDGE, a man of unimpeachable churchmanship as well as Christianity, proposes to carry the reforms which were made a few years ago a little further. The former change enabled Dissenters to take a Bachelor's degree, but the degree of Master of Arts is still, as formerly, open only to those who will sign a declaration of assent to the Thirty-nine Articles; and all the governing power of the University, Heads of houses, Fellows and Tutors are bound to be members of the Church of England. It is simply proposed to put Nonconformists exactly on a par with Churchmen at Oxford. Yet this is "to endanger the very basis of a Christian education," and those who utter this cry would have Dissenters believe that it is not a question of Church and Dissent, but of religion itself! Dissenters, however, are not quite so convinced that the Thirty-nine Articles and membership of the Establishment are the only effectual bulwarks of God's truth. They naturally are doubtful about the utility of a "definite creed" which yet is already sufficiently elastic to admit Dr. PUSEY, Professor JOWETT, and Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH within the charmed enclosure, outside of which nothing is to be hoped for but "a bitter conflict on first principles," or "a lax and careless indifferentism."

It is not, however, among Dissenters that University Reform finds its most vehement advocates, and this addresses its most pungent critics. Thoughtful and liberal Churchmen are themselves beginning to see that nothing can be more discreditable to their own church than this timid clutching at a monopoly of statement in our great national seats of learning on subjects which are being thoroughly and openly discussed in the world. It is the religiousness of the nation, not of the establishment on which the religious tone of the Universities must depend. Mr. COLERIDGE's effort is directed really to make the University more national. The Times well points out that when the Oxford graduates entreat that their University and Colleges may remain institutions of the national church, they are ignoring the fact that the United Kingdom has not a national church: rather, it has two national churches besides the five millions of Roman Catholics, and a still greater number of Nonconformists; and all these will be represented as they have never before in the Legislature which will have to settle the future character of our great seats of learning. The Pall Mall Gazette, also, thus takes up the question upon a still deeper ground:—"The proposal made by the persons signing the address comes in a few words to this: Whereas the truth of Christianity is greatly doubted by many persons and would be fully discussed if the University were thrown open, let us by all manner of means keep it closed. Though the question has been asked a thousand times, we cannot help asking once more whether it is possible to found such a proposal upon any other principle than that it is not only desirable that Christianity should be believed whether it is true or false, but that the education given to the young should be so contrived as, if possible, to prevent them from knowing that anybody doubts it? To us it appears very difficult to imagine anything so petty and so immoral as these propositions."

Such words as these from such quarters will have to be met by something stronger than either clerical scolding or entreaty. The healthy intelligence of England in all churches is sick of this nonsense of supposing that the truth can be endangered by preventing the fellowships, and other fair rewards of learning, from being monopolised by an Ecclesiastical Orthodoxy. Again and again of late years the very highest University honours have notoriously been carried off by Dissenters; and the fellow-students who have honoured the ability of these men, and the tutors who have been proud of them, and who would gladly have retained them as Fellows, are ashamed of the petty restrictions which have stood in their way precisely because they were conscientious men. All these restrictions are doomed, though we should be sorry to think with Dr. PUSEY and Co. that therefore Christianity is doomed.

A PARABLE OF THE AGE.

I.

WHAT a strange man my Uncle Gregory was!

He inhabited an old manor-house, where his ancestors, formerly lords of the manor, had dwelt, and acquired some fame in their country. Built on the steep slope of a hill, accessible at one side only, this manor-house, with its ancient towers, its black walls, its gratings, its moat, and its drawbridge, presented a most imposing appearance to any one who approached it from the west. In the night, especially in the wavering starlight, its gigantic outline was very striking. The passers-by trembled, the neighbouring peasants, who sometimes timidly crossed the threshold, told strange stories about it. Poets had written touching sentimentalities upon it. Some tourists once—men to whom nothing is sacred—scandalising the peasants by their curiosity and boldness, introduced themselves and explored the interior; and actually wrote a description of it afterwards. All this is very beautiful and interesting in an old ruin; but no one could conceive why my Uncle Gregory persisted in living there. In fact (not to speak of the worm-eaten wainscots, the faded hangings, and the worn and antiquely clumsy furniture), its thick walls, which in many places leaned far out of the perpendicular; its low and narrow windows, which the sun's rays seldom entered; its boundary wall, which obstructed the view, and only allowed a few feet of sky to be seen—served altogether to make a sojourn there most monotonous and tiresome.

Yes, my Uncle Gregory was a very strange man. His friends pitied him with all their hearts, and often said, "Mr. Gregory, you really ought to build yourself another house and leave that stupid old place."

But he would not listen; sometimes he even stormed at such a proposal, and half-a-dozen offended wrinkles would appear on his forehead. What could you expect? He clung to his old mansion, and stayed on there. Sometimes he would even avow his weakness. "Yes, yes," he would say, "you are right, there is much to be said against it; but . . ." and he stopped with this but. Then when he got back home he solemnly raised the drawbridge as in the good old times, installed himself in his hall with some of his friends, and read with them in two or three old books old stories which they never disputed; "it was printed, so it must be true." It seemed to him that nothing could be better.

You see what a strange man my Uncle Gregory was!

II.

He who most pressed him to leave the old castle was his own son, my cousin Martin. Martin had been brought up on the old manor, and his father had daily taught him to distrust the present age and new opinions, and to think that wisdom existed only in the old castle, and that there was nothing but folly outside its walls. But when my uncle found it necessary to send him to the university, lest he should grow up entirely ignorant—for, in truth, there was little learning at the old castle—Martin, on coming into contact with his new companions, found himself at first very awkward, gentleman though he was; but by being laughed at he was soon cured of his foolishness, threw aside the stiff airs of the squire, and became as natural as his comrades, a friend of knowledge, art, and progress.

Then, when he was twenty-one, he wished to fly upon his own wings, worked hard, and with the first money he saved built directly opposite to the old castle a charming house—snug, comfortable, with large unbarred windows—and surrounded it with a hawthorn hedge—a defence against cattle, but no obstacle to visitors. Then, with a firm determination to repair any part whenever necessary, and even to alter the whole interior arrangement if needful, he established himself there.

The country people who saw this new building, and after beginning by criticising ended by admiring it, called it New House, and it still goes by that name. There in his lofty rooms, full of light and air, and looking out on wide prospects, Martin used to assemble the educated society of the neighbourhood. They talked, read the new works of merit as they appeared, and discussed them freely. They did not always agree, but as they sought only to enlighten and instruct themselves, their most marked differences of opinion never made them forget that they were all friends and all fallible.

Strangers were amicably received, however great might be the trouble of understanding their language. One after another obtained what they came for—bread, friendship, and knowledge. The peasants also flocked to this charming place, and though some of them abused the privilege and had to be reproved, the greater number behaving with propriety, gained greatly by association with more educated people, who treated them as equals. Thus New House was found to be much pleasanter than the old one, where no one went except out of respect for my Uncle Gregory.

III.

Uncle Gregory himself went seldom to his son's house, for he looked upon it with distrust and almost sadness. Nevertheless, whenever he went there, he was pleased in spite of himself by the irresistible attraction of a life so different from his own, and seemed almost to grow young again. And when in the evening he had retraced his steps to the old mansion, when the bridge was lowered and the rusty creaking gate was shut, it seemed to him like a burial. Martin, who had wished to be kind to his father and to enliven his later years, constantly said to him, "Come, father, leave a place which is the ruin of your health, and where your mind suffers as well as your body. Come, a week will be sufficient to accustom you to our house; and I assure you that, once at home with us, you will regret that you did not come sooner."

But the father answered: "Impossible, my son; you would spoil me; and besides, do you see, I have lived in the old manor-house the whole of my life. . . . It was there that my father ended his days, it is there that I also should wish to end mine. But you, alas . . ." He stopped with a sigh.

One day when Martin was just coming out of his father's house, on his way home, he perceived under the damp ivy, which had long hidden them, two enormous crevices in the wall, extending from the top of it to the bottom. He went back again. "My father," said he, "there is really much danger in living here, it is quite necessary to move at once."

My uncle came out, looked at the gaping cracks with the air of a man disagreeably surprised, shook his head, and murmured, "No."

What a strange man my Uncle Gregory was!

IV.

The following night frightful noises awoke him out of sleep. He rose, and, taking his lantern, moved cautiously to the part of the house from which the noise seemed to proceed, and there a desolate sight lay before his view. The roof had fallen in. He looked at the heap of broken tiles, the beams so gnawed and rotten, whilst a cloud of dust obscured the light and smelt very mouldy. He looked around him for some time as if in a dream, but when he found that it was not a dream, he sighed, and said, "Martin was not altogether wrong. But"—and there he stopped.

When he regained his room he found before him Martin, who had hastened there upon hearing the noise.

"God be praised that you are alive," said the son; "you are here surrounded with danger. This time you will surely not refuse to join us."

My Uncle Gregory still hesitated. He went to stay the night at his son's house, and almost decided upon remaining there; but on the morrow he went to visit the place of his misfortune. There had been an immense and irreparable fall. Tears fell from his eyes as he surveyed the ruin. Then he proceeded to the other wing, walked round it, and declared there was no cause for fear, entered his rooms, looked over them, and said, "I will remain here." Martin renewed all his objections and remonstrances, but in vain. My Uncle Gregory still was obstinate. "This wing is quite solid," he said, and determined to live there. He was not destined to stay long.

V.

One day two gentlemen, with gold lace upon their caps, presented themselves at the castle. "Mr. Gregory," said they, "what do you believe to be the value of this old ruin?"—"It is not for sale."—"No, we did not ask that; but what would you value it at, if all or part of it should be taken?"—"Indeed, gentlemen, this is most impertinent: 'if it should be taken.' By what right do you ask me?"—"Stay, Mr. Gregory, do not be angry," said one of the two; "we are the agents of the X. Y. Z. Railway Company. The Company are about to construct a new line from X. to Z., which will come exactly upon your castle, as you will see here," and he unrolled upon the table a large paper.

The map which he unrolled showed but too plainly the fatal plans of the X. Y. Z. Company: they were going to run directly through the heart of the old mansion. Neither on one side nor the other, neither above nor below, but in a provokingly straight line immediately through it. My Uncle Gregory did not know very much about the age in which he was living. He knew that in theology and politics, it had made many wicked innovations which he hated very much and comprehended not at all; and now he found that it had introduced legislative novelties which he would hate quite as much, and would unfortunately be compelled to comprehend rather better. "Compulsory powers," "land clauses," "assessment of value!" What right had a railway company, or fifty railway companies, an act of Parliament, or fifty acts of Parliament, to make him sell, when he didn't want to sell, the old mansion where he and his ancestors had lived—or at any rate vegetated—for so many years? But it was to be, and must be. My uncle had always been against the spirit of the age, and now the spirit of the age was against him.

In spite of its ruined state, he still clung to the old mansion; he persisted in declaring that its dilapidations made it none the less habitable; nay, at times, when the argument waxed hot, he would even aver that they were part of the original design of the builders. And he would call for corroboration upon some of the ancient retainers, who looked upon him and the old mansion as alike perfect, and would have backed him in anything. But even they blushed as they said it; and I think my uncle felt inwardly that if his ancestors could see both, they would be almost as much disgusted with his house as with Martin's.

VI.

The fatal day came at last. The X. Y. Z. Company's workmen took possession of the old mansion, and my uncle had to seek refuge with Martin. A very short time sufficed to make him feel at home, accustomed though he had been to solitude, amongst the cultivated and well-bred men who visited at New House; and though the difficulty of deciphering the clumsy and faded letterpress of his old library had made him all but abandon reading, he resumed it with eagerness on becoming acquainted with the clearer type of the present day. His goodness of heart speedily endeared him to those around him, and intercourse with them restored the knowledge and refinement which his secluded life had led him to forget.

He never wishes for the old mansion now. "I have learned," he says, and it is his favourite remark, "that it is better to live with one's grandchildren than one's grandfathers."

Surely you know Martin? And my uncle—I think you must have seen him too.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL ADDRESSES.

THE Hive offers the following advice to those who have to address Sunday scholars:

Do not begin until there is perfect silence. Let it be felt that this is one of the conditions on which you speak at all. To commence with a noise is a practical admission that, on the whole, you have no serious objection to noise. If, as is probable enough, talking should break out whilst you are speaking, check it by a decided pause; and, on resuming, pointedly address that portion of the school which you have had to silence. Twelve minutes is as long as you should speak. A visitor about to give the address should be told that this is his limit. If you can say what you have to say in ten minutes, so much the better. A great point is, not to weary the children or overload their young minds. One truth firmly fixed thereon is better than three or four which will jostle each other, and be retained for a short time only. Many a good address has been spoiled by the speaker attempting too much, and talking too long. A text is useful, but not absolutely necessary. Of course, the speaker should have some clearly defined aim; but this does not pre-suppose a text; and care should be taken at the outset not to alarm your youthful audience by creating the apprehension that you are about to preach. Children may be got to like addresses; but it is doubtful if they will ever take kindly to sermons. The desk is the place for the former; the pulpit for the latter. Let your manner be animated, without being either grim or comic. Whatever else, mind that your language is simple, and that your sentences are short. "Long sentences," says Shenstone, "in a short address, are like large rooms in a small house." Let your thoughts reach down to the youngest child in the school; if he understands you, everybody else may. Let your voice reach forward to the farthest child in the school: if he hears you, everybody else may.

AMERICAN NOTES.

In a sermon recently preached, the Rev. H. Ward Beecher, said:

"I believe in revivals. I pray that God may give us a thousand where we have had one. But mere revivals of religious feeling, without those clustering influences that should follow every revival, will not save us. We need the sanctification of the heart; but, in connection with this, we need trying to reform people by religion, to bring to organised intellectual elements. We need, while them those elements which are adapted to give them development and power. When I call men to be converted, I always have in my mind a man converted not to become merely a member of Plymouth Church, but to be more a man. I want them converted in such a sense that they shall stand up in the church men in Christ Jesus, coming in because it is noble to do it—coming in because to love God and man is worthy of our ambition. I want them to come into the church with the understanding that they are willing to give up their appetites and passions for the sake of their fellow-men. I want them to be temperance men. They must be clean and clear on that subject. And I want every man that comes into this church to be a man that says: 'I am not only in favour of religion and temperance, but I am earnestly in favour of preserving our old beloved colonial New-England institutions. I go in for the Sabbath. I go in for the Bible. I go in for those institutions through which have come to us all that has made us what we are, and all that is associated with our memories of our fathers and mothers.' I want you born into Christ, and I want you born so that you will come out a regal man. I want you to be a temperate man; I want you to be a God-fearing man; I want you to be a Sabbath-keeping man. And that is not all—I want every man that comes into the church, not to come into it as into an easy chair, a rocking-chair, but to come in as a workman for Christ Jesus. Wherever there is anything to be done, wherever there are the poor to be succoured, wherever there are the ignorant to be instructed, wherever there are men to be reformed, wherever there is a responsibility to be borne, I would to God that there you might be known as an apt, quick-working, enterprising man. And I would that you might not get tired nor discouraged, but that you might hold out to the end."

There has been an ecclesiastical trial of some interest in New York. It appears that Mr. Tyng, a young Episcopal clergyman who has a parish in that city, was last autumn on a visit to the town of New Brunswick, and there received an invitation to preach in a Methodist church. He accepted it, and his intention was announced by placard; but on the Saturday evening, a formal notice was served upon him, forbidding him, in the name of Dr. Stubbs, the rector, to officiate in a "Methodist meeting-house." Mr. Tyng, however, kept his promise; and for this breach of Episcopal law, Dr. Stubbs, with the help of Dr. Boggs, "presented" him to the Bishop of New Jersey, who relegated the business to the Bishop of New York; and it was brought before an ecclesiastical court last month, when both parties appeared, assisted by an imposing array of counsel. Judgment has not yet been given, but it seems likely that it will go against Mr. Tyng, and that in that case there will be an appeal to the General Convention of the Episcopal Church, which is soon to meet. The Boston Christian Register says:

"The whole thing at first sight seems very trivial. That one of the truest, most eloquent, and devoted clergymen of the Episcopal Church should thus be formally arraigned before a court for simply preaching the Gospel to a congregation of Methodists, and that eminent lawyers should plead with as much apparent earnestness as if the culprit was the assassin of Lincoln, is one of the marvels of the age. All this, in one aspect, tends to make the Church a laughing-stock, and the Gospel a by-word. But there is another aspect of the case. Indirectly, it involves questions which now divide the Episcopal Church. Rev. Stephen H. Tyng, jun., represents the Low Churchmen. He and his father may be regarded as among the leaders of that school which, having no fellowship with ritualism, would give itself with hearty zeal to the work of evangelising the world. This act for which he is tried was a protest against the narrow and exclusive spirit of the Episcopal Church—a narrowness in methods quite as much as in doctrine. For this reason this gallant knight, as he throws down the gauntlet of defiance, has the sympathy of all generous and progressive minds."

The New York Independent gives the following directions to preachers:

"Be short and lively. Load up before you enter the sacred desk; announce your text when the time comes, with distinctness, and dash right into the discussion. Fire at point blank range. Keep your eye on that drowsy hearer until he becomes wide awake. Hold the children and those restless young folks under your command. 'Give a portion' to the aged ones, who try so hard to catch every syllable you utter, and, under some modern pulpit orators, lose about half. Stir all the people! 'Shake off dull sloth' in manner and in tone. Be in earnest—tremendously in earnest! Time is passing; eternity is near; judgment is at the door! Make an impression, if you can, inside of thirty minutes; if not, ask God to give His blessing, and—close."

An American paper tells us, and of course we are bound to believe it, that a man in Alton, Iowa, has escaped from punishment for adultery, because the prosecuting attorney had indicted him for "idolatry."

A cutting from a Canadian paper gives an interesting account of a lecture delivered before the Orillia Mechanics' Institute by "the Rev. James Bazley, of Severn Bridge," formerly of Stockport, and of Park Lane, near Wigan. The subject of the lecture was "Independent men—who are they?"

"The lecturer showed that they were not independent men who were such only in outward or material circumstances of life, but those who were superior to the influences of such for the gratification of their minds, and who realised high enjoyment in encountering privation and disadvantage with a resolute will, and removing them by patient, persevering and energetic action. The subject was illustrated by notices of some who had been distinguished by their conduct in important situations which they had attained by industry and persevering labour, both in self-education, and the conscientious discharge of the various duties of life. Brief memoirs were given of the lives of Arkwright, Wedgwood, Flaxman, and Thorwaldsen."

The movement begun last year with so much success by some of our leading Unitarian ministers in the States, for preaching in public halls, is still carried on. The Boston Christian Register for Feb. 22, says:

"We learn that the halls where religious services were held last Sunday evening were crowded. The Boston Theatre was full to hear Rev. J. F. Clarke.

In Providence, Rev. E. E. Hale preached; the entire space was packed, and many went away because they were unable to get in. At Springfield, the Rev. Mr. Nye preached to a crowded audience, which would have been twice as large if there had been room in the hall, and the work is going on in New Bedford and other places."

Says the Register:—"Rev. Mrs. P. A. Hanaford was ordained as pastor of the Universalist society in Hingham on Wednesday."

The Late Thomas Oldham.

THOMAS OLDHAM, of Ryecroft, near Ashton, whose death was announced in the Herald last week, was born in Mossley, in the year 1797. His parents were poor, but truly good people, New Connexion Methodists, his father indeed being to the last an active and prominent labourer in that body. At an early age Mr. Oldham became a member of the New Connexion Church, treading in the steps in which his father trod, and in time engaging in the work of preaching, class-leading, and visiting the sick. Though not an educated man, he was endowed with gifts of heart and mind and speech that made him a worthy and effective preacher. About 1843, a time memorable in the annals of the New Connexion, Mr. Oldham gave up his membership in that church, and joined the Christian Brethren. It was a painful step to him, but his love of liberty was so great that nothing could prevent him joining that church which would give him full and perfect liberty of thought and speech. Among the Christian Brethren and Unitarians, especially in the little congregation at Astley-street, Dukinfield, of which he was long the leader, he has for twenty-four years rendered willing and valuable services as a lay preacher, and many of our congregations in the East Cheshire and East Lancashire districts feel keenly that in him they have lost a kind friend and wise counsellor. He was an earnest, and thoroughly practical and homely preacher, one who aimed rather to win souls to Christ than to win converts to his peculiar faith. His sermons were always characterised by a spirit of fervent zeal, and by a tenderness and benevolence that often touched and melted the most hardened hearts. He was the very embodiment of kindness and love; and never was he so much at home in his preaching as when he dwelt upon the love, and mercy, and goodness of God, and upon the happiness there is in store for this good and faithful children. As a visitor of the sick, the afflicted, and the dying, Mr. Oldham was highly esteemed and greatly beloved. For more than six months previous to his death his health had been failing, yet still he continued his preaching as usual up to January last, when he was confined to his bed, where he remained until his death, on February 11th, in the 71st year of his age.

FIRESIDE READINGS.

THE DEFEATED.

My happy morn of youthful years

Was not bedewed with tears;
Hope, like the genial orb of fire,
Illumed the heaven of pure desire;
And things impossible to bearded men,
Were easy conquests then.

I swore me liegeman to the light,
To human weal and right;
Life's splendid ills I would not grasp,
Because they hid the asp;
And the white lies that all men tell—
I sent them back to hell.

But the high visions of the morn
Wither in midday scorn;
And man, sore hammered by the fates,
Oft does the thing he hates:
So I, who early walked in heaven,
Fell earthward, rent and riven:—
Fell earthward—and the things I spurned,
When life, a pure star, burned,
Became, perforce, my daily mates,
Not loves, but hideous hates;
As if for sins and base desires,
God burned my soul with fires.

Ye who are young, and pure, and free,
O prize your liberty!
And follow still each holy vision,
With unappalled decision;
And still, though lashed by pitiless fate,
Touch not the thing you hate.

Let not the Tempter's kiss of fire
Quench one divine desire;
Be scorned, be hated, be reviled,
Yet be thou Mercy's child;
Better, like Stephen, bleed and die,
Than live an honoured lie!

KAFFIR SUPERSTITIONS.

THE Rev. W. G. Holden, for twenty-seven years a Wesleyan missionary in South Africa, gives the following account of the superstitions of the Kaffir races:

The Kaffirs, so far as any outward recognition of religious worship is concerned, are literally "without God;" but, at the same time, there is perhaps no nation under heaven that is more superstitious, or that is kept in more continual dread by the terror of ghosts and spirits. In this sense they are not "infidels" as their name imports. Multitudes of them have no idea of a Supreme Being at all; and the large remainder nothing more than a floating, dreamy, indistinct notion. All they recognise is the isituta, ghost, or spirit of the departed; the rank or station in the ghost world being fixed according to the degree of eminence they have attained in this, as great chiefs or renowned warriors; but then only as first, or highest among equals. This spirit, or these spirits, may be offended or made angry by neglect or otherwise, in various ways, and may inflict punishment, which the people dread, and seek to avert. It is not laid down as an established fact, or article of belief, that the souls of all the departed exist in a separate state, or exercise control over the affairs of men, nor is their belief uniform upon this subject; but generally the conviction is that all do live, but certainly the souls of their renowned chiefs, or great warriors, or distinguished ancestors; and the invocation of their priests is specially directed to these. They also as firmly believe that these spirits occupy the bodies of serpents, either occasionally or constantly; and they accordingly classify the order of serpents. One was pointed out to me as the kind in which the spirits of their departed chiefs resided; in the same manner others, as tenanted by the souls of women: and yet another, as the locals of common people and children. They believe, too, that the spirits of the ghost world are always near them, are cognisant of their actions, are made angry by affront or neglect; and, as the result, inflict the various ills that befall them in sickness, loss, or death; that these isituta may be appeased by sacrificial offerings, and when their anger is removed they withdraw the calamities before inflicted. The isanusi are the only recognised priests for conducting these sacrificial processes. Sometimes, indeed, smaller offerings may be presented, and the ceremonies be conducted by the head man of the kraal; but this is only on a limited scale, and in relation to small matters. It will therefore be self-evident that their priests acquire great power and influence over them. No sooner does sickness or death visit a family, or kraal, murrain spread among the cattle, drought prevail, or war threaten, than these terror-stricken ones—having no God of mercy to whom they can fly, and dreading the worst consequences—send for the isanusi, who, upon his arrival, makes very minute inquiries into the state and circumstances of the individual or family; the previous prognostics, what signs, omens, have appeared; how they were treated, what followed, &c.; the whole being attended by many mysterious signs and careful investigations. At length he declares that the spirit of some particular chief or chiefs is angry, and must be appeased by sacrifice. The sacrificial feast is called for—probably of some particular colour, but always the best, as an imperfect one would vitiate the offering. If the poor deluded creatures have only one beast in the world, they will give it on this occasion; if they have not one, they will seek to obtain one from their friends; if they fail here, they will work, or try other methods, until they succeed. The beast being brought, the priest addresses the isituta, confessing the sins of the individual, or family, or kraal, over the head of the victim about to be sacrificed. The actual affronts offered, or the wilful neglects committed, are fully and freely acknowledged, and the deserved wrath of the isituta admitted. A prayer is offered that the beast now to be sacrificed may be accepted, the wrath of the offended spirits turned aside, the calamities removed, and peace and prosperity bestowed; the parties concerned being intensely engaged in uniting with the isanusi in the confessions and prayers. This being concluded, the beast is killed according to certain prescribed rules; every drop of blood is caught and carefully preserved in bowls; a particular hut or house is sacredly cleaned and set apart, in which the flesh is deposited with great ceremony; the blood in the bowls being also placed in situations specified. The wicker-work door of the hut is then carefully closed, and watchers stationed to guard the whole through the night, so that nothing may occur to mar the sacrifice or disturb the isituta, who are supposed, during the night, to drink in the savour of the sacrifice, not in the form of blood, but in the fine serum, "ububendi," which issues from the flesh. The ordinary flesh or blood would be too gross for these etherial beings; besides, fraud, and the credit of the isanusi is preserved. Early on the following morning the isanusi opens the door of the hut with great care and many charms, examines the sacrifice amidst mysterious ceremony, and delivers his report accordingly. After this the sacrifice is cooked and eaten. Not unfrequently favourable results follow; the more so, as the priest generally exercises his medical skill in the use of bitter herbs or other ingredients which possess good medicinal qualities. Besides this, in case of sickness, the nerves which have so much to do with the health or sickness of the individual, are quieted, the nervous system acquires tone, confidence is inspired in the invalid, whilst conscience, the great tormentor, is pacified; all tending to bring about the desired result. This is the nearest approach to patriarchal sacrifices I have met with among the Kaffir races.

THE HALF-WAY HOUSE.

CRIMSON and purple, velvet and silk,
Boys in surplices white as milk,
Mighty cylindrical candles of wax,
Great gold crosses on clerical backs,
Pot of incense that smokes and swings—

These are the things; aye, these are things,
That please the hearts of the ladies:
And so they come, a charming throng,
When the bell of St. Alban's goes ding-dong,
And the chants are loud and the prayers are long,
And colour and odour, music and song,
Have barred the way to Hades.

A capital way your sins to cancel:—
Kneel at the gates of the gorgeous chancel!
Sniff the incense the air that swims on!
Gladden your eyes with purple and crimson!
Make the road towards Rome your path habitual!
Stick to the ritual! Stick to the ritual!
Then 'tis, "Come to Confession, Maud, my dear!
Your pet peccadilloes we like to hear,
Our discipline is not too severe
For we're only High Church parsons here,
And not the Pope's lieutenants.
"So if to mamma you've been sullen and pert,
Or a little too much have chosen to flirt,
Confession's the thing all ill to avert,
And depend upon it, you shall not be hurt,
By a very rigorous penance."

Echoes from the Clubs.

PAUL AT DAMASCUS.

THE name of the great Apostle of the Gentiles lingers still among the traditions of Damascus, and is familiar alike to Jews, Mohammedans, and Christians. The various places mentioned in the narrative of his conversion are shown to the pilgrim, and some of them are regarded with great veneration, such as the houses of Ananias and Judas; the street called "Straight," the spot where he was let down from the wall in a basket; and the scene of the conversion. The latter has been shifted within the last century. The monks have, for their own convenience, recently located it beside the Christian cemetery half a mile east of the city. But by a tradition at least as old as the time of the Crusades, it was fixed at a point on the great road to Jerusalem, about seven miles east of the city. I believe it highly probable that this tradition is accurate. The ancient road, after traversing the province of Iturea, and crossing the river Phaphar, ascends a gentle eminence between two low hills. Here the traveller from the south gets his first view of the noble plain of Damascus, and of the tapering minarets and swelling domes of the city rising up out of a sea of verdure; and here tradition locates the scene of the conversion. It is well chosen. I felt deeply impressed with it. True, there is nothing in the Scripture narrative to enable us to identify the scene. Luke simply says, "And as he journeyed, he came near Damascus, and suddenly there shined round about him a light from Heaven." Somewhere near the city—"near" in comparison with the long distance travelled—the event occurred. This spot answers well. And there is something in the thought that it was just when the city first burst upon his view, and when his fierce spirit was stirred up by the near prospect of crushing the supposed enemies of his faith, that he was smitten to the earth. The leading features of the landscape are the same to-day as they were then—the snow-capped cone of Hermon; the lonely, bleak ridge of Antilebanon; the rounded summit of Tiniyeh; the vast plain with its gorgeously-tinted foliage, and green cornfields; the little villages, embowered in orchards, and the walls and towers of the old city, rising up in the midst of this magnificent panorama, bright and beautiful as a vision of paradise. Then there is still the same cloudless sky, and the same "noon-day" sun pouring down a flood of light on city, plain, and mountains. And we have the same figures, too, giving life and animation to the scene—strings of camels laden with the wheat of Auranitis; Arab cavaliers from the desert, armed with sword and lance; peasants driving their yokes of oxen with sharp goads, which illustrate and may have originally suggested, the Lord's words to Paul, "It is hard for thee to kick against the goads." "At mid-day," as they approached the city, undoubtedly along this road, probably at this very spot, "suddenly there shone from heaven a great light; and the greatness of that light he can fully comprehend who has seen a Syrian sun shining in his strength at noon-day, and who hears that it was "above the brightness of the sun." Divine power and divine grace came at once upon Saul the persecutor, and transformed him into Paul the devoted missionary. This was one of the most momentous events of church history. The fiery zeal of Saul was not extinguished; it was sanctified. Saul the missionary retained all his former energy, and boldness, and determination. In Damascus he first preached "Christ crucified;" then in Arabia, in Antioch, in Asia Minor, in Greece, and in Rome. As a missionary, a writer, and a controversialist, he had no equal even among the apostles. Had Damascus no other claim upon us, the fact of its being the scene of Paul's conversion would enshrine it for ever in the memory of the Christian.

CHURCH CURIOSITIES.—VI.

BITS FROM TWENTY YEARS' EXPERIENCE.

THE Rev. Hugh Stowell Brown, a short time since, gave a lecture on "Twenty Years in Liverpool," some portions of which may certainly come among Church curiosities.

Referring to the Sunday afternoon services which he gave for several years to the working classes, he said that while engaged in these services he had received many letters—some of thanks, some of complaint. Now a request was made to him that he should lecture on the "Mind, Soul, and Body-destroying effects of Tobacco," and now an earnest desire that he should warn his hearers on no account to have anything to do with the municipal elections. One wrote to say that he had been unfortunate in business, and hoped Mr. Brown would make a collection for him the next Sunday afternoon. Another had a great desire to hear Mr. Brown, but wished to know whether he was a total abstainer, because he could not conscientiously listen to any public speaker who "touched, tasted, or handled liquid fire, and distilled damnation." Sometimes (said Mr. Brown) I was complimented. One good lady told me to my face, and told me (good old soul!) in the strong belief that she was saying something much to my praise, that my lectures were so successful just because I was not a classical man. "You would not do half so much good," said she, "if you used better language." Another result of the lectures was the alarming reputation which he obtained for philanthropy. One man wrote for help on this singular ground,—“Sir, feeling assured that you are a lover of your species.” Another had heard him lecture on the Good Samaritan. Now this correspondent wished to go to America, and he said that he had no money, that it was much more comfortable to go by a steamer than by a sailing vessel, that the passage would be £15, that Mr. Brown could send the amount by post-office order, and that if it were not sent by the next Friday the applicant would consider him "as big a humbug as the priest in the parable who passed by on the other side." Mr. Brown said that feeling these lectures were more than, with his other work, he ought to undertake, he discontinued them; whereupon one of his hearers wrote that "it was all confounded nonsense for me to pretend that I had not time, because everybody knew perfectly well that I had nothing else to do. I was just like other hirelings. He had thought that I was something better, but now he saw very plainly that I was a greedy, self-seeking hireling, like all the rest of my cloth."

Mr. Brown gave some amusing instances of the begging imposters he had met with. Many English beggars, not a few Welsh ones, just now and then a Scotch one, but an overwhelming proportion of Irish ones, had appealed to his "honour's" or his "riverence's" liberality. He was sorry to say that of the professedly converted Roman Catholics and Jews whom he had seen he could give a very poor account. Nine out of ten, at least, had proved to be unprincipled vagabonds. One in particular, calling himself a converted Roman Catholic, Mr. Brown had detected in a barefaced lie. The excuse was that in the Romish Church he had been taught that lying was no sin; and that, as he was a new convert, much regard for truth could hardly be expected from him. It was not a bad specimen of what is called "blarney" when an Irishman, who was very "hard up," begged Mr. Brown to give him some old clothes, that he might come and hear "your riverence's most heavenly and glorious discourses." This, by the way, was the man who asked help, as he was unable to work in consequence of his having "a spinal complaint in the back." Another wrote to say that the Scripture moved him, in sundry places, to confess his manifold sins and wickedness to "your blessed riverence," and subscribed himself "your riverence's most humble, lowly, penitent, and obedient sinner." Mr. Brown had often been applied to for help; to the credit of human nature, he had been offered it too. For example, a celebrated maker of pills and ointment had offered to supply him with any quantity at half price, for the poor of his congregation. He mentioned that he had also had to meet with half-mad people and people altogether mad. One wrote to say that he had authority to offer him a kingdom, which he had offered both to Dr. McNeile and to Dr. Raffles, who, foolishly standing in their own light, had refused it. He had been addressed by a person calling herself the "Empress of the Universe," who said she was in extreme poverty and would be glad to have a collection made for her in the chapel. Another strange person wrote as a prophet: "Sir—Many whom I have rebuked have been cut off; and I warn you that if you do not preach the Gospel more faithfully I will have you cut off also." Mr.

Brown said he had met with at least half-a-dozen poor creatures, each of whom stoutly maintained that he was the Saviour of the world; and one of them, in particular, was prepared to go and swear before any magistrate that it was he who had been crucified on Calvary, and that he was now immortal.

INTELLIGENCE.

DUDLEY.—The congregation had a very crowded and successful social meeting on Thursday evening, March 5. After tea and the singing of a hymn, the chair was taken by Mr. Grainger, a magistrate of the borough, greatly respected alike by the congregation and the people of Dudley. He delivered an interesting opening address, dwelling chiefly on the subject of Unitarian Christianity. He had not been always a Unitarian himself, and he felt particularly the cheering and comforting powers of its views of God's Fatherly character. The various addresses were interspersed with music, instrumental and vocal, which added greatly to the enjoyment of the evening. Mr. Thompson proposed prosperity to the congregation, and spoke of its improved condition, of the benefits of such social meetings, and also of the probability of the chapel ere long being made more attractive by alterations, and thus that still greater improvement might take place. We may mention that last year Mr. W. C. Wood, on the day before his death, gave £400 chiefly for repairing the chapel and putting up a new organ. The Rev. M. Gibson gave, "success to the three schools in connection with the congregation," in which 375 children are receiving daily gratuitous instruction, and 90 of them are clothed out of the funds of the charities. The oldest school, for boys, he mentioned, has been in existence for 136 years, and bears the name of its founders—Baylies. The other two for boys and girls bear the name of Parsons. They were established in 1865, by a sum of money left for that purpose. The girls' school had been previously carried on by the congregation for 79 years, being supported entirely by voluntary contributions, which only ceased when they were no longer required, the other funds having become available which were left by the member of the congregation mentioned. The two masters, Messrs. Ridgway and McIlwrath, responded. The various speakers in addition to those already named were Messrs. Wadeley, Wilkinson, Smith, Whyte, and Phillips.

MAIDSTONE.—On Sunday evening last, the Rev. R. E. B. Maclellan concluded a course of seven lectures on the Revelation of John; a subject not often discussed in Unitarian pulpits. Taking the clue of interpretation from the writer's frequent assertion that he spoke of "things which must shortly come to pass," i.e., of things which he expected to occur, either in his own generation, or in that immediately succeeding, the lecturer expounded the greater portion of what are generally regarded as the prophetic parts of the book, as referring to the then imminent conquest of Judaea by the Romans, and to the confident expectations entertained by the Seer (which, however, were not realised), of the immediate overthrow of Pagan Rome. Inquiries into the date and authorship of the work were not omitted. While its claims to be received as a prophecy were shown to be untenable, high praise was bestowed on it as a religious poem; and while its ascriptions of vindictiveness to God and His Christ were reprobated, the, in other respects, high moral and religious teaching which it includes was cheerfully admitted. An unusual number of strangers attended the course throughout.

MANCHESTER.—On Wednesday evening last, the fourth annual meeting of the Lower Mosley-street Congregational Society was held in the Girls' Schoolroom. There were about 130 present, and, after tea, the Rev. James Drummond, B.A., presided. The annual report was read by the chairman, from which it appeared that in 1867 upwards of 6,000 tracts had been distributed by visitors, and 22 new members added to the roll. Mr. Jesse Pilcher read the treasurer's report, showing the receipts to be upwards of £18, and a balance in hand £7. On the motion of Dr. Marcus, seconded by the Rev. D. Gordon (formerly of Banbridge, county Down), the report and treasurer's account were passed, and ordered to be printed. The officers for the ensuing year were appointed, on the motion of the Rev. W. H. Herford, B.A., seconded by Mr. Richard Wade. The list of visitors was moved by Mr. J. Reynolds, and carried. In the course of the proceedings it was stated that a resolution had been received from the annual meeting of seatholders of Cross-street Chapel, expressing approval of the augmentation of the evening congregation at Cross-street, which the society had chiefly caused, and announcing that the seats in the chapel were perfectly free in the evening. It was also stated that the seats were free in the evening at Upper Brook-street Chapel. Towards the close of the meeting, the cards of membership were distributed to the new members.

SALISBURY AND CALNE.

To the Editors.—The fortunes, or rather fates, of many of the old Presbyterian chapels connected with our body would form a strange history. If it were only from antiquarian interest, it would be well to collect what information is possible to be gleaned of these ancient foundations. May there not be discovered also, some instances in which neglect may be atoned for, and the wrong be righted?

These thoughts have occurred in connection with some information received respecting an old Unitarian chapel at Salisbury. My informant states that the last Unitarian trustee died without having appointed a successor, and that the chapel has since, now for many years, been in the hands of the Wesleyan Methodists, who use it for their Sunday schools, while their minister dwells in its ancient parsonage. Can any of your readers confirm, amend, or add other particulars to this statement?

Can any of your readers, also, give any information respecting the old Unitarian chapel at Calne? I understand that this chapel, being much out of repair, and the Unitarians of the neighbourhood being not willing or not able to restore it, some years since it was let by a trustee to the Primitive Methodists, who undertook the requisite repairs. Is this a true statement? and how does the chapel trust now stand? and what is the name and address of the trustee? While building new chapels, we must not forget the ancient foundations. Yours truly,

GOODWYN BARMEY.

A RAINY SUNDAY.

To the Editors.—The missionary collections of last Sunday must certainly have been affected by the stormy weather, more especially in country chapels. Now it is surely a pity that the action of our various associations should be crippled for the next twelve months merely because the 8th of March happens to be a wet day. May I suggest that if our ministers would announce their readiness to receive and transmit the contributions of those who could not attend the services on Sunday, many would gladly avail themselves of the offer, and the mission funds for the year might be substantially increased.—Yours, &c., Ainsworth, March 10, 1868. J. T. WHITEHEAD.

STOKE NEWINGTON GREEN.

Dear Sir—When your late minister, the Rev. William S. Barringer, left the orthodox community in which, with great acceptance, he had long served, and moved by conscientious convictions, came amongst us, taking the charge of the church at Stoke Newington, we naturally hoped that he would be spared for a longer period of usefulness. In the few years that have since elapsed, he had but few opportunities of becoming widely known in our body. I am, therefore, only discharging what devolves upon me as a neighbourly duty in recommending, as I earnestly do, to the sympathy of our friends, not in Islington alone, but generally, the effort which you are making on behalf of his widow and children.

The hearty kindness which was so universally manifested throughout the Unitarian body in response to a similar, though more urgent, appeal, last year, encourages me to believe that the widow of my late ministerial friend and neighbour, herself the daughter of a Unitarian minister, left so early with two very young children, and altogether without means, will not want for the help which charitable friends are now asked to give. Your own congregation having already so well opened the list of contributors, I think that you would be doing a wrong towards the humane and Christian feelings of those who believe, as we do, that "pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is, to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction," if you neglected to afford them this opportunity of doing manifest good.—Very sincerely yours,
HENRY PRICSTON, Unity Church, Islington.

LONDON, 16th March, 1868.

MANCHESTER DOMESTIC MISSIONS.—ROCHDALE ROAD CHAPEL.

In the late severe storms the wall of an adjoining manufactory, which had been left standing after a fire, was blown down, and in its fall destroyed the outbuildings, heating apparatus, &c., of the Rochdale Road Chapel.

The Committee are obliged to ask for help towards Rebuilding the premises destroyed; and as the Schools have for some time past been in Want of Proper Class Rooms, avail themselves of this opportunity of erecting them on the ground where the former offices stood, and where the useful accommodation can be obtained for about £100. The street which runs behind the Chapel has to be paved, and this will require an outlay of £30. Nearly £150, therefore, is needed, towards which it is intended to devote the £40 which was given so generously by the Strangeways Sewing School, and also £10 contributed by Mr. Berry, the owner of the adjoining manufactory. £100 will, therefore, have to be raised by voluntary gifts, and the Committee trust that the liberal donations of the supporters of the truly Christian work of the Missions will speedily provide the Funds required.

ARDWICK AND ANCOATS KITCHEN FOR THE SICK.

MISS J. B. GASKELL tenders her sincere thanks to the various friends who have contributed to free the Kitchen from debt. At the same time she would venture respectfully to ask their aid in obtaining for the Institution additional Annual Subscriptions, so that it may not run the risk of again falling into difficulties, but be placed on a permanent footing. The names of the subscribers will be extended by Messrs. HEYWOOD BROTHERS, by Mr. PHILLIPS at the Herald office, or by Miss J. B. GASKELL, 84, Plymouth Grove.

Letter from the Rev. J. R. BEARD, D.D.

"This Free Christian Church has from the beginning put into play an earnest spirit of combined zeal and charity, which has naturally led to satisfactory results. It is really a working Church—a Church which not only assembles to hear and learn the Gospel, but goes home to observe it, and goes abroad in its own neighbourhood to recommend and spread it. I should be glad to hear of its having been successful in its present effort to raise a sum of money by means of a bazaar."

THOMAS PARGETER, OF FOXCOTE, CHARITY.

THE Trustees acting under the Will of the late Miss PARGETER, of Foxcote, in the county of Worcester, and being the Unitarian Ministers officiating at Netherland, Stourbridge, Birmingham, Wolverhampton, Dudley, Kidderminster, Oldbury, Coleley, and Kingswood, hereby give notice, that they are prepared to receive APPLICATIONS for ANNUITIES, out of certain Funds bequeathed to them by the said Will, in accordance with the Scheme approved by the High Court of Chancery, whereby the said Trustees are directed to apply the Income of the said Fund—

For and towards the better maintenance and support of deserving Women, never having been married, of the age of 55 years and upwards by paying to so many of them as the income will admit £20 a year each, by quarterly payments during their lives. But in case of two or more Sisters being annuitants at the same time, the amount to each to be £15 a year only.

The Trustees, in selecting the annuitants, will have regard to the position of gentleness, seeking, and qualified to devote the benefit of the said Charity, must apply according to a Form, which will be furnished on application to the Secretary, 32, Waterloo-street, Birmingham, and such Form, when duly filled up, must be returned to him (free of postage) before the 3rd day of April next.

By order of the Trustees.

CHARLES HARDING, Secretary.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

It is stated that great anxiety has been occasioned at Rome by the Pope having had several severe epileptic fits, to which he was subject in his youth, but from which he has not suffered for many years. Perhaps the state of his health may in some measure account for the bursts of passion to which His Holiness of late is said to have given way. He is accused of having killed Monsignor de Witten by publicly calling him a barbarian. General Kanzler has been severely wounded by a similar rebuke, and the other ministers are so afraid of being scolded that, whenever circumstances permit, they transact their business with the Holy Father through their deputies, on the plea that they are too ill to attend.

The French prelates have been holding a conference, presided over by the Archbishop of Paris, to decide how a confessor should deal with any one refusing to conform to the Pope's famous Encyclical of 1864. This, as our readers will recollect, contained wholesale condemnations of what were styled modern heresies; such, for instance, as the liberty of the press, and freedom of religion. The decision arrived at by the conference was that the decrees of the Pope must be held supreme, and that to those who oppose them absolutism must be denied. The following, among other resolutions, show the state of thralldom into which it is determined to reduce French Catholics:

"The confessor has the right to require his penitent to submit to the decisions of the Church, even though they contradict his own opinions. 2. Therefore, he has the right to require him to condemn the absolute and unlimited liberty of the press and of religion."

The progressive Brahmos, of Calcutta, have celebrated their 38th anniversary by walking in procession to the site of the new Brahmo Church, singing hymns composed for the occasion. Flags, with appropriate Sanscrit texts, were borne by the members. After appropriate ceremonies and prayers the foundation stone of the new Brahmo Church was laid. They met in the evening, when Baboo Keshub Chunder Sen delivered a quasi-Christian address, and the hymn was sung—"Blessed be the tie that binds." The Viceroy, Drs. Macleod, Watson, and Mitchell were present.

Mr. Macrorie, who was selected to be the rival Bishop to Dr. Colenso in Natal, advertises for a curate for the Old Church, Acerington; from which it may be inferred that he has, for the present at all events, abandoned the intention of giving up his incumbency.

At a meeting of the Friends in London, the other day, many complaints were made of the intemperance prevailing in their denomination. Among cases referred to, Mr. Jonathan Grubb mentioned a visit he had paid to a father and mother (one a member of the Friends' Society), who, through intemperance, had wasted more than £30,000, and had reduced themselves to the condition of living in poverty in a single room, and worse still, had driven their children from their home, the father having actually, in a fit of intoxication, chased his daughter with a loaded pistol!

We regret to announce that Dr. Robert Lee, minister of the Old Greyfriars Church, Edinburgh, and one of the Queen's chaplains for Scotland, died at Torquay on Saturday. He was the leader of the movement for introducing a liturgy into the Scottish Established Church, and was well known for his exertions in trying to liberalise it, and had the reputation of being far from orthodox in his opinions. His death renders vacant the Professorship of Biblical Criticism in the University of Edinburgh.

Mackey, one of the lecturers of "The Evangelical Mission and Protestant Electoral Union," was convicted on Saturday at the Manchester assizes of shooting at a police constable during a riot at Rochdale, which had taken place in consequence of a lecture which was announced to be given against Popery, and he was sentenced, to the evident astonishment of himself and his friends, to sixteen months' imprisonment with hard labour. Notwithstanding this, the notorious Murphy caused another riot in the same town that day, in which there was pistol-firing, and windows and doors were broken, but fortunately no one was killed. The foolish fellow has since been apprehended under a magistrate's warrant, and locked up.

It has been the custom for some years past for the Committee of the Liberation Society and of the Dissenting Deputies, jointly to invite their parliamentary friends and their metropolitan supporters to a breakfast, and afterwards to interchange opinions on the leading ecclesiastical questions of the day. The meeting for this year was held last week, when there was a large and most influential gathering, including about a dozen members of the House of Commons. After Mr. Edwards, the chairman, had congratulated the friends of religious equality on the great progress which their cause had recently made, Mr. Harcastle, M.P., said, unless something for which he was altogether unprepared took place, the church rate question might be regarded as set at rest. Mr. Miall, in speaking on the University question, said, when they remembered that it was only a few years since Mr. Heywood had so much difficulty in persuading the House of Commons to admit Dissenters at all into these seats of learning, he thought their progress in this matter had been as great as in any other, and stated the nature of the measures respecting University Reform which were before the House of Commons. Mr. A. O. Rutson, of Magdalen College, Oxford, spoke at some length in favour of the measure for opening the Universities to the middle classes, and was followed by Mr. James Heywood, who enlarged on the necessity of a conscience clause in all colleges and public schools. A long and animated debate then took place on the Irish Church question, in the course of which some severe comments were made on Mr. Bright's plan for settling it, and Mr. Baxter stated that Earl Russell had come to the conclusion that the scheme which he had proposed would not work, and added that he believed that the Liberal party would act well together in favour of total disendowment.

Dean Ramsay, of Edinburgh, recommends that a national statute should be erected to the memory of Dr. Chalmers, and that a sub-committee should be appointed for the purpose. He would have the movement gone about in such a manner as to represent all classes and sections of the community.

It was stated the other day at one of the Free Church Presbyteries, that the contributions to the Sustentation Fund during the nine months ending February 15th, over the whole church, amounted to £90,163 against £85,083 during the same period in 1866, an increase of £5,080. Of this increase £310 was on donations. The amount available for the equal dividend was £79,742, an increase of £3,889, and with the increase on donations made £4,200.

The leading Nonconformist tutors and students at Cambridge have issued a circular, urgently calling upon Nonconformist ministers to exert themselves in favour of Mr. Coleridge's measure for the abolition of University Tests. They consider that previous bills of the same kind, introduced by Episcopalians, have not been adequately supported by Dissenters, and though the party for the abolition of tests grows yearly in strength, as the divisions of the House of Commons testify, they believe that the success of its proposals may be seriously impeded, unless Nonconformists now raise their voices in the assertion of their rights.

The Rev. G. S. Reaney has resigned the charge of the church at Silver-street Chapel, Taunton, owing, it is stated, to his finding the trust deed narrower and more Calvinistic than his convictions. The congregation has increased considerably under his ministry, though it extended over little more than twelve months, and his resignation was accepted with expressions of sincere sympathy and regret.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

A "Pan-Missionary" meeting, as it has been termed, was held in Calcutta to receive Dr. Norman Macleod and Dr. Watson, the Bishop in the chair. In an interesting speech, Dr. Macleod said, he regarded the meeting as a very remarkable illustration of the real union that existed amongst them all as Christian brethren. He could not forget—it was not easy to forget—that differences did exist between professed Christians, but they could not help such differences. He dared say that if any man were to ask him why he was a Presbyterian, he could not tell him; he might perhaps adopt the answer of Topsy, and say "I grewed" into it. He was never asked whether he would be a Scotchman or an Englishman. He found himself a Presbyterian because his father, himself a minister of the same church, had been a Presbyterian before him. And he for one had seen no reason to change his persuasion, for he believed that these differences, to some extent, would always exist. So long as men were born with different mental characteristics; so long as each man had his peculiar tastes and temperament; so long as each denomination had to deal with a great historical past; and so long as they saw through a glass darkly, those differences, he feared, must continue to exist. But still they might lessen the differences which there were at present. Mr. Stuart, in speaking of the Church of the future, had struck a chord in his (Dr. M.'s) heart. He did not profess to have a power of prophecy, or the gift of second sight, but he could not doubt that whoever came to India within the next half century—before this century is ended—would see something like what had been suggested by his reverend friend, not a native church, but the church of India—the Indian church, the church which will not reproduce in India all these various forms and stereotyped arrangements which have come to us from the past—from the realm of history, and have been accepted by us not so much as our choice as a necessity that we could not help. That church, reflecting all that was excellent in the present church, should yet exhibit a newness of life and individuality of its own, for it would seem to him to be putting back the hands of time if the church of India was to be merely a reproduction of a mission house, or of a tabernacle, or even of a cathedral. On the plains of Bengal they might select the goodly stones from all our European churches, and rear some temple worthy of the future—a church in which would be gathered men with minds so marvellously gifted as those of the subtle Bengali and the strong man of the North, with the devotion manifested in the ascetics of Benares, and a thousand other forms, whose zeal would be devoted to Christ instead of being wasted in the service of Satan.

Bishop Dupanloup has published another letter on the "Higher Education of Women," in which he reaffirms his former position, and produces strong expressions of approval from about fifty prelates. That position was, it will be remembered, that he is in favour of the higher education of women, but does not want anybody but priests to superintend it. He says that in Paris, if the girls attend the lectures of the professors at the Sorbonne, they will be seen by the students of the Quartier Latin; if in the country towns they go for a similar purpose to the Marie, they will be seen by the pompier (firemen); result—danger to modesty. He is, however, willing to have lectures delivered by professors in girls' schools, because then the professor is under the eye of the female teacher of the schools, and we know under whose eye the female teacher is. She prescribes, it appears, the subjects, and even the books, for the professor. In her absence, or if she is neglectful, which sometimes happens, says the Bishop, why a professor has been known to read prayers standing, and to play with his papers and du t the table-cloth while he was doing it. Another actually selected "personal poetry" as his subject and Voltaire as his model, and another spoke to the girls on Rabelais! The Bishop says, also, that girls who attend lectures in public will be "trained up in vanity," whereas, trained in private under the clerical superintendence, French women—girls, wives, and mothers—are "a type of purity, piety, and good sense such as no other people in the world possess." Unhappily, Frenchmen in general do not think so. The best Frenchmen agree with foreigners in considering the French "jeune fille" a very unsatisfactory person—a type which France would be the better of losing, and the Liberal press accordingly warmly applauds the ministerial plan of education, and wants to have the "girls, wives, and mothers" get their higher education from somebody else than the priests.

The Pall Mall thus refers to an assumption made by Mr. Bright, in his speech on the Irish question: "We find discreet clergymen speaking vaguely of 'the Psalmist,' where they used invariably to speak of 'David,' or to employ some recognised synonym for him. Mr. Bright, on the other hand, quoting from the 112th Psalm, called the author the 'inspired king and bard and prophet,' and told the gentlemen who sat round him that they might take the words as the utterance of a prophecy. Without wishing for a moment to question the essential and literal truth of the words quoted ('to the upright there ariseth light in the darkness'), it does seem only fair to say that not even the hand that inserted the 'inscriptions' claims the 112th Psalm for the Royal Poet, whose name is given by some versions, and apparently by some orators, to the whole of the five books of the Psalms. Ewald puts this Psalm as late as the very close of the Psalter, long after the return from the Babylonish captivity. But then, to be sure, Ewald is only a German critic."

Taking the opinions of the Inquirer regarding the connection of Church and State as representing those of our denomination generally, the English Independent "quite expects the Unitarians to be of one mind with Dean Stanley" in his scheme for a National Church. We may say for ourselves, and we believe we might do so for the majority of our co-religionists, that, like the Independent, we are opposed to "the retention of Churches which look to Sovereigns, Parliaments, and Judges to settle their doctrine and discipline."

A correspondent of the Christian World mentions a plan which had been found successful in the Sunday school with which he is connected, as affording an antidote to injurious amusements. He says:—

"The scholars were challenged, during the month of August last, to prepare for an exhibition of what could be done by them before the end of the year in preparation of models, drawings, needlework, penmanship, &c., prizes being offered for such specimens as should show the most ingenuity and skill on their production, in anticipation of the last day of the year. About one hundred articles were sent in by the children, all competitors being under eighteen years of age. A commission was deputed to adjudicate and to publish a list of the articles most worthy of commendation; the last was performed amid perplexities of no ordinary character. Models worthy of 1st and 2nd prizes and of honourable mention were selected, one a model of the school on a large scale, another a brig fully rigged, a third, a modern villa, which attracted much attention, the whole of the exterior being covered with halves of cherry stones polished; a fourth was a lithographic press, with stones complete. The usual descriptions of needlework, which form the prominent feature upon bazaar counters, were well represented in plain needlework, slippers, book-markers, &c., and some very fair drawings, showing that boys and girls alike took an interest in the contest for reward and honour. The writing of portions of Scriptures and the Eleventh Commandment was executed with varied success. The rewards given were principally in books."

In a letter to Dean Ramsay concerning the old Episcopal churches of the Western Highlands, the Bishop of Argyll relates several good anecdotes. His Lordship was lately compelled to remove from a church in his diocese one of the National Society's illuminated texts, "Drink, and let the camels drink also." This oddly selected text was no doubt intended for the inculcation of kindness to the lower animals; but in Argyllshire, where English is a foreign language, it was calculated to have quite another effect, telling the people to drink (which they are only too ready to do), and also to let their old enemies (the Cam'ells) on the other side of the hill refresh themselves in the same way. When the late Bishop of London visited the Church at Appin, along with Dr. Ewing, they were met by a deputation with old Kenneth at its head. Kenneth's command of English was not great, and his welcome ran thus, "I am proud to see here such ancient heroes." He meant to call them venerable. Bishop Blomfield afterwards remarked to his companion that the Highlandman's address made him feel as if he were indeed a very old man. A very curious illustration of the superstition which still lingers in his diocese is given by Bishop Ewing. He was driving some years ago on the shores of Locheranan after a confirmation, and came to a small inn where he could not get corn for his horses. "Duncan," inquired the Bishop of his servant, "why cannot you get corn?" He replied, "The man's a Free Kirk, and he winna get it." The Bishop insisted that corn must be got, for they were going far; and Duncan said he would try, and by-and-bye he did get the corn. When they were supplied and had resumed their journey, Duncan was asked how he had contrived to make the Free Kirk landlord give what at first he had refused. "You see, I just said to him it was na' safe to defy a Bishop, for, said I, they can change things into ither things, and maybe he'd make you into a beast; and so I got the corn." Bishop Ewing thinks this may be a relic of the medieval doctrine of the Sacraments—a remnant of a moral and mental pest; and, if it be so, it is all the more curious to find it keeping such a vital hold of even a Free Kirk Presbyterian.

In the debate on Monday night, Mr. Gladstone came out much more clearly and decidedly upon the subject of the Irish Church than we ventured to expect. As the Daily News says:

"In a noble speech, marked not only by the loftiest eloquence, but impressed with the highest morality of statesmanship, Mr. Gladstone, reflecting the practically unanimous opinion of his party, declared that the time has come when the Irish Church, as a State Church, must cease to exist. Religious equality must henceforth be the rule in Ireland, and it can be realised only in one way. Endowments are no longer possible. The only course open to policy is that prescribed by justice—the process of dis-establishment. Mr. Gladstone announced that a proposition embodying this view will, in due course, be submitted to the House of Commons, which will be called upon to declare its opinion in regard to it."

And all true Nonconformists, we feel sure, will carefully mark the kind of treatment which it receives from their own representatives.

"The sudden ripening" of Mr. Gladstone's opinion, the Times observes, "Must plainly carry with it the support of a large number, if not the whole, of those who have been connected with him by party ties. It is not too much to say that the sound has accordingly gone forth for the destruction of the Irish Establishment, however its disendowment may be delayed. 'The last relic of evil days' is not merely doomed, it is marked to fall."

In a notice of Mr. Skeats' "History of the Free Churches of England," the Pall Mall has the following:—

"About 1770 Dissent had renewed its forces and sought to extend its civil liberties. This Mr. Skeats seems to attribute in great measure to the spiritual invigoration caused by Methodism; but we incline to think, on his own showing, that it was more decisively owing to the influence of the Unitarians, a sect which had in a sudden and remarkable manner risen to prominence, extinguishing utterly the old historical Presbyterianism, but not exhibiting much affinity for the theosophies of election and grace which divided the counsels of the more 'orthodox' denominations. Having been at one time the most severely proscribed sect, so Unitarianism became the most pertinaciously aggressive when its numbers and culture gave it the consciousness of strength. It never spread very widely among the lower classes, but its principal professors have been distinguished by much scientific and literary skill."

REVIEW.

An Address at a Soirée of the Brighthouse Mechanics' Institution, Jan. 7, 1867. By the Rev. T. P. Kirkman, M.A., F.R.S., Rector of Croft.

ABOUT two years ago we noticed an able lecture of Mr. Kirkman's on "Truth against Tradition," which, as coming from a clergyman, we described as remarkably bold and outspoken. The Address before us, which might be entitled "On Clerical Cursing," is equally so, and marked by the same liveliness and vigour. This, a few passages which are all that we can make room for this week, will be sufficient to show. Mr. Kirkman sets out with justifying himself in the choice of his subject, and claiming for theology a right to be introduced, as prima inter pares, where other sciences are honoured, whether in a Mechanics' Institute, or in the halls of more learned societies. When a scholar presents to these his thoughts on such subjects as the religion of the Brahmins, or the Magi, or the ancient Greeks, and makes his subject interesting, he is listened to and applauded.

"But if a divine offers the result of his studies in Christian theology, he is generally informed that it is against the rules of the society to admit the discussion of such topics. If he asks the reason why, he is politely assured that such subjects are considered too sacred to be freely handled, except where the audience comprises a sufficient number of divines and ladies of a serious turn of mind. Then some candid friend will privately show him, that the real reason why is this, that universal experience has proved that, outside the great verities of religion and morals which among good men admit of no doubt, not much like accurate thought, sound reasoning, or fair argument is to be expected from the lips of us theologians: that we are also considered to be dangerous commodities, many of us being so armed with sulphur that, if we encounter the slightest friction, we are all ablaze, with an odour of brimstone that is not agreeable to every one."

After honestly making the confession, that the theologies which have for centuries been the glory of the wrangling churches are "nearly all sham science, a wilderness of words without definite meaning," and expressing his belief that "the day is not far distant in which theology shall be allowed to throw off the absurd and repulsive dress by which priests and preachers have disfigured her," he justly says, "there is a pure and true theology, which is rich in the most attractive questions that can engage the human intellect."

"This true theology disdains the sarcastic compliment wherewith she is bowed out of the circles in which other portions of divine truth are studied, that her topics are too sacred to be freely handled. There is no science really more sacred than another; for there is nothing more sacred than truth. All the jewels, which science treasures up and compares, are holy of the holiest, ineffably holy. For all truth is God's truth: all truth is God's eternal thought."

Having used the words "quibbling and cursing, figments and unbelief," which he admits are rather strong, he asserts that, if he had the attention of his audience

"For an hour upon the quibbling of the orthodoxies, for another hour upon the cursing of the orthodoxies, for a third on the monstrous figments of the orthodoxies, and for a fourth upon the hardened unbelief of the orthodoxies," he could abundantly justify the use of such words. Among orthodox divines, he says, cursing and quibbling now-a-days generally go together. "Anciently it was not so. They were honest cursers—those fathers of the olden time: they meant just what they said." But now, though "the atrocious malediction" of the Athanasian Creed still rings through the schools and cloisters of the East and West,

"No man of sense and education believes really in his conscience and without a quibble, however forward he may be, reverend or right reverend, to maintain it in priestly pretention or shout it in sectarian strife, that this old church theory of damnation for misbelief or disbelief ever was, or ever will be, verified in the case of any one virtuous and sincere doubter."

For himself, he says:

"I have long taught my flock the plain truth, that if any man says or thinks that his virtuous and sincere neighbour is in any way under the divine displeasure, for honestly holding a certain opinion about the meaning or the truth or the importance of any proposition of that man's special theology, he who so thinks or speaks of his neighbour is always in the wrong, either morally or mentally. That thought is invariably either a sinful or a foolish thought. It rarely happens that any person dissents from such teaching, for it commends itself to every man's conscience in the sight of God. If, however, as is sometimes the case, the person addressed has learned enough of theology to assent with a sophistical reserve of this all-important question—'How am I to be sure that my heretical neighbour is sincere and honest in his views?'—I always scotch that serpent-quibble by asking, 'How is your virtuous neighbour to know that you are sincere? You have every proof of his sincerity, that he can possibly ever have of yours, namely, in his life and conversation.'"

He advises his hearers to "ask themselves boldly this return question," and "make this inward application, which does not often figure in orthodox sermons, of Christ's golden rule;" and if priest or preacher should bid them fling a curse or a charge of insincerity at their virtuous and thoughtful neighbour, because he will not confess that to be true which appears to him, after his best inspection to be untrue, he recommends them to reply, "I will not become an infidel about my God and my neighbour, in order that you may pat me for a believer."

These bits, even taken out of their connection, will serve to show how well and forcibly Mr. Kirkman spoke to his Yorkshire audience, at whose expense this Address is printed and circulated, and which can hardly fail to do something towards advancing the practical object which he had in view:

"First, that most desirable and before long certain result, the expulsion from our Protestant English Prayer-book of the so-called Athanasian Creed, and some other atrocities of both high and low-cursing from our Thirty-nine Articles; and secondly, a wish to indicate a position that can be strongly occupied, in the forthcoming struggle against the dragon of priestcraft and the Griffin of sectarianism, for a real and effective national system of education of the people of our shamefully-neglected country."

MISTRANSLATIONS IN THE AUTHORISED VERSION.—No. XXVI.

Ezekiel xxxiv. 10. "I will cause them to cease from feeding the flock." More correctly, "From being shepherds of the flock," because they neglected to feed them.

Ezekiel xxxviii. 3. "O Gog, the chief prince of Meshech and Tubal." More correctly, "O Gog, prince of Rosh (or the Russians), Meshech (or the Muscovites), and Tubal (or the Tibareni)," all of them tribes near the Caspian Sea.

Ezekiel xliii. 13. "The bottom shall be a cubit, and the breadth a cubit." More correctly, "The hollow (or drain to the altar) shall be a cubit deep and a cubit broad."

Ezekiel xliii. 15. "So the altar shall be four cubits." More correctly, "The Harel-platform," or Mount of God, which was one of the stages of the lofty altar that stood in front of the House of the Lord.

Ezekiel xliii. 16. "And the altar shall be twelve cubits long, twelve broad." More correctly, "The Ariel-altar," or hearth of God. It was on this platform that the offerings were burnt. It was raised four cubits above the platform mentioned in the former verse. In the Authorised Version, they are both called the altar. The four horns rise out of the corners of this latter, the Ariel-altar. The priests stood on the former, the Harel-platform, while they sacrificed.

Ezekiel xliii. 26. "Seven days shall they purge the altar." More correctly, "Make atonement for the altar," by burning the goat, the bullock, and the ram, as mentioned in verse 25.

Ezekiel xliv. 3. "The prince, he shall sit in it to eat bread before the Lord." More correctly, "He shall return through it," namely, the eastern gate. The prince spoken of is Zerubbabel.

Ezekiel xlv. 20. "For every one that erreth, and for him that is simple." More correctly, "For every one that sinneth in ignorance, and for him that hath been enticed." For those two classes of wrong-doers the priest was thought able to make atonement by his burnt offerings, but not for any one that sinned presumptuously. In other passages, the burnt offerings seem only available for those who sinned in ignorance.

Ezekiel xlv. 23. "There was a row of building round about in them." More correctly, "There was a cooking range round about in them." It is curious to note that the Hebrew word for a row or range, like our English word, means a cooking range.

Ezekiel xlvii. 14. "This land shall fall unto you for inheritance." More correctly, "Shall be divided by lot."

THE STORY OF THE IRISH STATE CHURCH.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Pall Mall Gazette thinks that the best reply which can be given to the arguments advanced in favour of the Church Establishment in Ireland is the following plain statement of facts:

For 700 years the Irish Church was Christian, but not Roman. The Bishops were obedient subjects, and the great body of the clergy useful ones. They acknowledged no temporal head but their native chiefs, nor any ecclesiastical superior beyond the limits of their respective sees. They were obstinate supporters of several dogmas stigmatised as heretical by the Latins; and they married, and gave in marriage, without the smallest scruple. But their crowning offence consisted in this: they were not High Churchmen. Indeed, so far were they from having a due sense of their sacred calling that they paid tax and tribute, performed military service, and cheerfully discharged all the other duties of good citizens. Nay, more; they submitted—grovelling creatures—like other people, without even a solitary protest, to the jurisdiction of the ordinary tribunals. This was bad; but they further aggravated all their faults by daring to send forth missionaries—so learned, so devoted, and so irreproachable in moral and motive that the unenlightened were in great danger of preferring a damning schism to orthodoxy itself.

This state of things was not to be endured, and the Popes protested, entreated, reviled, and excommunicated accordingly, but without much effect. At length, towards the close of the eleventh century, the brightening splendour of the Latin hierarchy began to dazzle the Hibernian prelates, and to teach them to hanker after similar vanities. The substantial privileges, lofty titles, and large revenues enjoyed by the clerical dignitaries of the neighbouring island became especially the objects of their admiration and desire. In 1074 the Northmen settled in Dublin took the first step towards submission to the Holy See by sending their Bishop elect, Patrick, to receive ordination at the hands of Lanfrance, the first Norman Primate of England. Thenceforward the progress Romewards of the higher ranks of the Irish clergy was rapid. In a few years more Gillibert, Bishop of Limerick, accepted the office of legate, and wrote a treatise in favour of Papal supremacy. Malichi, the next apostolic legate, died on the way to Rome, whither he was proceeding to receive the pallium. And, finally, a synod was convened at Kells, 1152, wherein the authority of the Pontiff was formally recognised; tithe, previously unknown in Ireland, imposed; the priest invested with all the privileges that pertained to his order; and the Irish branch of the Church reorganised according to the Roman system.

But ancient usage proved too strong for the Pope and his adherents. The laity would neither pay tithe nor respect clerical immunities; and the great body of the clergy showed no disposition to augment the revenues of their dioceses by those peculiar fines which, some centuries later, a German prelate boasted of having received from 11,000 priests within a single year. On the contrary, they persisted in preferring sons and daughters to those unique relations which the Church recognised as "nepotes." Indeed nothing but force could bend the stubborn Irish to the new order of things, and to force accordingly the Pope resorted. Nor was he long in coming to a decision, for in 1156 we find Adrian IV. closing the bargain which gave Ireland to the Normans in the following terms:—"Go, my dear son," says the bull of the Holy Father, "Go to Hibernia, reduce that island to order, eradicate vice therefrom, and secure henceforth to the Blessed Peter the yearly payment of one penny from every hearth within its precincts. Go in thy piety, most illustrious prince, do whatever it likes thee for the extension of religion and virtue, the honour of God, the salvation of souls, et salva beato Petro de singulis domibus annua unius denarii pensione." And fifteen years later Alexander III. confirmed the bargain in almost identical terms: "Provided," says the latter, "that that people of Hibernia, detestable as they are in life and manners, be reformed and made Christians, in fact as well as in name, and that the Church, which is to the full as rude and disorderly as the people, be brought to subordination, we hereby ratify the grant of our predecessor Adrian, reserving to ourselves the annual tribute of one penny due from every hearth to Holy Peter."

Thenceforward the conquerors and the superior clergy went hand in hand. The royal troops levied Peter's pence at the point of the sword, and the clergy denounced rebellion as heresy, and excommunicated the rebels and their aiders and abettors. Many of the priests went a little farther, declaring from the altar that it was no greater crime to slaughter an Irishman than to kill a dog, and occasionally illustrating their precepts by leading the massacre in person, and saying mass directly after with hands still red and reeking from the slaughter. Truly these clergymen of the Established Church were dear to the unfortunate Irish! "You burnt a church," said the enemies of a celebrated chief as the last worst charge they could bring against him. "Yes," was the blunt reply, "yes, I burnt the church; but," he added in excuse, "I thought the Bishop was inside."

For 400 years the conquerors enjured the Irish by the Pope. His grant was proclaimed anew at the commencement of each reign, and reiterated in the face of every frequent rebellion. It was at once the charter by which the Normans held their domains and the principal weapon with which they defended and extended them. "The Pope!" the phrase at last became a spell of matchless power in every quarter of the island. Nevertheless, the Reformation might have left Ireland as loyal as it left England, had the policy of Henry VIII. been maintained. To enable himself to cope with the tiara, that monarch endeavoured to subdue the rebellious spirit of the Irish by taking all the chiefs—native and Norman—into equal favour, and with such excellent effect that the son of Fitzpatrick, baron of Upper Ossory, having perpetrated sundry outrages, the young man was arrested, and delivered up to justice by his own father. But Henry, tyrant as he was, died far too soon for Ireland; not too soon, though, for the English adventurers. For years before the latter had noticed with regret the growing disposition of the Irish leaders to accept and make the best of the Conquest. They regarded the Reformation as a direct interposition of Providence in their favour, and the moment the terrible grandson of the terrible Edward was no more, they proceeded to wield it as a weapon for wresting their last acre from the grasp of the unfortunate Irish. Thenceforward, for many a long year, the rulers located at the castle occupied themselves, like Lapland witches, in raising ceaseless storms, that themselves and their clients might profit by the consequent ruin. There was a "Commissioner of Forfeiture" established in Dublin with an army of false witnesses in his pay, and the Reformation furnished occupation for them all. Reformation! Terms have often been misapplied, but seldom so glaringly as in this instance. It had been a chief boast of the reformers that prayers should henceforth be said "in a tongue understood of the people." But Ireland formed a trifling exception. There, a few towns aside, Irish was universally and exclusively spoken; and there it was enacted that the Liturgy should be read in English, or a suitable reader not being forthcoming, then in Latin. Many of the shames were purified for the new faith after the good example set by the English garrison of Athlone, who broke into the church at Clonmacnoise, destroyed the ornaments and defiled the altars. Nor were the priests better treated than the fanes. The dignified Churchmen, indeed, gave the Reformers little trouble, being alternately and very conveniently Protestant or Papist, according to the fashion set them by the Court, seventeen out of nineteen Irish Bishops finally giving in their adhesion to the Anglican creed as settled by Elizabeth. But not so the inferior clergy. These, however, were not worth argument, and none was wasted on them. Wherever authority extended they were thrust from their livings, and their places supplied by what an Anglican writer calls "the refuse of the English Church," such candidates as had been refused orders in England—a country not then too fastidious in these matters—being collected like recruits and hurried in batches across the Channel to act as spiritual pastors in Ireland. But these choice missionaries had their uses. They were not the men, indeed, to resist the general and shameless appropriation of Church lands, or to hamper the proceedings of the authorities by conscientious protest. But they were admirably qualified in all things for sowing far and wide, and rooting deep in Irish hearts abhorrence of Reformers and Reformation. Some of them, not daring to reside on their livings, abandoned their flocks to the priests, and remained in Dublin pestering the Government with endless petitions ament the horrid abuse of allowing their tithes to be diverted to the support of Popery. Meanwhile their more fortunate brethren indulged their flocks with a single sermon apiece in the year; took an oath to establish and maintain schools in their respective parishes, and—broke it; collected their revenues with the military at their backs; hunted up those who had incurred ecclesiastical censure by receiving the rites of the Church from unlawful hands, and confined them in their own private prisons; and conducted their families in such a way as to supply England with most of the desperadoes who distinguished themselves during the latter years of Charles II. by the manufacture of Popish plots.

To second the efforts of these missionaries the penal code was devised, but by no means at once. It took a long succession of legislators to improve that instrument of oppression into the elaborate perfection which it displayed towards the middle of the last century. And then, having done its part towards impoverishing and exasperating the native Irish, it was allowed to fall slowly into disuse previous to being as slowly, but far more reluctantly, broken up.

Such, as I read it, is the story of the Irish State Church—that Church so rich in pounds sterling and so poor in congregation, and whose victims count by tens of thousands, while its proselytes may average a dozen in the century. And such proselytes! I remember some years ago having several elderly persons pointed out to me in a certain Irish town as "guinea Protestants," that is to say, individuals who had, in their youth, received that sum and a pair of pantaloons (or a petticoat as the case might be), as inducements to change of faith. But a new creed is not always so easily put on as a nether garment, nor scruples so readily pocketed as coin; and so, in the course of a month, most of the converts had returned to tread the old path, but not until each offender had paid the priest twenty-one shillings for readmission to the rites of the Church.

THE GOVERNMENT'S IRISH POLICY.

THE debate inaugurated by Mr. MAGUIRE'S motion has had the effect of forcing from the Government something as nearly like a declaration of policy as could be reasonably expected. The one object which the present Government desire, with perfect singleness of mind, is the retention of power, but unfortunately they are not quite sure which is the best way of securing it. They are not, indeed—at least their leading spirit is not—troubled with any inconvenient principles of their own; but, then, neither are they quite clear as to the principles of the country generally, nor as to how far the country is disposed to insist upon them. Consequently their policy is of the mildest kind; as Mr. HORSMAN well said: "As to the Church, it is a policy of inaction; as to the land, it is a policy of procrastination; and as to education, it is a policy of retrogression." The thing which they would best like to do is to do nothing. A Royal Commission is their fertile expedient for staving off inconvenient crises. There are two Commissions at present at work in Ireland. When pressed as to what these were doing, one of the members of the Irish Church Commission explained that it had had two meetings, and had nearly, but not quite, appointed Lord STANHOPE as chairman! There would be more hope of some progress being made towards dealing effectually with these questions if Parliament in general was in earnest about them; but Parliament is not much more in earnest than the Government itself. It is but few of its members who have the capacity for dealing with the subject in a broad, statesmanlike way; it is still fewer who have the necessary courage and independence. The majority are hampered by all manner of party ties—afraid of the Church of England party in their boroughs, thinking the whole question a nuisance, quite as desirous as the Conservatives to do nothing that can possibly be helped.

It is evident, then, that whatever is to be done will have to proceed not from Parliament, but from the country. Especially will the deciding impulse rest with Nonconformists. From Churchmen, even from those who admit the grievous injustice of the present Irish Establishment, no strong action can be expected. To begin with, their minds are so saturated with a shiftless idea of religion depending upon State aid for support, that the proposal of any thorough action for throwing the Irish Church upon the support of its own members would seem to them equivalent to the overthrow of Protestantism. On the other hand, it is impossible to rely with perfect confidence on the assertion that the Irish Catholics repudiate the idea of State endowments. If they do, this will be only one more added to the many anomalies of that hierarchy whose boast it has been to be always and in all things the same. Their policy in every other country has been, by any possible means, to secure State recognition and endowment; and we own to considerable doubt as to whether their voluntarist fervour would be proof against any actual offer of endowments which would at once increase the incomes of the clergy and relieve the pockets of the laity. At any rate, their consistency is of that kind which will be immensely strengthened by finding that the whole Nonconformist feeling of England will go with them for absolute religious equality and independence for all churches, while dead against every form of State support for religion, and most of all opposed to the idea of tempering the destruction of an Established Church by the creation of three stipendiary ones. We hope that the Dissenters of England will not let there be any hesitation in their demand on this matter. We should have preferred, as we said some weeks ago, that in their advocacy of it the question should be narrowed to that of dis-establishment, and kept clear of the complicated problems arising out of the question of endowments. But the intention of all the various sections of do-nothings, from Belfast Orangemen, who have a very decided policy, to English Tories, who have not a policy, or timid Whigs, who wish they had not, is daily becoming more evident, to make the practical difficulty of dealing with the Church revenues an excuse for indefinite procrastination. It is necessary, then, upon this part of the question also, to speak out boldly. This tenth part of the whole rent of Ireland is simply and absolutely public property. Mr. MILL took unassailable ground when he enunciated this truth, adding, "I believe that this and the other House of Parliament and her Majesty are trustees of that property, coming as it does from Irish labour and land, for the benefit of the Irish people at large. I believe that property is scandalously misappropriated and misapplied when it is applied exclusively to the support of the religion of twelve persons out of every 100 of the inhabitants." If there were no good use to which Government, as the trustees of national property, could put it, better than let it remain as an excuse for inaction would it be to answer, as the Pall Mall Gazette suggests, in the words of the Apostle, "Thy money perish with thee." The question is not primarily one of money, and it certainly must not be allowed that the money question, which is only secondarily involved, shall be made the excuse for the perpetuation of a gross and intolerable injustice.

As to the monstrous proposition for the establishment of a Catholic University, we hope that it will be met—indeed it is already being met—by the utter repudiation of the country. It is too late to propose for Ireland, as a sop to the priestly love of domination which has already produced so much mischief, the revival and perpetuation of educational distinctions of which, even in England, thoughtful men are growing ashamed. What we must demand is the removal of all restrictions upon perfect religious equality in the University of Dublin. The greatest boon to Ireland in the past has been the system of mixed education. The Catholic laity have never been dissatisfied with it, and dissatisfaction among the priesthood alone is, on the face of it, rather an evidence of how well it is working. Mr. DISRAELI is very clever, but such a proposition as this is rather too clever even for him. He has shown his ability as a party educator; but it is one thing to educate the bewildered squirearchy to progress and quite another to educate the common sense of the whole country to such retrogression as this.

ANOTHER OFFENCE TAKEN OUT OF THE WAY.

We remember a gentleman once saying to a friend of ours, on his remarking "You seem to me fond of being in hot water," "Well, yes, I own that I am; and I like it pretty scalding too." Nearly all but those who have a somewhat similar taste must, we should think, be glad of the prospect which is now afforded, by the passing of Mr. GLADSTONE'S bill for the Abolition of Compulsory Church-rates, through the Commons, that the country will no longer be pestered by this irritating and vexatious impost, which for years has been the cause of so much litigation and ill-feeling. Of course, in country parishes there will still be some who, as did the elder MATTHEW'S venerator of the past on seeing the spot vacant where a turnpike had formerly stood, will be disposed to exclaim, "Ah, we are losing all our enjoyments now;" and some, who fancy you cannot remove a bit of moss which has gathered on the branches without endangering the tree, that will see in this just and prudent measure an injury done to religion; but the number of such is rapidly diminishing, and the friends of religious freedom and equality may well take encouragement from the contrast presented by the division-list of last week and that of six years ago. Of the three hundred who then "saved the Church," and were so loudly applauded for it, only thirty could be found to raise, in concert with Mr. HENLEY and Mr. NEWDEGATE, a last feeble protest against a measure which the former declared to be "a robbery," and which has over and over again been denounced as sure to bring down the Church, and jeopardise religion itself.

The main provision of the Act which was agreed to by the Commons on Tuesday night, and which, judging from the speeches of the Government, seems likely to pass through the Lords, is that "no Suit shall be instituted or Proceeding taken in any Ecclesiastical or other Court, or before any Justice or Magistrate, to enforce or compel the Payment of any Church-rate made in any Parish or Place in England or Wales," save where, at the time of the passing of the Act, money is due on the security of the rate. With this settlement of the matter we have reason to be satisfied, and both Churchmen and Nonconformists owe a debt of gratitude to Mr. GLADSTONE for having taken one more cause of offence out of the way.

FIRESIDE READINGS.

THE TEACHER'S DREAM.

THE weary teacher sat alone
While twilight gathered on,
And not a sound was heard around;
The boys and girls were gone.
The weary teacher sat alone;
Unnerved and pale was he,
And bitter thought and heart-ache wrought
This sad soliloquy:
"Another round, another round
Of labour thrown away;
Another chain of care and pain
Dragged through a cheerless day.
"I till a cold and barren field,
For weeks and months and years;
The seed I sow will never grow,
Though watered off with tears.
"Of no avail is patient toil:
Love's strength is spent in vain;
Can life endure a work so poor
In hope, or love, or gain?"
Thus speaking, on his oaken desk
The tired teacher bowed:
All discontent and spirit-spent,
He fain would weep aloud.
But raising soon his saddened face,
He started back aghast!
The room, by strange and sudden change,
Grew to proportions vast.
It seemed a senate hall, and one Addressed a listening throng:
Each burning word all bosoms stirred—
Applause rose loud and long.
The "wildered teacher thought he knew
The speaker's voice and look:
"And for his name," mused he—"the same
Is on my record-book."
Departed then the senate hall—
A church rose in its place:
A preacher there outpoured a prayer
Invoking Heaven's grace.
And though he spoke in solemn tone,
And though his hair was gray,
The teacher's thought was strangely wrought:
"I whipped that boy to-day."
The church was gone—a chamber dim
Was next obscurely shown;
There, 'mong his books, with earnest looks,
An author sat alone.
"My idlest lad," the teacher said,
Filled with a new surprise;
"Shall time behold his name enrolled Among the great and wise?"
Next, in a sun-lit studio,
In rapt, creative mood,
His canvas near, an artist seer
'Mong glowing pictures stood.
"Is this, indeed, a genius born?
In spite of all I say,
His slate he will with pictures fill,
But not with algebra."
Now, rising humbly to the view,
A cottage was descried:
A mother's face illumed the place
Her spirit sanctified.
"A miracle!" the teacher cried:
"This matron, well I know,
Was but a wild and careless child
Not half an hour ago;
And when she to her children speaks
Of duty's golden rule,
Her lips repeat, in accents sweet,
My words to her at school."
Another scene, a battle-field—
Angelic women move
'Mong wounds, and groans, and dying moans,
With wine, and balm, and love.
"Oh, little girls—oh, children mine
How well the lesson sped,
That, from the Word of Christ the Lord,
This morn with me you read."
The scene was changed again, and lo!
The schoolhouse, rude and old,
Upon the wall did darkness fall,
The evening air was cold.
"A dream!" the sleeper, wak'ning, said,
Then paced along the floor;
And whistling slow and soft and low,
He locked the schoolhouse door.
And walking home, his heart was full
Of peace and trust and love and praise,
And, singing slow and soft and low,
He murmured, "After many days."

FLOWERS FROM PERSIAN GARDENS.—II.

Upon the portico of the Court of Freedom was written: "The world, O my brother, abideth with no one! Fix thine heart on Him who created it: that is enough. Place not reliance or trust in the sovereignty of fortune, for many a one, like thyself, she has nurtured and destroyed. When the pure soul is on the point of departing, what matters it whether it be on a throne or on the bare ground?"

The tree which only just now has been planted, the strength of a man may tear from its place, but if for a time you leave it untouched, you will need a windlass to upheave it from its roots. You may stop the spring at its source with a bodkin, but the full stream you cannot ford on the back of an elephant.

O thou who art sated, to thee a barley-loaf will not seem sweet; that which to me appears lovely, is in thy sight a deformity. To the inhabitants of paradise, purgatory would be hell; as to the inhabitants of hell, they would tell you it is paradise.

With the strong arm and the power of the wrist, it is a crime to crush the palm of the helpless wretch. Let him live in fear who shows no mercy to the fallen, for if his foot should slip, no one will stretch out a hand to him.

Whoever has sown the seed of evil, and expects from it good fruit, has but an empty brain, and nourishes but a vain conceit.

Take the cotton out of thine ear, and distribute justice to the people, for if thou dealest not justly, surely there will be a day of judgment.

The sons of Adam are limbs of one another, for in their creation they are formed of one substance. When fortune brings affliction to a single member, not one of the rest remains without disturbance. Thou who art without sorrow for the misery of another, thou deservest not to be named a son of Adam.

If from the garden of the peasant the monarch take but a single apple, his servants would tear up the whole tree from its roots; and if the Sultan take but five eggs unjustly, his soldiers will spit a thousand fowls. The iniquitous tyrant remaineth only for a season, the curse upon him remaineth for ever.

LIVERPOOL DOMESTIC MISSION SOCIETY.

THE annual meeting of the supporters and friends of this society was held in the Mission-house, Beaufort-street, on Monday evening, March 2: the chair was occupied by the president, the Rev. JOHN HAMILTON THOM. Among those present were the Revs. Charles Beard, B.A., John Brunner, John Cuckson, Alexander Gordon, M.A., Thomas Jones, John Shannon, Charles Upton, B.A., B.Sc., Charles Wicksteed, B.A.; Lieut.-Colonel Trimble; Messrs. Geo. Melly, M.P., Thomas Avison, C. T. Bowring, H. A. Bright, M.A., Henry Gair, A. Higginson, Charles Holland, George Holt, Philip H. Holt, W. D. Holt, Henry Jevons, W. J. Lempert, T. E. Peget, Benson Rathbone, R. R. Rathbone, W. Rathbone, A. Thornely, J. Thornely, &c.

We wish we were able to give the full report of the addresses, but as it would occupy more space than it is possible for us to afford, we prefer, instead of a bare abstract of the whole proceedings, to give in full the admirable addresses of Rev. J. H. Thom and Rev. Charles Beard.

REV. J. H. THOM'S ADDRESS.

The CHAIRMAN, having congratulated the society and thanked the ministers that the reports (which had been for some time in the hands of the members) were more circumstantial, more fully descriptive of work done and requiring to be done than had been the case for some years, said that the justification of every spiritual ministry to the poor lies simply in this fact, that a man's real life consists not in his circumstances, but in his soul. By no material means can we regenerate the world. If a shower of gold were to fall every morning in some of our streets, it would be melted before night in some of the caldrons of evil that are seething there; but if you can move a man's soul, if you can religiously affect the sentiment with which he regards himself, his family, his work, his life on earth, the spiritual mystery of his being, whence he came, why he is here, whither he is tending, you have not only regenerated the individual man, you have directly contributed to adorn and to elevate every circumstance and every creature that stands related to him. For look at the dreadful evils that we have to deal with, and observe how it is from the abuse of the family, that is, of the natural affections, that all the evil comes—from husbands and wives who have no self-sacrifice, from parents who have no sense of natural responsibility, who have taken away for their own children all the holy meanings out of the first words of the Lord's Prayer, "Our Father." For there is really nothing in the mere fact of men holding the most tender and responsible relations spiritually to transform their being. As long as we deal with men from the outside, we can do nothing but wring our hands in despair, or make matters worse by lavish efforts to make them better. But only successfully introduce into the heart one holy, tender, sweet, and solemn affection, and the spring of a new life, outward and inward, is at once opened in the man. It is this which makes perseverance in this spiritual ministry to the poor a religious duty quite independently of any success that may attend it; because it is for ever true that a ray of new light entering into a man's soul will change the whole order of his being. The ministers ought to be cheered by this knowledge,—that they are engaged in a work which has always in it the possibilities of a Divine success. I hope no one for a moment will suppose that I am underrating the importance of circumstances. It is absolutely impossible to exaggerate the value of sanitary agencies, of pure air, pure water, healthful exercise, of clean streets, of clean dwellings; but, then, the main blessing of all these things is that they provide the conditions within which spiritual life may begin and grow without being stifled in its very birth. (Applause.) It has been usual at these meetings to refer to those whom we have lost by death within the year. I cannot undertake to do that. And, indeed, what now remains to be said? For, everywhere it is the same—one testimony from all directions. Last week, at the meeting of the Reformatory Association, Mr. Anderson came to me, and said Mr. Rathbone was the first man that moved to help him in this matter: and I might say just the same here. (Applause.) He gave strength and impulse to all our preparatory movements. He took the chair at our inaugural meeting. He was our first president; and he carried with him the men of his own class. A few years before this institution was founded, I remember introducing to him Dr. Tuckerman, who had just arrived in this country. We met Mr. Rathbone in the street; and, on his leaving us, Dr. Tuckerman turned to Mr. Jonathan Phillips, his fellow-traveller, and said, "It would have been worth while to have come across the Atlantic and have gone back again only to have received that man's greeting, and to have looked into his face." (Renewed applause.) My friends, it is this strong living personality—an individual possession, which no one can describe, which no one can impart, God's gift to us to keep and to cherish—which is the secret of every man's greatest power. This society was constituted on the Good Friday of 1836, just thirty-two years ago. Of the twenty-one persons who took part in the proceedings of that day, eight are still alive. Those who have left us are:—William Rathbone, Thomas Bolton, Christopher Rawdon, Richard Vaughan Yates, Thomas Blackburne, Thomas Holt, Samuel Gair, Blanco White, Thomas Barclay, Dr. Shepherd, Richard Rathbone, Robert Andrews Fletcher, and John Henry Greene. I think we have some right to be proud of the parentage of this society, and I am quite sure that the descendants of those men, to the latest generation, will never let it fall to the ground for want of heart or zeal. I will read the original resolution that defines the functions of the ministers to the poor, because I think it is well for us to keep it in perpetual remembrance. It was moved by Mr. Blanco White:

"That the appropriate duties of the minister to the poor shall be to establish an intercourse with a limited number of families of the neglected poor, to put himself into close sympathy with their wants and feelings, to become to them a Christian adviser and friend, to promote the order and comfort of their homes, and the elevation of their social tastes, to bring them into a permanent connection with religious influences, and, above all, to promote an effective education of their children, and to shelter them from corrupting agencies."

REV. C. BEARD'S ADDRESS.

The Rev. CHARLES BEARD (who moved the adoption of the committee's report and the treasurer's accounts) said: I could not help wondering, Mr. Chairman, when you read the roll of those who assisted in the foundation of this society, whether, after thirty-two years, they would have owned themselves satisfied with the results achieved. The spiritual results of a society such as this (I very well know) are not such as can be weighed and measured, or tabulated in an annual report. I might perhaps more clearly express my meaning were I to ask whether they would be satisfied with the present relation between the upper and lower classes of society as compared with the relation in their day; or with the moral and physical and social condition of the working classes in this day, compared with their own time. For, although the agencies at work have been very greatly multiplied, the evils against which they contend have grown in a fearfully accelerated proportion; as, for instance, in this city, ignorance and crime, vice and irreligiosity—the rift between different classes of society—are upon a far more fearful scale than they were thirty-two years ago. If we have done something in this time, the evil on the other hand has grown far more rapidly; and we are but as men bailing out of a boat, for bare life, water which is washed in by the irresistible tides of the sea. (Applause.) I do not know how to express in appropriate words my conviction that the social evils against which we desire to contend are of a kind against which our present efforts meet with little or no success. Take the case of Liverpool. Our churches and chapels do not multiply very fast; we do not hear of the extraordinary success of any sect of Christians; our benevolent institutions remain pretty much upon the same scale; and yet every ten years adds to the population of this city by tens and almost hundreds of thousands. Every plot of waste land is covered with cottages, and a thick population brings its necessary results. Although the sanitary labours of those in charge of these things here deserve to be mentioned in terms of the highest respect, life in the courts of Liverpool—cleansed and swept, and re-swept though they be—set with dull houses on either side—full of odours which, even when they are not "horrible stenches" (as Mr. Jones says), are not exactly like the smell of new-mown hay; with children swarming about the streets, without education; with mean dirty shops where the food of the people is sold in the most unpleasant and unseemly manner possible; with a great glaring ginshop at every corner to tempt men to vice; and the only object to remind them of the beauty of the world which God created, a little rift of blue sky over head, or a cloud passing by with the wind,—life under these circumstances is necessarily a hard coarse, unlovely thing; and we cannot wonder if men seek some fierce excitement to make them forget how hard and coarse and unlovely it is. (Applause.) To a certain extent, however, we may congratulate ourselves that, however great these evils are, there is a series of forces at work against them of a kind more powerful than any individual efforts of our own. Efforts, not made for a distinctly benevolent purpose, have, after all, a very immediate and direct effect upon the well-being of the people. I suppose we are not altogether benevolent in our sanitary arrangements; but in keeping fever and cholera from our own doors, not the less do we keep them from the doors of our poorer fellow-citizens. The great question of free trade was fought from political and commercial motives; but, for all that, there has been no such benefactor of the working classes in this century, no philanthropist who accomplished so great a work as he who lies buried in that churchyard in Sussex. And again, there is no such education for the people now abroad, and I doubt if there will be for many years to come, as that afforded by the cheap press of this country. (Hear, hear.) In all these matters, upon a broad scale, and with large instruments, a great work is being done among the people; and we have a right to congratulate ourselves, that if our individual efforts be feeble, and if we can see but little effect from them, God works upon a broader scale, and is carrying out His social purposes, as it were, through our unconscious hands. But this is not all that remains to be done. One of the greatest difficulties that beset us, that we have allowed these evils to accumulate, through a series of years, with consciences only half awake; and that now, this generation, with aroused conscience in matters of sanitary arrangement, of crime, of education, is obliged to apply itself to remove the evils which have been accumulating through many generations. I do not know, for instance, anything more melancholy than the way in which Liverpool has been allowed to grow up to its present huge size, without regard to the decency, comfort, and cleanliness of the people's dwellings. All our sanitary efforts, our sewerage, our breaking down of walls to let light and free air into courts, are merely palliatives of the enormous evil which oppresses us. And look at the simple consequences of this. We do not live together. The word "fellow-citizen" is becoming a mere form of speech amongst us. In what sense am I, who see green trees and grass before my door, the fellow-citizen of the man who lives in a court off Great Homer-street or Scotland-road? The external circumstances of our lot are entirely different, and if he looks upon me at all, he looks upon me as one who, by no merit of my own, am enjoying a fate superior to his, and am to be regarded with something like envy, and not with kindly sympathy. I do not know anything more advisable, for the moral health of a great many ladies and gentlemen whom I see before me, than that every month you should make an excursion into that terra incognita, that Nova Zembla of this city, which lies to the north of Dale-street. (Hear, hear.) It is too late, I suppose, to think of remedying all this by a change in our own mode of life; too late to expect the merchant to live in the midst of his clerks, or the manufacturer in the midst of his hands; too late to expect that we, if only for the sake of our own and our children's health, should go and live where these people do. But a great truth has been told to-night, that cannot be told too often, that the only way in which these people can be lifted up, and the Christian ministry established amongst them, the only way in which that great and terrible gulf which is every day yawning more widely between the working and the middle classes of this country can in any degree be lessened, is by means of kindly contact of class with class, and the possibility that poor men, living a mean and squalid life, should find their natural friends and helpers in those whom God has blessed with affluence and a more happy condition of existence. (Applause.) While I do not mean to insinuate that this mission is not doing a most admirable work, I think I can trace an evil effect which it is at this moment producing, not upon the poor, but upon the rich. We cannot suppose that Mr. Shannon and Mr. Jones were influenced to undertake this work by the mere fact that here they obtain the bare means of livelihood, but because they believe they are called to it by God, and because they desire to tread in the footsteps of their master Christ. But precisely the same obligation lies upon us too. We have not done our duty, and it is no use pretending to think so, when we have paid one, two, or five guineas per annum to the society's funds, or testified our interest in it at the annual meeting, and then leave these men to go about the dirty streets, to stand face to face with sin and misery, to lift up the fallen, and reclaim the vicious. We cannot do God's work by proxy nor make up our account with Christ by an annual subscription. (Applause.) There is a certain essential weakness in delegating our Christian work to other hands to do. It not only enfeebles our own sense of Christian responsibility, but to a certain extent it places our ministers in a wrong relation to the classes upon whom they are called upon to act. I confess it with the deepest possible shame, ministers of religion are not at the present moment, and in the present condition of affairs, the best missionaries to the poor. However unsectarian they may be in their aims, however liberal and large hearted, there has been, for so many years, such a scramble for sectarian purposes both amongst Protestants and Catholics, that ministers of religion, of any kind, come to the poor more or less tainted with these associations. They think we want something out of them, to make capital out of them for our churches and chapels. I would, for my own part (except in rare cases, such as we witness in connection with this Mission), sooner trust the kindly and affectionate sympathy of ladies and gentlemen who go amongst the poor—such as I see before me gathered out of congregations in this town—I would sooner trust the effect of their helpfulness and sympathy, and the enforced religiousness of their example than a whole army of scripture-readers and curates, who, if not tainted with sectarian aims and methods, would at least be credited by the poor with such a taint. When you read, sir, the original resolution moved by Mr. Blanco White, I felt that there was not one of the objects enumerated in it which was not within the aim and compass of every single man and woman amongst us. I believe there is one method yet by which the poor of this and other great cities may be reclaimed, and that is by bringing to a focus the Christian sympathy, the earnest zeal, the religious self-devotion of the richer classes, and throwing it with all the energy of a religious forlorn hope upon the poor. If you could bring the south of Liverpool, with its wealth, its intellect, its religious zeal, to bear upon the north; if to every family living in those fair villas could be assigned some squalid court, or the side of some neglected street, and there could be introduced the relations which cannot be more aptly described than in this resolution proposed thirty-two years ago, your work would be done. There is intellect, kindness, wealth, religious zeal enough if only it could be made to tell in the right place and in the right way. If only we could establish a brotherhood and sisterhood of beneficence in this city, with all sectarian aims and motives entirely put aside—to make friends with the poor, to aid them in their needs and struggles, and raise them out of their difficulties; and if, in addition to this, you could so parcel out the town that every man and woman who was willing to work should have a place to work in and a work to do, I declare before God that I believe in twenty years' time this Liverpool—this rich, wicked, miserable, ignorant, crime-stricken city of ours—would be a light of healing to the whole of this nation. (Applause.) If only you would apply yourselves to the organisation of such an agency, you would find that the poor would learn to love and trust you, and that a light of Christianity, a force of religious life, would go forth from you, such as in the case of physical disease went forth from your master, Christ, and you would bless the day when you began the work. (Loud applause.)

The meeting was also addressed by Rev. C. Wicksteed, Messrs. H. A. Bright, T. Avison, C. T. Bowring, C. Holland, R. Trimble, and Revs. J. Shannon, T. Jones, and C. B. Upton.

EAST LANCASHIRE MISSION MEETING.

For some years past, two Unitarian Associations in East Lancashire have held their meetings on the same day in the Spring. The older institution consists of twelve congregations, having Bolton for its centre, and holds meetings every six months for friendly intercourse. The Mission, which is a society of much later date, includes all the Unitarian congregations of the district. These two united meetings took place this year at Heywood, on March 12th. The service of the Bolton District Association was in the afternoon, when Rev. J. K. Smith and Rev. H. E. Dowson officiated. At its close, the members partook of tea together in the schoolroom.

In the evening of the same day was held the annual meeting of the East Lancashire Unitarian Mission. The attendance was very good, including Rev. J. T. Whitehead, of Ainsworth; Rev. J. Worthington, Robert Heywood, Esq.; Messrs. J. Entwistle, Geo. Harwood, James Harwood, F. Taylor, and J. Barrow, of Bolton; Rev. J. W. Rodgers, Burnley; Rev. J. Wright, B.A.; John Grundy, Esq.; Wm. Grundy, Esq.; Messrs. D. Ashton and J. Bowman, of Bury; Rev. G. Ride, Chorley; Rev. M. C. Frankland, Chorley; Rev. Jno. Fox, Heywood; Rev. J. K. Smith, Newchurch; Rev. R. J. Orr, Preston; Rev. Thos. Carter, Rev. J. Preston, R. T. Heape, Esq., and R. Oliver, Esq., of Rochdale; Rev. W. C. Squier, Stand; Rev. L. Taplin, M.A., Todmorden; Rev. H. E. Dowson, B.A., Gee Cross; and Rev. J. E. Odgers, M.A., of Kendal.

JOHN GRUNDY Esq., of Summerseat, took the chair, in the unavoidable absence of Mr. Benjamin Heape, the president. He opened the meeting with a powerful and eloquent address. After contrasting the building in which they were assembled with the room in which he had presided over the first Unitarian meeting in Heywood, he referred to this pleasing change as the first-fruits of missionary effort in the district. Acknowledging that the work done is far below what it ought to be, he asked whence arose this deficiency; and after showing that it was not caused by any lack of great and good principles in our faith, or any want of multitudes of men in the higher artisan class, ready to receive those principles, he concluded that the fault must lie with those whose duty it is to spread our religion. He exhorted the ministers from blame on this head, and thought it was the laity alone who were deficient in zeal and activity. He therefore urged the ministers to press on their congregations their duty, never minding whether they liked to be told about it or not, and not to cease repeating it again and again till Unitarians are thoroughly aroused to a sense of their position and responsibility. After referring, in very strong terms, to the necessity of at once raising the money needed for Accrington, he proposed to establish a "building fund" of £5,000, for the use of the East Lancashire district; and showed how many populous places there are as yet entirely without Unitarian worship. This brief outline gives only a faint idea of the excellent and stirring speech by which a spirit of hopeful zeal was infused into the meeting.

The annual report was presented by Rev. J. Worthington, and showed a very hopeful state of things at Accrington, where a missionary minister is to be placed as soon as the committee can meet with a suitable man for the work, and at Astley, where both congregation and school are prosperous. At Blackburn the services have been suspended, but it is hoped that they will soon be re-established with improved arrangements. At Burnley the settlement of Rev. J. W. Rodgers, and the persevering zeal of the members, are hopeful signs. At Heywood the progress is continued and satisfactory. The treasurer's accounts show the income for 1867 to be above £300, and a good balance in hand; but as the expenditure already entered on for 1868 is very large, including the support of two additional missionaries, the treasurer will require that the income of the society be increased by at least £100.

The usual business resolutions were moved and spoken to by most of the gentlemen above mentioned. A motion of approval of the objects of the mission called forth very powerful appeals from Mr. Whitehead and Mr. Odgers. An expression of good feeling and sympathy towards the other missionary associations of the province was coupled with the name of Rev. H. E. Dowson, and without any formal vote of thanks to him for his sermon in the afternoon, a strong feeling of appreciation of it was expressed. Mr. Dowson's reply was full of practical wisdom and fervent feeling. Great interest was excited by the statement that the building of the new chapel at Accrington must stop if the £200 wanting to complete the fund be not raised. Mr. Mills, of Accrington, gave a simple history of the movement there, and several new subscriptions were announced. There was a vote of welcome to the congregations of Stand and Commission-street, Bolton, which have recently joined the mission, and a similar one to Messrs. Orr and Rodgers, the ministers lately come into the district. A motion of regret for the loss of Rev. G. Hoade, and of esteem for his character, was passed in solemn silence.

The result of the whole was to awaken new zeal and a determination to persevere in their work among those present. Much of the day's success was due to the excellent arrangements of the Heywood friends, and though a hasty departure to catch the trains prevented a formal vote of thanks to them for their hospitality, the guests did not fail to express this feeling to one another. Several additional donations to the Accrington building fund, which have since come in, prove that the meeting was not without its fruit.

INTELLIGENCE.

MINISTERIAL APPOINTMENT.—We are requested to announce that the Rev. J. A. Brinkworth, of Swindon, has accepted the unanimous invitation of the trustees of Cow-street Chapel, Shepton Mallet, to become their pastor, and will enter on his ministry the 29th of March.

BRADFORD: THE FREE CHURCH.—A week or two ago we inserted, on the authority of a letter which appeared in the Inquirer, a paragraph stating that the Bradford Free Church is still continued, under the ministerial care of Mr. Mee. We are requested to announce that this is not correct.

BURNLEY.—On Saturday last, recognition services were held in the Hall of the Mechanics' Institute, Burnley, to welcome the Rev. J. W. Rodgers as the appointed minister of the Unitarian congregation, which has been without a regular minister or adequate supply for some months past. The meeting was numerous and respectfully attended by friends from the neighbourhood, and particularly Padiham. The Rev. J. P. Hopps delivered the charge to the minister, who was welcomed on behalf of the congregation by Mr. Mackie. Subsequently, a sermon was preached by the Rev. J. Wright, of Bury. Ministers from Bolton and New-church were present, and took part in the proceedings. After the meeting, a tea meeting was held, at which about 200 sat down; and after this a third meeting, at which addresses were delivered by the ministers already named, and members of the congregation, interspersed with music by two female members of the choir. Mr. Rodgers is engaged each Sunday evening in lecturing upon some specific point of Unitarian doctrine. These meetings were the most successful of the kind hitherto held in Burnley.

LONDON UNITARIAN LAY PREACHERS' UNION.—The quarterly meeting of the preachers was held on Tuesday night, 10th inst., at Stamford-street Chapel. Samuel Sharpe, Esq., presided, and spoke to the members on the vast importance of great plainness of speech at the present time in setting forth the doctrines of Unitarian Christianity. He had just attended a large secularist meeting, in which the lecturer repudiated Christianity because of the doctrine of the Deity of Christ, and Mr. Sharpe had to correct the lecturer. Reports were presented from Clerkenwell, Poplar, Walworth, Mile End, Stratford, New Town, Hoxton; and it was stated that a small chapel had been taken at Forest Hill, which will be opened in a few weeks. Upwards of 50,000 of the Unitarian leaflets had been circulated in London, and about 20,000 of them had been sold already. The friends at Mile End have now commenced a building fund for the erection of a suitable chapel among the masses of East London. At their first meeting upwards of £100 were put down for the purpose.

MANCHESTER DISTRICT UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION. On Monday, the eighth annual meeting was held in the Memorial Hall. The Rev. Wm. Gaskell, M.A., presided. Among those present were the Revs. G. H. Wells, M.A., T. E. Poynting, C. W. Robberds, W. G. Gadman, S. A. Steinthal, and A. Rushton; Messrs. Peter Eekersley, Benj. Heape, R. Nicholson, J. Bennett, J. Booth, J. Reynolds, J. Heys, and B. Rigby Davis. The Chairman said during the past year he had had opportunities of seeing the condition of the stations at Swinton and Whitfield-street, Ardwick, and both appeared to be going on exceedingly well. He thought an effort should be made by the congregation at the former of these to obtain a settled minister. He was particularly pleased with the spirit displayed by the Whitfield-street people. Their school had now become too large for the building, and they had purchased their present premises, and hoped to raise the money by a bazaar which is to be held next month.—The Rev. T. E. Poynting read the report, which stated that Blackley and Failsworth, formerly under the charge of the association, had during the last year become independent congregations, and had settled ministers now of their own. The number of societies under the care of the association is thus reduced to five. The committee had not seen their way to engage a general superintendent missionary, but they had put Miles Platting and Middleton respectively under the care of Mr. Rushton and Mr. Cadman. Ardwick, under the little band of workers who originated it, seemed able to stand alone; Ford-street had been in some degree assisted by the students of the Home Missionary Board, while Swinton is on its way to become an independent congregation.—Mr. Geo. Wadsworth, jun., read the financial statement, from which it appeared that the expenditure for the year had been £205 and the income £259, so that the balance of £53 owing to the treasurer had been reduced to £38. Afterwards the reports were adopted, and officers were appointed for the ensuing year.

PAISLEY.—Our friends here held their annual soirée in the chapel last Friday, Mr. C. Mills in the chair. The meeting was addressed by the chairman, Rev. H. W. Croskey, Messrs. Callender, Dunlop, and Andrews. The attendance was good, and so were the speeches and the music.

POOLE.—The Poole and South Western Herald devotes three closely-printed columns to a very interesting report of the closing services at the old Presbyterian Chapel, previous to its being pulled down for rebuilding. The service was conducted by Mr. Joseph Darby, who gave a very careful historical sketch of the congregation from its commencement. We hope in an early number to give this sketch at some length, as it is one of those local histories which ought to be preserved.

THE TRIENNIAL CONFERENCE OF THE LIBERATION SOCIETY.

To the Editors.—Thanks to the denunciations of opponents, as well as to the efforts of friends, the "Liberation Society" has become one of the best known institutions in the kingdom; its fundamental principles and "ulterior aims" being now familiar to thousands, not only of Nonconformists, but of Episcopalians, who a few years ago were alike ignorant and indifferent in regard to them. But there is one feature in its constitution and proceedings with which its immediate friends are better acquainted than the public at large, and that is, the extent to which the society's vitality is derived from its Triennial Conference.

These great gatherings are, in one respect, quite unique; for, not only do they bring the society's executive face to face with the representatives of its supporters throughout the kingdom, but the door is thrown open to others who may never have been connected with the organisation, but whose concurrence in its objects may dispose them to enter its ranks. These, equally with its oldest friends, have the opportunity of revising the society's constitution, of reviewing its past proceedings, and of choosing a new executive, and, so far as the future can be provided for, of shaping its future operations.

The next Triennial Conference is approaching, the time fixed being the 5th and 6th of May, and, in asking the attention of your readers to the advertisement—appearing elsewhere—of the mode in which it will be convened, I venture to urge that there are some special reasons why the invitation of the executive committee should be accepted by those who in past years did not feel it to be obligatory upon them to identify themselves with such an association.

There are, I suppose, but few who now share in the belief expressed by some in 1844, that the founders of this society were committing themselves to an utterly Utopian enterprise: on the contrary, the discerning public now look upon the separation of Church and State as "only a question of time," and not a few have begun to think of it as an event which may be witnessed by this, rather than by a distant generation. Even if this be considered a too sanguine view, it is obvious that there is a general shifting of the grounds on which the establishments of the country are advocated, and that we have to deal with arguments and facts, and to avert dangers, very different from those which were familiar to our fathers. Since the last Liberation Conference the whole question has entered into a new phase, and it is likely that every triennial period will, for some time to come, be similarly distinguished from that which preceded it. It is true that almost every change indicates progress, but it also brings with it difficulty, and calls for increased zeal and increased practical wisdom. If those who for so many years have toiled in this service feel themselves to be amply repaid by the result, they also have a deep sense of the responsibility which rests upon them at the present juncture, and eagerly desire to be strengthened by new alliances for the conflicts of the future. Let not, therefore, interested lookers-on suppose that the work will go on well enough without help from them; and let the indifferent ask themselves if it be generous always to let others bear the stress and strain of a struggle which involves the success of their own principles, and the assertion of their own rights.—Yours faithfully,

J. CARVELL WILLIAMS,

THE SIMULTANEOUS MISSIONARY COLLECTIONS.

To the Editors.—The Rev. J. T. Whitehead's letter in your last issue, on the rainy Sunday of the 8th March, the day of our simultaneous annual collections for the principal missions in the north of England, raises publicly a question which is likely, I have reason to believe, to be under debate in our several mission committees. Mr. Whitehead's suggestion is very good, that those unable to attend on collection Sundays should send their contributions through their ministers, and this course has been not unfrequently practised in the West Riding. At the same time, the question remains whether a change of the date of these collections would not be well. It is certain that we have had rainy days on the second Sunday in March for several years; but the answer to this is, "And change the day, and you will then regret it, in the view of a fine and bright one." So uncertain is our weather that we can hardly account it in argument. Nor certainly do our collections depend upon weather alone. There is always Mr. Whitehead's suggestion to fall back upon. I understand it was calculated that the rain of the 8th of March caused the loss of at least £70 to the mission work in the north of England. I do not know how far this calculation was based on the returns of the North Midland and Lancashire Missions, but as far as the returns for the West Riding Mission have reached me, there is a slight increase in our collections this year as compared with last year. And this, notwithstanding our Band of Faith movement in the West Riding, which has erroneously been supposed by some short-sighted people to be likely to injure our older mission. The truth is, that generosity, like all other virtues, is progressive, and that the noble habit of giving grows with its exercise. One thing, however, remains certain on the main question. Whether or not the weather has the effect attributed to it in influencing the amount of our collections, if we change the day, our several missions must be agreed about it. The plan of our annual collections, thanks to its designer, has proved an excellent one. But for many good reasons, the collections must remain, whatever the change of their date, not only annual, but simultaneous.—Yours truly,

GOODWYN BARMY.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

Dr. Norman Macleod has been attacked with dysentery in India, and is now on his way home. An Indian paper informs us that he obtained more than £500 in Calcutta for a retiring fund for Missionaries of the Church of Scotland.

From the "Annuaire Pontifical," just published, it appears that the Sacred College consists of six cardinal bishops, fifty cardinal priests, and sixteen cardinal deacons. There are at present 20 hats vacant, one having just been conferred on Monsignor Bonaparte. Of the forty-nine cardinals existing, twelve were named by Gregory XVI. and the others by the present Pope, under whose reign eighty-four members of the Sacred College have died. The oldest member is the Archbishop of Toledo, who is in his eighty-seventh year. There are in the Catholic Church 865 patriarchal, archiepiscopal, and episcopal sees effective, and 229 prelates with sees in partibus infidelium. The countries where the hierarchy is not regularly established comprise 113 vicariats, five delegations, and twenty-two prefectures, administered by missionary prelates. The Italian peninsula contains 235 dioceses, and counts nearly one-half of the cardinals.

The latter-day prophets, who have been making out that Louis Napoleon is predestined to be Pope as well as Emperor, no doubt, after the way of soothsayers who, if the event answers not their prediction expound it according to the event, will find their vaticinations clearly fulfilled should the newly-created Cardinal Bonaparte be advanced, as seems not unlikely, to the Papacy. He is forty years of age, and the head and representative of the elder branch of the Bonaparte family, and through the influence of his cousin, aided by his own ability, which is said to be great, may not unreasonably aspire to wear the tiara when Pío Nono lays it down.

The Pope having granted a dispensation for the marriage of Prince Humbert with his cousin Margherita, a number of Roman maidens are embroidering with pearls on silk a wedding present for her, in which a young girl in the dress of the Campagna will be seen defending herself against a hideous serpent. They take this way of intimating to the future Queen of Italy that they connect her marriage with the longed-for deliverance of their city from the Papal tyranny.

Among the new Peers is to be the Rev. William Chichester O'Neill, whose ground for the distinction, as far as known to the public, seems to be that his son has represented the Conservatives of Antrim in Parliament for five years. The English Independent trusts he will not find his lordly functions interfere with the duties of his sacred office. If the Bishops find no inconvenience from the union of the two characters, there can be no reason why he should do so.

The Church of Rome has received another "pervert" in the person of the Rev. W. H. Ratcliff, recently curate of St. Mary Magdalene, Paddington.

We mentioned recently the religious services that Lord Radstock was conducting in Paris. Lord Teynham is at present preaching in Staffordshire; and the other Sunday Lord Henry Cholmondeley was engaged to preach at Cambridge, but being prevented by illness, he sent the Hon. Somerset Maxwell to take his place, and he addressed as many of the townspeople, including some gownsmen, as the assembly-room could hold.

The mustache movement has got in among the Methodists. The Recorder has received two communications on the subject. One of them, written by a lady, concludes with the expression of a hope that the propensity to cultivate the mustache may not spread among "our esteemed ministers," making them appear in the pulpit, with whiskers, beard, and mustache, something like that "rueful thing," "an owl in an ivy-bush."

It is stated that the first stone of the Keble College at Oxford will be laid by the Archbishop of Canterbury, on April 25, Mr. Keble's birthday.

If the John Bull may be believed, the Rev. F. D. Maurice is about to deliver a series of lectures in Mr. Binney's chapel.

According to Echoes of the Clubs, the rumour is that, if Dr. Sumner's illness should end fatally, the Bishop of Oxford will be his successor; but the Advertiser thinks that Dean Stanley will be appointed to fill up the vacancy.

A Church paper mentions that the result of the introduction of the offertory at St. Anne's, Soho, has been to increase the funds raised for church purposes by £100 in the course of a year.

According to the Church Review, the Ritual Commissioners have agreed on a resolution upon condemning lights, vestments, and incense, as contrary to the custom of the last 300 years. The conclusion they arrive at is that although candles have been occasionally placed on the altar in royal chapels and cathedrals, &c., yet there is no evidence of their having been lighted and used as accessories to worship. They have not yet decided on the remedy which should be provided for the "aggrieved parishioner," but at the next meeting the Bishop of London will propose that he should have liberty to appeal to the diocesan, who is to have power to decide all cases of dispute, with appeal to the Archbishop, who may consult the judge of his Court, while the latter may allow an appeal to the Privy Council.

A serious difficulty has arisen at Orleans, owing to the removal being demanded by public utility of the remains of some buried Israelites. The rabbi sternly declines to allow the removal to take place. He says it is against the Mosaic law. He tells the municipal authorities that they do not think what confusion they may cause at the day of judgment. They promise, in reply, to take the utmost care, and to place the bones again in the ground in proper order. The rabbi answers that it cannot be done: their utmost care will not be sufficient; they must infallibly create disputes at the last day. If any bones should then be wanting, how, he argues, is the resurrection to be completed? The authorities reply that the difficulty is conceivable if any of the large bones prove to be missing, but against that ordinary care will guard. As for the smaller ones, they cannot suppose that much inconvenience would result from one or two of them being missing. Even while men are alive they suggest that some of them have false teeth, and that way out of the difficulty would always be available. The rabbi remains firm, and the affair was not arranged when the last account left Orleans.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

The state of the educated native mind in India at present seems to be very interesting and hopeful. Speaking of an incident which occurred the night before the great missionary meeting to welcome Dr. Macleod, Dr. Mitchell said:

"I listened, along with not a few now present, to a lecture delivered last night by a native on this subject—'The faith that regenerates individuals and nations.' I listened with unbounded astonishment—ay, admiration—to an eloquent discourse in which there was much adverse to Hindooism, nothing adverse to the Gospel. I do not venture to predict what may be the future of the remarkable man who delivered the address, or of his immediate followers; but that this movement is auxiliary to Christian truth, and preparatory to its reception, I no more doubt than I doubt when I see the dawn purpling the east that the sun though hidden is advancing in all his living splendour, and about to rise."

In the last number of the Union Chretienne, Dr. Guettée declares the expectations which some cherish of a union between Anglicanism and Romanism to be an utter delusion, when "all the Latin Bishops profess Ultramontanism as a fundamental doctrine of their Church." Of those who entertain such expectations, he asks:

"Do they not know that in the present day Gallicanism is scouted, repudiated, condemned as no better than heresy and schism? Is not Bossuet himself scoffed at by the whole Ultramontane party? Has it not been asserted, even at Meaux itself, that the remains of Bossuet ought to be expelled his cathedral, as those of a heretic? We shall never forget the disdain with which a Papal Nuncio, Mgr. Garibaldi, once spoke to ourselves of the great Bishop. It is in vain that the Latinising Anglicans nurse the hope that Gallicanism may be a middle term of approach between their Church and that of Rome. Three centuries ago such an expectation might have been entertained; in the present day it is out of the question."

The following extracts from a letter just published, which was addressed to the Rev. Jno. Stock, in 1851, when the country was so strangely excited on the subject of Papal Aggression, show at once the sagacity of Mr. Cobden regarding the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill, and his fidelity to the great principles of religious liberty:

"It is to me a very painful ordeal when I have to take a course which separates me from the friends with whom I acted on the Free Trade Question; but I am convinced that, with time and discussion, the friends of religious freedom will not fail ultimately to find themselves alongside of the advocate of commercial liberty. These are two principles which ought not to be separated even for a moment. I have not arrived hastily at the decision which I have come to on The Papal Aggression Bill. In the pamphlet which I published in 1835, under the name of "England, Ireland, and America," I gave full expression to my views on the subject of religious toleration; and at the same time did not disguise my opinions of the Roman Catholic system. Those views are unchanged, and I must say, I do not think they are the real friends of Protestantism who invoke the aid of the secular arm to put down the open and free competition with a power which they profess to believe to have no better foundation than human invention and error. I am not afraid of the results of such a free competition, and ask only a fair field and no favour for Protestantism. That which Luther won for us in the 16th century we can maintain in the 19th, if we be true to our faith, which I fear many of those are not who call out for Acts of Parliament to put down 'Papal Aggression.' . . . I am prepared to take the consequence of the course I have pursued, and would prefer to lose the representation of a thousand West Ridings than swerve from the principles of religious liberty to which I am bound by the strongest ties of conscientious conviction."

Archdeacon Denison is delighted that Mr. Gladstone has plainly avowed his hostility to the Irish Church. In a letter to the Herald he says:

"Men cannot agree upon principles, and the next best thing is that the disagreement should be distinct and final. Adjustments and compromises in matter of principle are always worse than defeat. When a man is beat outright, he sets himself to work to recover or to replace. So long as he is deluded into thinking he has something left he is idle and indifferent. I have never doubted that the time of clear distinction must soon come, and now it has come. A 'Conservative' is a man who maintains Church Establishment, a 'Liberal' is a man who destroys it. We are come back, I am thankful to say, to old party times upon the old and true party basis. All questions between 'Conservative' and 'Liberal,' short of the Church question, were only things of a temporary and accidental character. They are all disposed of, and we are come to the substance. The Church question stands out in all its native proportions. I am glad that Mr. Gladstone has for once torn down the veil. For the first time in his life it is impossible for men to say that they do not know what he means. Meantime, without waiting for Ireland, Church disestablishment has begun in England. Church-rate abolition—that is, Mr. Gladstone's bill—has inserted the thin edge of the wedge, and some inches of it besides. Endorse the 'majority' principle for Ireland, and what becomes of Wales and other parts of this island, country, and town? When we go next to the hustings we shall know what it is for." And so, we trust, will Nonconformists too.

The Record cannot place confidence in a minister who is prepared, like Mr. Disraeli, to endow Romanism, and thinks that a total disestablishment of the Irish Church and a total withdrawal of the Regium Donum, accompanied with a measure for withdrawing all educational grants to Maynooth and other Romish endowments, is infinitely better than any scheme for building up and strengthening the Romish Babylon. The Record hopes, however, that the Irish Church is not yet lost, and that with certain necessary reforms it may long survive.

The Church Times, which believes that the Irish Establishment has practically ended its life, does not regard its fruits as so excellent that Catholics need much regret its decease, or make any efforts to stave off its dissolution.

The John Bull, on the other hand, asserts that closely following on the disestablishment of the United Church (to accomplish which the present move is the first step) must come the downfall of the aristocracy and the Crown; and Mr. Disraeli has taken the only statesmanlike course in resisting the beginning of the end. The country will support him. Amidst all our unhappy divisions, the country is at heart too religious to be led by the united machinations of Nonconformists and philosophers.

The Church Review, while it considers that the principle of establishments is now at stake, and would have the game fairly played out to its summation, says:

"No doubt, if we could come to such an arrangement for the English Church at this time, it might be well. Never, indeed, had we so good an opportunity. Let us now accomplish our exodus. Let us march out together, Irish and English Churchmen, shoulder to shoulder, with drums beating and colours flying, under the Gladstonian lead, with our churches and our benefices; where Romanism flourishes and where Dissent prevails, let us yield up church and benefice; and where the Church still is strong let her retain her position. Only let the dis-establishment be complete in England as in Ireland, and the Church may cry out in exultation, 'The snare is broken, and we are delivered.'

The Church Times does not regret the decision of the House of Commons on the Church-rate Bill. It says:

"We may now have peace, where before was estrangement—and the missionary work of the Church, especially among Dissenters, can hardly fail to gain by the alteration of the law."

The Record is indignant with the Oxford High Churchman, Rev. H. P. Liddon, for "preparing to aid, not only in the dis-establishment of the Irish branch of the United Church, but in the dis-establishment of the United Church itself." Writing to the Guardian, on Mr. Coleridge's University Bill, he had said:

"Some of my Liberal friends will accuse me of despairing of Christianity. I reply that I do not despair of it at all; that is, throughout the world, or, in the long run, at home. God forbid! But I should be more hopeful about our immediate future if, simultaneously with the destruction of her position in the two Universities, the Church of England could be, at whatever cost, cut free from her connection with the State. I do not wish to precipitate that event, but surely dis-establishment is very far from being the worst evil with which we are threatened."

In a letter to the Irish National Association, Cardinal Cullen says, with regard to the Church, to the land, and education, he sees "favourable appearances" of a coming change, but at the same time he reminds his Catholic fellow-countrymen of the existence of a strong Orange party, and others who look on the Church property as a fund to provide wealth and influence for their families, or who think the Church Establishment should be preserved, not as a religious institution, but as a garrison in the country—a party who will make "a long and noisy struggle in defence of existing abuses and of ascendancy."

The Daily Telegraph has some severe comments on the following advertisement in the Guardian, which often contains similar ones:

"For exchange, a living, in a most picturesque locality, within easy reach of Hertford. Pop. under 300. Income, £450. Good house, stabling, &c.; beautiful pleasure grounds, good kitchen garden. Railway in the parish. Climate very mild—a most desirable position for a delicate man. No Dissenters in the parish."

The Telegraph is not surprised that no gentleman could engage in a profession, the article of apprenticeship of which was "Take nothing for your journey; neither staves nor scrip, neither bread, neither money, neither have two coats a-piece."

"Thanks to advertisements in the Guardian and elsewhere, the 'cure of souls' is now an elegant profession for younger sons and graduates with an uncle on the Bench of Bishops." The advantages of this living are thus enumerated:—First of all there are not many souls to save—"population under 300"—and as most persons in the parish will be indifferent to the process of the future pastor, here is an immense advantage. "Then a 'good house' will draw by dozens the servants of Him who had not where to lay his head; 'stabling' is intensely attractive, equally of course to the enthusiastic followers of the One who went 'meek and lowly, and riding upon an ass;' and in the 'kitchen garden' they can meditate among the melons and early asparagus, just as well as among 'the lilies of the field,' how worthless are earthly things compared with the kingdom of God. Then there are no Dissenters—no troublesome people who believe hard, and take religion to be a tremendous reality—no bother about tithes and church-rates—no rival preacher thundering in Zion Chapel about 'temperance, soberness, and judgment to come,' until the awful echoes disturb the gentle slumbers induced by sermons at six shillings the dozen, 'composed' in Paternoster-row. Delightful parish! most eligible Macedonia! As apostles go now-a-days, you could have your pick of the twelve; and if there be but an heiress in the squire's pew of ecclesiastical tastes, and the hounds meet pretty near at hand, state your terms, and young divines with spare cash will give up the 'Seven Churches' themselves in a lump to preach to you the gospel according to St. Society." In sterner manner the Telegraph denounces this sin of simony, and adds, "The age is in earnest, and will not brook many years longer, by the side of the voluntary systems, this unblushing merchandise of the mission of heaven. The 'cure of souls' ceases to be the thing Christ meant by it, when his servants and representatives 'buy a practice' like a doctor or an attorney."

An article in the New York Methodist, speaking of the decrease which took place in the Methodist New Connexion in the year 1846, says:

"That decrease was due to the persistent agitations of a gifted but singularly erratic and ill-balanced preacher, well known in Great Britain and America by the name of Joseph Barker. Inbibing notions similar to those of our Genesee Nazarites, he became first impracticable, then heretical, and lastly blasphemously atheistic—a pro-slavery lecturer during the rebellion, and a nuisance to all the friends of religion, morality, and good order. Strangely enough, he has since abjured infidelity, connected himself with the church of his early choice, and occasionally preaches with the humility and chastened earnestness proper to his antecedents, the faith which once he destroyed."

In an article on the Church and the Universities, the Daily News thus describes the working of subscription:

"Subscription at Oxford has come to be considered simply as implying that a man has not sufficient faith in any religious creed, other than that of the Church of England, to force him to propagate it. Consequently, subscription keeps out the Roman Catholic, it keeps out the Presbyterian, it keeps out the religious Dissenter; it may even—we make Mr. Liddon a present of this concession—keep out the Comtist, who has too much respect for what he considers truth to call himself by any other name. But it throws open the door to every variety of scepticism and indifference; it cares nothing for unbelief as such; it is only troubled when unbelief insists on speaking out, and being known for what it really is. Is such a system as this worth keeping on foot for the sake of religion? If it is, we can only say that Christianity made a great mistake in not leaving the Roman empire as she found it. And if the tests now in force are condemned by the mere statement of their operation, what chance is there of substituting any other in their room? They have only been borne with so long because they have had so little real efficacy, whereas any new test, however wide, would be stringent from the very fact of its novelty. Subscription to the Thirty-nine Articles has come to have scarcely any meaning at all. If subscription to the Apostles' Creed, or to a simple declaration of Christianity, were put in its place, the University would obviously intend to exclude all who do not accept the one or profess the other; and in that case what would become of many of her present members?"

Before entering the pulpit on Sunday morning, the Rev. H. R. Haweis, at St. James's Chapel, Marylebone, read from the altar "A Declaration to the Primate renouncing Christian communion with Dr. Colenso." He said he believed the document was being widely circulated. It had been forwarded him for signature. He could hardly frame his lips to pronounce such words from a Christian altar. They breathed a spirit of intolerance and persecution with which we were all familiar. It was the spirit which burned the Reformers under Mary and tortured the Catholics under Elizabeth. "What right have we," he continued, "to rise up and curse each other in this manner? I am not saying a word about Dr. Colenso's opinions; they are quite a different question. But I will show you the kind of estimation in which I hold this unchristian document, and all that are like unto it." He then tore up the Declaration.

DAME PARTINGTON AND HER MOP.

(An Oxford University Prize Poem, respectfully dedicated to the signers of a certain Address to a certain Archbishop.)

DAME PARTINGTON stood on the shore,
As stern as old woman could be;
And her wonderful mop she bore,
With which to sweep back the sea.

Before her crept up the tide,
Behind her arose the towers
That rise in stately pride Round Isis's mystic bowers:

To mask each yawning gap,
Where the rampart is crumbling down:
On her head was a trencher cap,
On her back was a Master's gown.

Proudly that gown she wore,
As one of her worth aware;
And her mop handle bore
"Tests," carved in letters fair.

Now and anon she backed,
"High and dry" from reach of the brine,
To save her reticule, packed
With Articles Thirty-and-Nine,

In the which, as her ballast and stay,
And sheet-anchor she seemed to confide,
As in forcible-feeble way
She apostrophised the tide:

"If it's coming—let it come,
Dame Partington is here?
Wild waves might frighten some;
Dame Partington knows no fear.

"These waves may rise and roar,
And with weaker bars make free;
But e'er they flood this shore
They've to deal with my mop and me!"

"Through sand the brine might sop,
But 'tis rock on which I stand;
What I hold looks like a mop,
But it is a magic wand.

"Though ocean come up like 'the bore,'
It comes but to lick my feet—
The swifter its rise, the more Precipitate its retreat!"

"I trust to the articles here,
This impious sea to stop;
I trust to the walls in my rear,—
But most I trust to my mop.

"And if the friends I serve
From the raging and roaring deep,
Their walls wish to preserve, They'll see that this mop I keep!"

"For save this mop is nought
That trusted to can be,
'Gainst the wild wave of free thought,
And inquiry's rising sea.

"Dame Partington is here
At her post to resist the main;
And if saucy waves come near,
To sweep 'em back again!"

"But rob me of my mop,
And gone is my magic power;
My articles I drop
For the wild waves to devour.

"My rock is turned to sand;
My towers and walls decay:
Free thought is lord of the land,
And sweeps altar and throne away!"

"If your loaves and fishes you'd save,
And crozier and mitre a-top,
Sole barrier against the wave,
Uphold Dame Partington's mop!"

REVIEW.

A Lecture on Compulsory Education: By Thomas Ainsworth. London: Whitfield, Manchester: Johnson and Rawson.

On a subject that is justly engaging general attention, this lecture presents us, in a fresh and lively manner, with the views not only of a man of thought and cultivation, but one who, by the practical interest which he has long taken in that subject, has a special claim to be heard upon it. Admitting that "compulsory" is a word disagreeable to every one, and to none more than to a free-born Briton, Mr. Ainsworth points out how many things we are all of us compelled, daily and hourly, to do for ourselves, which either our physical or moral constitution says is for the benefit of ourselves or society; and as the clothing and feeding of his children is compulsory on every father, and clothing and feeding the mind is not less worthy of attention, he rightly judges that if a father will not do his duty in regard to the latter, the law should step in and compel him to do it, as it does in regard to the former, or do it for him and make him pay for it.

Referring to his own experience, Mr. Ainsworth says:

"I probably should not have been so great an advocate of compulsory education had I not been compelled myself to be a compulsory educator; but from flax mills being under the Factory Act, I could not give employment to young children from eight to thirteen years of age, unless those children were attending some school and receiving regular instruction. My doctrine is, that if a thing is worth doing at all, it is worth doing well; and I therefore endeavoured to get a good teacher who would be perfectly honest, teach well, and do his duty faithfully; and I gave the best pledge of my good faith by putting a master to teach others whom I thought good enough to teach my own children."

Of the excellence of the education thus furnished, all who have ever been present at an examination of the school at Cleator are well aware, and no better proof of this could be given than the position which Mr. Ainsworth's sons have taken in University College, London. The result of this compulsory system is that the children, besides paying for their own education, take something home to their parents weekly, acquire habits of industry and good manners, and a considerable amount of useful knowledge; and the farmers in the neighbourhood, feeling that it would never do for their children to be behind those in the mill, send them as much as three or four miles to share with them in the advantages offered by the school. This seems to us the right way of setting to work, and one in which many of our large manufacturers might render most important service.

Mr. Ainsworth's experience enables him to give the Bishop of Oxford a well-merited rebuke for some of the foolish things which he vented in his speech at Tunbridge Wells. He says:

"He drew a picture of an imaginary half-timer, that he called his 'lout,' and of course the Bishop, having a tongue in his head—and a glib one too,—a vivid imagination, and no one to contradict him, went on touching up with irony this picture, till at last he produced a picture of a lout who would not go to school, who would play marbles instead, and who would not, and could not, plough. Logically, he was not a lout because he went to school, but because he did not go; but you know in fancy sketches we are not particular. Well, I cannot put a half-time educated lout against his, because we have no louts; but I know we could put an educated half-timer against the Bishop himself, and this half-time boy (or girl, if he chooses) will work against him sums in decimals and fractions as quick, and perhaps quicker, and as correct, and perhaps more correctly, than the Bishop himself."

Our space will not allow us to show how judiciously Mr. Ainsworth handles the "religious difficulty"; and we must content ourselves with merely giving the outlines of the plan which, if made law, he conceives would do away with all difficulties:

"1. No person shall receive any benefit, pecuniary or otherwise, from a child's labour under thirteen years of age, unless such child is being educated as under the Factory Act. 2. When parents or guardians plead poverty, then the school fees of such child shall be paid by the Board of Guardians as parochial relief. 3. The inspectors of the workhouse schools shall visit every school where these children are instructed, and, if the school is up to the required mark, allow the Capitation Grant. 4. If not, then withhold the grant for the first year; and if in the second year the teaching is still below the mark, then remove the children. 5. In this last extremity let Government assist in building a school, and let the ratepayers appoint a teacher, Government retaining the power to dismiss such teacher if not competent as shown in No. 4."

Those who are interested in the important subject of which it treats—and who is not?—will find in this lecture not a few thoughts deserving of consideration, and some hints that may be turned to practical account.

MISTRANSLATIONS IN THE AUTHORISED VERSION.—No. XXVII.

Daniel iii. 21. "These men were bound in their coats, their hosen, their hats, and their other garments." More correctly, "In their loose trousers, their coats, their turbans, and their robes." The eastern dress is carefully described. So in verse 27, "Neither were their loose trousers changed." These linen trousers would be very readily burnt if the fire could have had any power.

Daniel iv. 17. "This matter is by the decree of the watchers." More correctly, "Of the guardian angels." This doctrine of guardian angels watching over mankind is more fully taught in the Book of Enoch, a work written in the first century before the Christian era; but it is sadly obscured in Dr. Laurence's translation by his use of this unfortunate word "watcher." This portion of the Book of Daniel may be about a century older than the Book of Enoch.

Daniel vi. 2. "That the princes might give accounts unto them." More correctly, "The satraps," a name for eastern governors with which we are familiar, and which it is interesting to meet with here.

Daniel vii. 13. "And, behold, one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven." More correctly, "Like a son of man," that is to say, "In mortal shape." The same correction should be made in Revelation i. 13, where the writer says that he saw Jesus in heaven after his death, and describes him in form as "like a son of man." We might almost suppose that from this passage the title for Jesus in the Gospel was borrowed.

Daniel vii. 18. "The saints of the most High shall take the kingdom." More correctly, "The holy people," meaning the Jewish nation. So also in the following verses.

Daniel vii. 26. "But the judgment shall sit." More correctly, "The judges."

Daniel viii. 5. "An he goat came from the west on the face of the whole earth, and touched not the ground." More correctly, "And no one came near to him on the earth," he was so much stronger than his enemies.

Daniel ix. 25. "Unto the Messiah, the Prince, shall be seven weeks." More correctly, "Unto an anointed ruler," meaning probably Ezra the priest.

Daniel ix. 26. "And after three score and two weeks shall Messiah be cut off." More correctly, "Shall an anointed one be cut off, meaning probably King Aristobulus, who was dethroned by the Romans, sixty-two weeks, or 434 years later.

Daniel ix. 27. "And for the overspreading of abominations he shall make it desolate." More correctly, "And upon the battlements shall be the abominations of desolation," meaning the standards of the Roman army, the emblems of their conquest of Jerusalem.

Daniel xi. 16. "He shall stand in the glorious land." Better perhaps, "In the land of beauty," meaning Palestine. In chap. viii. 9, these words are translated, "The pleasant land." It is important that they should be always rendered in the same way.

NATURAL AND UNNATURAL THEOLOGY.

In the Address which we noticed last week, the Rev. T. P. Kirkman relates the following anecdote:

"Not long ago I was travelling by railway with some intelligent young people, when a clergyman of my acquaintance, of the Roman Catholic sect, entered our carriage. After cordially shaking hands with me, he told us that he had just been making inquiries at the house of a dying clergyman of our church, well known to me, whose death was hourly expected, an aged and a most worthy and hospitable Protestant divine of the last generation. He lamented exceedingly the loss which hung over him of one of his warmest, closest, and kindest friends. I was glad to hear of such intimacy; but feeling a little mischievous, I affected surprise, and I asked how it was possible that he could cherish such feelings of regard and regret towards the dying man. Said I, 'You are quite certain that his soul will not be saved.' He replied frankly, and I believed and now believe that he was sincere, 'On the contrary, I have no doubt whatever that his soul is saved!' 'But,' I replied, 'he is a heretic, and an old one; he has held and taught our Protestant heresies all his life: how can you believe that?' 'Ah!' he answered, 'there is nothing so unreasonable as the way in which you are always attributing uncharitable judgments to us Catholics. Our dying friend has been one of the best and most benevolent of men: he has never been what we call a learned man, nor troubled himself about controversy: the church has condemned his errors; but his has not been wilful and obstinate error: it has been involuntary, and therefore pardonable, ignorance. The anathemas of the church do not fall on such cases at all.' It would have been professionally good taste in me to have left the matter just so, and not to have disturbed those comfortable cushions. But I still felt rather wicked; and I said, 'All that is very good; but what think you then of my case? Here am I, who have always been more or less of a learned man, and who have troubled myself about controversy. It is impossible for me to escape for my ignorance. If I were to die in this carriage, glorying to be, as I have ever been, the wilful and obstinate antagonist of your church, would you have any hope of my soul's salvation? Speak out like a man!' The good priest, being thus cornered, and publicly put upon his cursing mettle, looked as serious as he could, and answered—'not a hope in the world.' I laughed and assured him that I had plenty of hope for him. Now if, instead of that conversation, my death had occurred in that carriage, and if the worthy priest, as would probably have been the case, had been invited to my funeral, and asked after dinner, by one of my sons, what hope he had of my salvation, I am perfectly certain that he would have given a very comforting reply—'Your father was an excellent and conscientious Christian man, who sought for the truth, but in some points failed to find it. There was that in his education and in the constitution of his mind, which invincibly prevented his finding it. His was a case of that involuntary and therefore pardonable error, against which the anathemas of the church were never meant to be directed. There can be no doubt of his salvation.' Such would have been the oracle. That Romish divine is personally and privately, that is, if you abstain from treading on the tail of his sectarian loyalty, or on the hoof of his supernatural priestly powers, an amiable and honourable gentleman. But he is a victim, like so many others, of the shameful dishonesty of our church systems, which go on, century after century, training trustful young men, and sending them out, under vows, subscriptions, and penalties, to preach to the poor, the simple, and the young the truculent curses of their orthodoxies, leaving them to find out—if, under the frowns of those silent dignitaries, the momentum of sectarian impulse, and the terror of those cruel infidels Ignorance and Bigotry, they have the power and the courage to think—that their own solemn tutors and professors did not, and do not, believe those curses, except in a sense non-natural, that is, nonsensical and most unmanly, and that they are at liberty, so long as they assert them publicly and generally, to quibble, and to quibble, and to quibble out of them, within the entire circle of their private comfort and convenience."

INDIA'S CLAIM UPON OUR CHURCHES.

It will be a happy circumstance if Miss CARPENTER's visit to India should awaken greater interest among Englishmen in general, and English Unitarians in particular, in the welfare of that remarkable country. It is impossible to read her account of that unusual journey without sympathising profoundly, not only with the philanthropic feeling which suggested it, but with the great purposes it was meant to serve. The vast populations of India are, for better or for worse, under our rule. They are not strangers and foreigners to us, but members of the household of our empire; fellow-subjects and fellow-citizens with us. Our responsibility for them is as real, though not so near and pressing, as our responsibility for the heathen population of our own country; and our power to help them is almost as great. Miss CARPENTER has pointed out the way in which that responsibility may be discharged, and that help be given. In such a country as India education is the preliminary of conversion. The worst and most degrading of the superstitions which afflict the people are exactly those which education destroys. Among the Hindoo gentlemen who have been educated in the Government schools all faith in Hindooism seems to have perished. Science, history, and the spirit of English literature have combined to emancipate them from the sway of superstition, and have led many of them to desire some social changes which would bring Eastern society more into accordance with Western civilisation and thought. But the obstacle to further reform is the ignorance of the women. Superstition keeps its hold upon them, and through them upon society. Their education is so miserably imperfect that Western influences do not even reach them. But that education can only be made more perfect by compliance with their customs. Those customs forbid girls over eleven, or at latest twelve, coming in contact with men; and as there are in India only male teachers, all the girls leave school under twelve years of age, and any further education they may afterwards receive can be but such as is given them by women almost as ignorant as themselves in the seclusion of the zenana. This evil can only be remedied by the education of a large number of female teachers, and Miss CARPENTER has therefore proposed to the Indian Government the establishment of a training school for this purpose. But the supply of superintendents for this school, and of students to be trained, must go in the first place from England. Indian women cannot help themselves—Englishwomen must help them. Miss CARPENTER's scheme will probably be accepted by the Indian Government, and it will then become necessary for some appeal to be made to young Englishwomen to take part in it. Such an appeal will offer to some in our own congregations as noble an opportunity as faith could desire. It will be particularly an opportunity for Unitarians, as it is one for that indirect action in the promotion of religious reform for which hasty enthusiasm is unfit and fanaticism is absolutely disqualified. That liberal faith which can be tolerant even to other religions, which can believe that the great Shepherd may have other sheep which are not of our fold, and which can reverence earnestness and devotion and purity of heart, even when they wear the livery of a foreign creed, can alone deal with Indian civilisation. The kingdom of CHRIST will not come with observation in India any more than it did in Europe. It will not overcome Hindooism by direct assault. It will be like a leaven hid in the great mass and bulk of Hindoo society, and working secretly there until the whole is leavened.

But while this must be peculiarly the case with any effort among the female population of India, there is another portion of the population which is already open to direct Christian appeal and teaching. India may probably have to pass from the rank luxuriance of superstition through the desert of unbelief before she comes to the land flowing with milk and honey of a rational and sanctifying faith. But the present condition of things is, that there are multitudes who are already in the desert waiting for a guide. The manhood of Hindostan, so far as it is educated, has thrown off Hindoo superstition, but has found nothing as yet which can occupy its place. Trinitarianism can do nothing for such men. The doctrines of incarnation and atonement are to them only a step back again into the systems they have left behind them. The notion of verbal inspiration and an infallible scripture, unlearned as regards their own sacred literature, will not be learned again respecting the sacred literature of another people, even though it enshrines a higher faith. Everything combines to show that it is the Unitarian form of Christian faith which is alone suitable to such persons. They are not like the African race—emotional, and to be won by mere feeling apart from thought; they are of an intellectual subtlety which no race excels, and are only to be brought to Christianity by a rational process. Unitarianism alone can appeal to reason and be content to stand or fall by its decision; and to Unitarianism, in some form or other, the Hindoo mind will come when it comes to CHRIST. Yet, unhappily, of all religious bodies ours is doing the least for India. There is one Unitarian chapel there, and that is not supported by any aid from us. Miss CARPENTER speaks encouragingly of the good work Mr. ROBERTS is doing at Madras; but he is not able to give his whole time to his evangelistic duties. In the other presidential capitals, men would be glad to hear of a Christianity without the obnoxious dogmas, and there is nobody to tell them of it. The Unitarian Association have expressed their desire to take the matter up, and have appealed for help to do so. Their proposal is to aid Mr. ROBERTS, and to send Unitarian books, and possibly an Unitarian missionary to India. It is a sufficiently modest attempt, and we cannot doubt that it will meet with a response. Our people are by no means overdone by their labours at home. Often as they are told by false friends that the Broad Church is doing their work in this country, not even indifference, looking for an excuse to neglect its duty, can assure them that any Broad Church is doing their work in India. There, as well as here, a great work waits to be done, and we must do it. Providence has set before us an open door, and bids us enter it. The appeal of the Unitarian Association ought to be met with such an exhibition of liberality as would enable them not only to secure the entire devotion of Mr. ROBERTS to his labours in Madras, but to engage the services of one of our ablest men as missionary to Calcutta. As Englishmen we owe a duty to India, as Unitarians we owe a duty to our faith, and we can discharge both at once by a liberal, timely, and efficient support to an effort to which we are so manifestly called by Providence. Miss CARPENTER's example ought to create a new era of awakened interest in India. Let it begin among those who belong to the same household of faith with herself.

MR. GLADSTONE'S RESOLUTIONS.

No measure of greater importance has for a very long time been debated by the Commons of England, than that brought under their consideration by the three resolutions respecting the Irish Church which, on Monday last, Mr. GLADSTONE gave notice of his intention to propose on that day week. The first of them is:

"That in the opinion of this House it is necessary that the Established Church of Ireland should cease to exist as an establishment, due regard being had to all personal interests and to all individual rights of property."

This, no doubt, is what the friends of the Government term it, simply an abstract resolution, and the House in general is, not unreasonably, indisposed to occupy itself with such resolutions; but as soon as this was read it was distinctly seen that it was charged with practical consequences of the utmost moment, and the ringing cheers with which it was received by nearly the whole of the once more united Liberal party must have sounded in the ears of their opponents like a funeral knell for the downfall of the Establishment which, notwithstanding its manifest injustice and mischievous results, they have laboured to keep up.

The second resolution is:

"That, subject to the foregoing considerations, it is expedient to prevent the creation of new personal interests by the exercise of any public patronage, and to confine the operations of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners of Ireland to objects of immediate necessity or involving individual rights, pending the final decision of Parliament."

This is no more than a necessary sequel to the first resolution, since it is obvious that the effect of that would be destroyed if an opening were left for indefinitely filling up vacancies as the old incumbents died off.

The third resolution is a merely technical one: That an address be presented to the Queen praying her to place at the disposal of Parliament her interest in the temporalities of the various ecclesiastical dignities and benefices in Ireland.

The debate on these resolutions, which there can be little doubt will occupy the whole of next week, will be full of interest and excitement. Those who feel with us that the time has come when that which has been so long felt as an intolerable grievance by the great bulk of the Irish people, and been the cause of so much bitter discontent, must be dealt with in a firm and decided manner, will carefully mark the part which their representatives take in this great issue, and be prepared to treat them accordingly.

STRAUSS ON THE CHRIST.

We take the following from Charles Ritter's recent French translation of Strauss's Theological Soliloquies :—

"As mankind cannot dispense with religion, no more can it dispense with Christ; for to attempt to preserve religion whilst abandoning Christ would be as foolish as to seek to enjoy poetry whilst abandoning Homer, Shakspeare, and all the great poets. And this Christ, who is inseparable from the highest ideal of religion, is an historical and not a mythical Christ, a person and not a symbol. What constitutes this personal, historical, and immortal Christ is—whatever in his life is a manifestation of his religious perfection: his discourses, his acts, his sufferings. All in his life that has no direct moral significance,—for instance, his miracles, and yet more, purely external events—such as his death, resurrection, and ascension—can have a religious value only if interpreted symbolically, and this symbolic interpretation itself will differ according to different degrees of religious and intellectual development. Let us, then, have no fear of losing Christ, even when we see ourselves obliged to renounce many beliefs hitherto deemed essential to Christianity. Christ will remain to us, and will remain to all with increasing certainty in proportion as we resist the temptation to obstinately preserve those doctrines which repel from him those who know and think. Now, if Christ remains to us, and remains to us as the highest religious ideal which thought can conceive, as that which dwells in all truly pious hearts, may we not justly say that with him there remains to us all that is essential in Christianity?"

FIRESIDE READINGS.

THE ELECTRIC WIRE.

EDWARD CAPERN.
LIFE is a wire,
A work sublime,
Stretching across
The dial of time;
From shore to shore,
From sea to sea,
From Hath-Been
To the vast To-Be:
Commencing, ending,
With a breath;
Its outer coils
Are life and death;
And its connectors
A long range
Of joys and sorrows,
Change on change:
From the deep Hath-Been Comes the fire,
The spirit of
One mortal wire,
The soul of thought
That stirs the brain,
The thrill of mirth,
The throb of pain;
And just as the Electric flame
Flies to the spot
From whence it came,
A subtle flash,
A mystic spark,
Heaven's fiery courier
Of the dark,
So seeks the soul
Her native skies
When back to God
The spirit flies.

THE LITTLE VOYAGERS.

ONE day some children chanced to find themselves together upon the ocean, each in a little boat, and they said to each other, "How came we here, and where are we going?" But no one could answer. They sailed pleasantly on for many days; for the sea was calm, and the sunlight sparkled around them. But by degrees they grew weary of gliding over the waves, and hoped they should soon come to land. Often they talked to each other about what country they should like to visit.

One morning Lieto, the favourite among them, told them he had dreamed they came to an island full of beautiful things; so exceedingly beautiful that he could not well see what they were, he had been so entranced with delight. The birds were so tame that they came and nestled in his bosom, and sang to him confidentially all about their mates and their little ones. He said he was resolved not to land till they arrived at this paradise of his dream. The children all wanted to go there, and asked him to be their guide. He told them he did not know the way, but he should know the place again the moment he saw it. So they all agreed to follow him, and set their sails to the wind that they might be borne swiftly over the waters till they came within sight of that lovely place, which they named the Golden Island.

Presently they saw a whale spouting a high jet of water into the air, and one of them exclaimed, "Oh, look at that beautiful fountain! Let us go ashore here, for this is the Golden Island." The others called out to him that it was only a whale; but he would not believe them, and jumped on the huge creature's back. There he ran about with great delight, played with the glowing diamonds of the water-spout, and called out to the others that it was the most wonderful place in the world. Suddenly the whale plunged into the deep sea, and the little boy was swallowed up by the great waves.

The others sailed on, and after a day or two came to a mountain rising directly from the sea, covered with flowers and waving trees. They exclaimed, "What a lovely place! Surely this is the land of the dream!" But Lieto said, "No, no! This is only a volcanic island. If you stay here, fires will burst forth and destroy you." Some of the children would not believe him; and springing ashore, they ascended the mountain, gathering fruits and flowers, and mocking the birds with their merry songs. They had scarcely reached the summit when a great cloud of smoke rolled up into the sky, flames darted forth, and lava poured down the sides of the mountain.

When the little voyagers saw their companions thus overwhelmed by fire, they looked sadly at each other, and sadly on the wide sea, that rolled its great waves darkly around them. On and on they went for many days. At length they came to an iceberg. The sun shining brightly upon it, arrayed it in rainbow colours, and one of the children exclaimed: "It is a fairy palace. I will stay here." The others warned him that it was only an iceberg; but in vain. He climbed its slippery sides, and gaining the top, looked down in triumph upon his companions. They left him there, slowly sailing over the sea, as if upon a jewelled throne. But the iceberg melted away, day by day, and at last sank with him into the cold waves.

The others came now to the region of ice and snow, which shone so brilliantly in the light that one of them thought it was the Golden Island. His companions assured him he would find nothing there except the North Pole; but he jumped ashore and walked about quite elated. The others were all shivering with cold, and sailed away as fast as possible. Seeing nobody near, and only a wide tract of snow stretching out to the horizon, the foolish boy kept exclaiming: "I am king of the earth! I am king of the earth!" But he soon became so cold that he wrapt himself up in a bear skin he had found, and ran swiftly up and down to keep himself warm. Whenever any sailors came near, he called out to them to come ashore; but he looked so shaggy and growled so strangely to himself that they were afraid of him.

The voyagers kept on their way, and came to an island, on which stood a little weather-beaten hut. One of them exclaimed: "Oh, what a pretty cottage! I will go and live there." No sooner had he entered than a hundred pigmies started up from the ground and piled pebbles all round it. He ran to the doors and windows, but they chased him from one to another, throwing sand into his eyes, until he could no longer see. He sat there in darkness and perished with hunger.

Now there were but few children left, and one said: "I wish we could come to some place where men lived. I would most certainly land there, and not float about any more in search of the Golden Island."

Just then they came within sight of a great ship at anchor; and the boy scrambled up her sides, shouting to the others to follow. The captain received him with a friendly welcome, and he rejoiced much at being in such a fine safe vessel. But presently a storm rose, and huge waves tumbled around them. The tall masts were torn down, and the ship sank to the bottom, bearing the boy down with her.

The little boat sailed through the storm, and came to a sunny sea, where a beach of white sand glistened before them. A grove of waving palm-trees stretched out into the ocean, and many of them said: "We shall find a home here. The palm-trees will give us shelter, and we can feed upon dates."

Lieto tried to dissuade them from landing; but only one child would listen to him. The others went on shore, and laying themselves down on the grass, soon fell asleep. Presently, a loud roaring was heard, and fierce lions rushed from the wood to devour them.

The two who were left sailed along, cheering each other on their way. At length they saw upon a little island a glittering pagoda. The loveliest flowers were wreathed around it, and Marcolo said, "This is the Golden Isle." Lieto assured him it was not; but he answered, "Oh, yes, it must be. Don't you see what an enchanting place it is?" His boat glided gently up to the beach; but he had no sooner landed than the flowers clustered round him so that he was bound hand and foot. Overpowered by their fragrance, he fell upon the ground.

Lieto left him there in a trance, and sailed away, sadly and alone. For days and days he saw nothing but the great waves rolling round him, and the silent sky above. The sun burnt fiercely on his head, and he longed for the shelter of a cloud. The clouds soon gathered, dark and threatening; thunder boomed overhead, lightnings flashed, and great billows dashed him to and fro. He saw huge black rocks, and fought valiantly with the waves, that he might not be shipwrecked on them. Then he steered his way into a region of heavy mists. Day after day he sailed along, seeing neither sun nor moon, and guided by a single star, that shone dimly through the great mass of vapour.

The wind ceased, and it became a dead calm. Every moment it grew colder and colder, and he was obliged to row with all his force that he might not be frozen to death. At last, the morning star shone through the darkness, and daylight began to dawn. When he saw the sun rising his heart was gladdened, and he exclaimed:

"To-day I shall see the Golden Island!"

He followed the course of the sun, rowing diligently, and toward noon he heard a low, mysterious tune, like the sighing of winds in the pines. He laid down his oars and listened with trembling hope. Presently the sound rolled forth full and deep, like the tones of an organ; and the waves which bore him along mingled their cadence with the song. As he approached the shore he beheld broad verdant fields and gently swelling hills, from the midst of which rose stately temples and towers of amethyst. Silver fountains leaped into the light. Brilliant birds floated on the air. Graceful trees trailed their long branches to the ground; and little children danced in and out among the waving foliage. Rich music floated through all the island. Now it was solemn and slow, and now so joyful and strong that it pervaded all the air, and soared upward to the sun; now it was sweet and clear, like the laughter of a child; and now so faint and tremulous that it seemed swayed hither and thither by the summer breeze.

Lieto knew at once that this was the paradise of his dream. He sprang ashore and knelt on the mossy ground to thank God for bringing him to such a beautiful place.

Soon he fell asleep to the lullaby of the music and the waters, and he dreamed of floating on white downy clouds, with winged spirits, who said: "Yonder, in our stars, are places more beautiful than this, and one day thou shalt wake and find thyself with us there."—Rainbows for Children.

THE CROOKED STICK.

JAMES THERRELL, an old carpenter on Salisbury Plain, said to a young Christian who complained that she was unworthy to serve the Lord, "I used to think as you do, but the Lord taught me otherwise by a crooked stick. One day my son went to a sale of timber, and in the lot he bought was a piece so twisted and bent that I said sharply, 'It will be of no use.' 'Wait a bit—don't fret, let us keep a look-out, father,' said the lad, 'there is a place somewhere for it.' And so it proved, for soon after, when I was building a house, there was a corner to turn in, and not a stick in the yard would fit it. I thought of the crooked one, and fetched it. It seemed as if the tree had grown aside for that purpose. 'There,' said I, 'there is a place for the crooked stick, after all; and there's a place for poor James Therrell! Dear Lord, show him the place in which he may fit in the building of the heavenly temple.' That very day, poor and unlearned as I was, there was a work for me. And so there is a work for you to do, and nobody else can do it."

Mr. George Brown, of Barnard Castle.

BARNARD CASTLE lies so far from the great highways of English life, and our little congregation there has been so necessarily isolated from the rest of our churches, that the name of George Brown of that place, occurring in our last week's obituary, might strike but few of our readers. And yet it was a name known and regarded with a rare respect throughout Durham and the whole North Riding, and beloved by all our little flocks in those parts. A dissenter, a pervert from Methodism, who had at one time aroused the bitter opposition of his old friends by strongly advocating his new views of truth, and not only a Unitarian but a Unitarian who preached in the little chapel Sunday by Sunday, his townsmen felt that in him they had lost their ablest man; his funeral became spontaneously a public one, and the Parish Church rang muffled peals during the service.

The story of Mr. Brown's life is soon told, for it was not an eventful one, though crowded with useful labours. Left an orphan at 13, he had ever after to depend entirely on his own exertions. His start in this self-dependent life was as office-boy for a solicitor. From office-boy he rose to be clerk, and by and by was appointed clerk to the guardians of Teasdale Union, in which office he continued for five-and-twenty years. Concurrently with this he opened a printing office. At this time the tide of awakened religious thought in which Mr. Joseph Barker was cast out from the New Connexion was sweeping over the northern counties, and creating great excitement among the various Methodist bodies. Mr. Brown was thoroughly carried along with it, and pursued his inquiries until he found himself one with the little Unitarian flock, who, under the name of "Free Christians," were holding their meetings in a humble cottage. He was not a man to stop at half measures when he thought the good of his fellow-creatures was concerned, and deeply feeling the value of the faith he had adopted he threw himself heartily into the task of spreading it. Under the signature of "A Layman" he sent forth from his press pamphlet after pamphlet, exposing in lucid and forcible sentences the errors of the popular ideas. The storm of opposition which he raised may be well imagined, but he kept quietly on, and gradually won his way to the confidence and honour even of those who most differed from him. In fact, heretic or no heretic, Barnard Castle could not do without him. His shrewdness and ability in public business, his spirit of high, scrupulous, Christian honour, his enthusiasm for every good cause, and his tenacious perseverance in every work he took up, gradually became conspicuous to all, and though a man of singularly modest and retiring character, he insensibly came, by the simple gravitation of natural ability, to occupy a leading place in every movement affecting the industrial, intellectual, or moral wellbeing of his town. When the Darlington and Stockton Times was started he was its first editor. Of the Mechanics' Institute he was one of the founders, for some time secretary, and for much longer the leading spirit. When the great railway projects, running from Darlington westward, were started, he was chosen secretary, and amidst great opposition and discouragement superintended and carried to a successful issue works which, in the novelty of railway enterprise, were a gigantic undertaking, thus being brought into contact with the leading men of the whole district on the various boards, and becoming even more widely known and respected. During the fearful visitation of cholera, in 1849, Mr. Brown was indefatigable in his labours, and onerous as was the self-imposed task he undertook, he worked hard and bravely as long as a single case remained. The state of things revealed at this time roused him and others to the necessity of adopting strong sanitary measures; and, with his accustomed ardour, he set to work, nor did he rest until the town was put under the operation of the Public Health Act. Here, again, his pre-eminent fitness recommended him to the office of clerk, an office which he held until his rapidly-multiplying engagements led him to resign it.

All this time he was a diligent reader and student. A very early riser, in the summer he would spend his mornings in the open air, cultivating his love at once of nature and of science, and making himself thoroughly skilled in the botany and geology of the district; while in the winter, books were his companions, the works of Mill, Jowett, Stanley, and all the great thinkers of the day being his constant companions.

Some eight years ago he resolved to take a further step in advance, and without saying a word to any one, even to his own family, he quietly set himself in the midst of his multifarious work to study for the bar. The first time the writer ever saw him was just after he had successfully passed his examinations and been "called" in the Middle Temple, while his family were still full of the mystification which they had felt about his secret studies and occasional unaccountable absences in London, when he had gone up to "eat his terms." Giving up his previous position as clerk to the guardians to practice in his new profession, he was at once elected on the board, and made, first, vice-chairman, and a year or two later, chairman—an office he held to his death. In fact, there has not been an institution or movement in Barnard Castle for the last thirty years that has not the impress of his earnest spirit and organising skill stamped upon it. His solicitude for the poor was intense, and his efforts to ameliorate their condition only ceased with his life. No man in the neighbourhood was so universally consulted; men of every class looked to his calm, thoughtful judgment with singular confidence; and no man was more ready to afford counsel, even, as often was the case, at great personal inconvenience. To those who knew him in his beautiful and simple private life he was still more endeared. A man of deep religious spirit, loving the Bible more year by year, his home was a sanctuary of tender affection and happy piety. In the multitude of his engagements he found time to prepare for the services of the little Unitarian Chapel, which were conducted by him oftener than by any other of the few friends who, in the inability to sustain a minister, led the worship there; and we have often heard from those who have attended, of the thoughtfulness and interest of his preaching, and of the intensely reverential spirit which characterised his services.

For some time back his health had been failing, and he had been obliged to relax a little in his labours. His last sermon was on the words, "O death, where is thy sting?" After that he gradually grew weaker, and at last had to keep his bed. Here, still busying himself while he was able over a little task he had in hand, that of arranging a supplement of hymns for the chapel, with many conversations never to be forgotten with his old fellow-workers, and cheered throughout by an unutterable joy of faith in God, he passed to his rest on the 12th instant.

A Wesleyan fellow-townsmen a few days ago laid his hand upon the shoulder of one of Mr. Brown's sorrowing Unitarian friends, and said, "You and I will not live to see his like again."

MIDLAND CHRISTIAN UNION.

THE fifth general (second annual) meeting was held at Oldbury last Monday week. The Rev. B. WRIGHT read prayers, and the Rev. SAM'L BACHE preached from Ephesians, iv. 15, his subject being—"Integrity and charity in matters of religious opinion." His object was to show that fidelity to individual conviction and genuine catholicity of spirit are not opposed to each other; that, on the contrary, they are co-ordinate and equally essential to the true Christian idea. The sermon exhibited the preacher's well-known characteristics—lucidity of statement, logical consistency, and deep earnestness, and was listened to with marked attention.

At the close of the service a meeting for business was held. Among those present some part of the day were the following gentlemen:—Herbert New, Esq., President, in the chair; Revs. S. Bache, C. Clarke, B. Wright, J. Wilson, Birmingham; J. Gordon, Evesham; W. Cochrane, Cradley; H. Eachus, Coseley; J. Kedwards, Lye; H. McKean, Oldbury; J. Birks, Kingswood; J. Dean, Tamworth; C. F. Bliss, Wolverhampton; R. H. Cotton, Liverpool; and D. Maginnis, Stourbridge; Messrs. S. B. Whitfield, treasurer; J. Coppock, H. Payton, F. Grew, R. D. Kneebone, I. R. Mott, and S. Greenway, Birmingham; W. G. Hopkins, Kidderminster; J. Kirtland, Wolverhampton; W. Drury, J. Morgan, and R. McCully, Oldbury; and A. Culwick, Spon Lane.

The Rev. D. MAGINNIS, one of the hon. secretaries, read the annual report, of which the following is a summary:—

"At the commencement of the year the society was pledged to supply with a Sunday service each three preaching stations, namely, Alcester, Spon Lane, and Barr-street (Birmingham), and these stations had been supplied throughout the year.

"Alcester.—No marked change. The attendance of adults at the usual afternoon service, from twenty to forty. At a special evening service, the Rev. John Gordon lectured on Ritualism, a subject which local circumstances had invested with special interest, to an audience of about 200. The inaccessibility of this station had rendered it difficult to supply; but the early opening of a new line of railway, which passes through Alcester, will remove this difficulty, and, it is hoped, enable supplies to render more efficient aid, especially in establishing a Sunday school and kindred activities.

"Spon Lane.—The secretary of this congregation reported: 'Our attendance at the Sunday evening services averages about 25 adults, most of whom have been with us for several years, and 10 or 12 of the elder scholars also attend pretty regularly. Our Sunday school is languishing for want of teachers. The savings' club in connection with the school has been successful. The congregation had not increased. This was to be attributed partly to the state of trade, which had sensibly affected the condition of the working classes in the district, and partly to special local causes. The room in which the service was held was too far away from the centre of the adjacent population, and was besides so obscurely situated, that the lay preachers had in some cases been utterly unable to find it. It was believed that if the services were transferred from Spon Lane to West Bromwich the chances of success would be greatly increased.

"Barr-street (Birmingham).—The service at this place had been commenced, of their own motion, by a few zealous friends resident in the Barr-street district of the town, but the room will not be available after the present month, when the services will cease.

"Walsall.—During the last eight months the Union had supplied a fourth pulpit at Walsall. In July, the chapel, after being closed for some months, was re-opened. During the summer and autumn the average attendance had been about forty. In January the service had, at the request of the congregation, been altered from morning to evening; and since then the attendance had somewhat fallen off. It had been officially notified that the congregation had decided to close their chapel at the end of this month. The reasons assigned for this decision were—1st, the smallness of the attendance at their services; 2, a desire to nurse their chapel endowments into strength sufficient to enable them, at some future time, to engage the services of a minister; and 3, the presence in one of the Baptist pulpits in the town of a minister whose religious views and services are so liberal that they can 'sit under him' with pleasure and profit. The report expressed deep regret at this decision.

"Worcester.—In January last an application had been made to the Union for a series of Sunday evening services in that city, and it was arranged that a tentative course of six lectures, expository of liberal Christianity, should be given by the Revs. J. Gordon, W. Cochrane, B. Wright, and D. Maginnis. Four of the six had been already delivered in the Corn Exchange to most attentive audiences. The number of adults attending averaged between sixty and seventy. At the close of each service there was a liberal distribution of tracts, given for that purpose by the committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

"Lay Preachers.—For the supplying of all these stations the Union had, unless in the exceptional case of Worcester, been almost entirely dependent upon the lay preachers, without whose esteemed aid the committee would have been quite helpless. At the commencement of the year there were seven lay preachers; the number had now increased to eleven.

"Missionary.—From various causes the appointment had been delayed. The Rev. Robert H. Cotton, of Liverpool, who, as the result of independent inquiry and consequent broadening views, had left the ministry of the Baptist Church, was at present officiating in the district on a short engagement. The committee hoped that the office would not remain much longer unfilled. The field of labour which now opened up to the society could not possibly be occupied with advantage without the assistance of an agent.

"Sunday-school Conference.—At the general meeting of the Union held last September, it had been resolved that in the absence of any local organisation in connection with the liberal Christian churches of the district for encouraging Sunday-school work, the Union should, as far as possible, take the place of a district Sunday-school society. In pursuance of that resolution a conference of teachers and other friends of Sunday schools had been held at the Church of the Messiah, Birmingham, in January. Though the weather was unfavourable, upwards of one hundred persons were present from nineteen schools. The Rev. John Wilson read an admirable paper on the question—"Is the Sunday School a Failure?" A friendly discussion followed, in the course of which many of the difficulties and some of the encouragements of the Sunday-school teacher were touched upon. It was resolved to ask the Union to hold an annual conference on Sunday-school work.

Mr. S. B. WHITFIELD, treasurer, presented the accounts for the year, which exhibited a balance in favour of the society of £40, besides £200 at interest, £40 of uncollected subscriptions (most of which he expected to receive that afternoon), and guarantees to the amount of £35, if needed, for the missionary's salary.

The usual business resolutions followed. In acknowledging the vote of thanks to the president and officers of the past year,

Mr. HERBERT NEW said that he looked back upon the past year with, he would not say discouragement, but he must say depression; and he believed that all the committee shared that feeling. The report exhibited a falling-off in several, and the discontinuance of two of the stations where services were supplied through the society. There was a feeling that the limbs of the Union were not in direct and living contact with the head. They wanted that which the appointment of an able missionary agent would supply; and to such an appointment he (the president) looked forward with very great hope. It was useless to expect an agent of long experience and great preaching powers, and vain to wait until an ideal missionary could be found. The remuneration they had to offer was very moderate, and if they could get a young man with a head on his shoulders, and a heart in his bosom, active, zealous, and interested in the principles and operations of the society (and this they need not despair of attaining), then there would be such an immediate connection between the committee and the stations as would give the work of the Union a good chance of success. There ought to be some responsible person to represent the Union at different places, and deputations of the committee to accompany the agent to visit and revive the flagging of local interest. These and other means would tend to ensure vital relations between the Union and societies and churches of the district. He hoped the new committee would proceed in this work, and occupy with more success the field which lay before them.

In the evening a social meeting of members and friends of the Union was held in the Free School. The attendance was numerous. After tea—the president having been obliged to leave early in consequence of indisposition and domestic affliction—William G. Hopkins, Esq., of Kidderminster, was called to the chair, and addresses were given on various subjects of religious thought and practical interest by Revs. John Wilson, H. Eachus, R. H. Cotton, B. Wright, C. Clark, H. McKean, D. Maginnis, C. F. Bliss, and Messrs. A. D. Kneebone, McCully, and Grew, with some excellent music in the intervals.

The meetings were characterised by the utmost harmony and earnest desire for the increased usefulness of the Union. The proposed closing of the Walsall Chapel was the theme of universal regret and disappointment. Much interest was manifested in the worthy little society at Spon Lane, and a strong desire shown to help it to remove to West-Bromwich. The appointment of a suitable missionary was generally felt to be the one thing desirable to secure the efficiency of the Midland Christian Union.

INTELLIGENCE.

BLACKLEY BAZAAR.—On Tuesday morning, a bazaar in aid of the fund for the erection of a minister's residence, was opened in the Memorial Hall, by Ivie Mackie, Esq., who expressed his sympathy with the object, and concluded his remarks by a donation of £10. The Rev. A. Rushton delivered a short address, and said he should be quite ready to receive the money of those friends who objected to bazaars. There were three stalls tastefully decorated and furnished with useful fancy and ornamental articles, and presided over by Mrs. Rushton, Mrs. Bourne, and Mrs. Brooks. There was also a refreshment stall, presided over by Mrs. Bellhouse. Tuesday was a favourable day, and over £100 was taken. Wednesday was very wet, especially in the evening, and the amount taken was upwards of £30—the total of the two days was £132. At the close of the bazaar a concert was given, Mr. Thos. Rawson presiding at the pianoforte. The cost of erecting the new residence, it is estimated, will be about £300, of which £100 was previously subscribed, so that near £100 will still be required, after paying the expenses of the bazaar. At the close of the proceedings, a cordial vote of thanks was given to all who had rendered any assistance in getting up and superintending the bazaar.

CUPAR-FIFE.—The Rev. H. Williamson, of Dundee, lectured here on Tuesday evening, the 17th inst., on "Endless Punishment." A. Bethune, Esq., of Biebo, was in the chair. There were about 500 persons present. At the close of the lecture, questions were invited from the audience, the answering of which produced considerable excitement, expressed in hisses, laughter, and applause. At the conclusion of the meeting, votes of thanks were given to the chairman and lecturer.

MANCHESTER: LOWER MOSLEY-STREET SCHOOLS. On Monday evening last, the annual meeting of the friends and supporters of this institution was held in the girls' schoolroom, the Rev. Wm. Gaskell, M.A., presiding. There were present the Rev. Jas. Drummond, B.A., W. H. Herford, B.A., Messrs. Eddowes Bowman, M.A., Richard Aspdon, E. C. Harding, Dr. Marcus, and other friends. Dr. Marcus read an elaborate report, which showed the average attendance in the boys' school to have been—In 1867, 343, as against 344 in 1866; in the girls' school in 1867, 160, as against 148 in 1866; in the infants' school in 1867, 228, as against 318 in 1866; and in the Sunday schools—boys, in 1867, average attendance, 432, against 346 in 1866; girls, in 1867, 256, against 248 in 1866. The falling-off in the infant school had arisen from the withdrawal of children in large numbers for the pantomimes; and while the attendance in the Sunday school was on the increase, the number of teachers was on the decrease, so that more help was required. In the financial account there is a balance of about £50 against the institution. All the affiliated institutions are in a healthy condition. The report and financial statement were passed, as were several formal resolutions of thanks. Addresses were delivered by Mr. Brown, Mr. Jesse Pilcher, Dr. Marcus, Mr. Bowman, and the Rev. W. H. Herford.

THE LATE ATH. COQUEREL.—A few weeks ago, the committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association sent a resolution of sympathy on the death of M. Coquerel to the family of the deceased. A formal reply has just been received from Messrs. Ath. Coquerel, fils, and Etienne Coquerel, which was published last week in the Inquirer. More interesting, however, is the following letter which accompanied it to Rev. Robert Spears:

"Paris, 121 bis, Rue de Grenoble, St. Germain, Feb. 17, 1868.

"Dear Sir—I have been prevented by illness from writing to you as I ought, and as I certainly should have done, on the receipt of your kind and eloquent letter, and of the very remarkable and important resolution of the Unitarian Association. My father's death, and the cruel certainty that the injustice and tyranny of men who call themselves the only real Christians have literally, though slowly, preyed upon his strength, and at last destroyed his life under our eyes, have told too much on my health. A large number of Liberal Christians now seize every opportunity to urge upon me the duty of continuing, as much as possible, my father's ministry among them, and I have already, though suffering both in soul and body, endeavoured to do so. But between impaired health and the many difficulties of our religious and political situation (difficulties such as, out of France, it is perhaps impossible to have a just idea of), I have been obliged, very reluctantly, to postpone from day to day the answer I owe you. But I hope you will kindly excuse and ask your friends of the committee also to forgive my seeming neglect or indifference—a feeling quite contrary to the deep gratitude I shall always feel for their brotherly sympathy in the day of grief and bereavement. Receive, dear sir, our very warm and heartfelt thanks, those of my mother and all the members of our family, for the friendly sympathy you have shown us, and for the deep sense you entertain of my father's worth, and of his good service to the cause of Liberal Christianity.—With kind regards, I remain, faithfully yours,

"ATH. COQUEBERT, fils."

THE SIMULTANEOUS COLLECTIONS.

To the Editors.—The question has been raised in your columns whether the day of the annual missionary collections in the North of England could be changed with advantage. In the North Midland district the last Sunday in March was the day originally fixed for these collections. The second Sunday in that month was, however, adopted to meet the wishes of one of the other districts.

That day has always been felt to be undesirable, not only on account of the uncertain weather, but because it is specially inconvenient at Nottingham, as the day on which the judges generally attend at St. Mary's Church previous to opening the assizes.

Our committee would, therefore, have resolved at their recent meeting to return to their original plan of holding these collections on the last Sunday in March, but that, before finally determining upon that course, it was thought better to secure, if possible, the concurrence of the other districts. The Rev. P. W. Clayden therefore gave notice of a motion to propose the change at our next council meeting in June; and meantime I was instructed to ascertain if the day proposed will be convenient to the other districts, and is likely to be adopted by them. I trust the matter will be fairly considered, and that the last Sunday in March will be found a generally suitable day. If I rightly interpreted the feeling of our committee, they have quite decided (though they did not formally resolve) to request the congregations of this district to hold the collections on some day in the year later than the second day in March, and are strongly disposed to recommend the last Sunday in that month for the purpose.—I am, gentlemen, your obedient servant,

A. W. WORTHINGTON, Sec.

SALISBURY CHAPEL.

To the Editors.—In reply to your correspondent, who requests information respecting the old Presbyterian Chapel at Salisbury, I may mention that it has passed out of the hands of the Unitarians about half a century. His correspondent is in error in saying "that the last trustee died without appointing a successor." I have heard my friend the late Rev. Russell Scott, of Portsmouth, state that the last trustee, being timid and doubtful whether he could legally retain the chapel for Unitarian worship after the decision by Lord Eldon against the Unitarians, in the case of the Presbyterian Chapel at Wolverhampton, made over the Salisbury Chapel and its comfortable parsonage house to the Methodists. It was the uncertainty generated by the Wolverhampton case and other similar ones encouraging a crusade against Unitarian chapel property, which ultimately, in 1844, led to the enactment of the Dissenters' Chapels Bill. But this same chapels bill which now protects our property from further aggression, prevented all possibility of regaining the Salisbury Presbyterian Chapel from its present occupants, although they have not the slightest hereditary or doctrinal claim to its possession. I have several times visited the spot, and have cast "longing and lingering looks" at the venerable place of worship. It is now denuded of its pews, and converted into an extensive school-room—the Methodists holding their religious services elsewhere. The loss of this chapel, from the want of energetic effort in time past, should be a lesson to us in time present. I must say that, according to my views, the retention of such places of worship, even where the congregation is small, and perhaps poor, both involves high principle in the remaining few, and is of vast importance to the promulgation of true religion. It is oftentimes the influence of such bands of worshippers, albeit small, which liberalises the religious tone of the towns in which they live. And whilst we are labouring to establish new Unitarian churches, it is glaring inconsistency to give up any ground on which that seed which we regard "as the truth as it is in Jesus" is sown. It is just possible that the ritualistic Bishop of Salisbury—the prosecutor of Dr. Williams for heresy—might not have been quite so ritualistic, and quite so ready to persecute a liberal brother clergyman, had he been subjected to the modifying influence of a wholesome public opinion, resulting from the preaching of enlightened and truly Christian doctrine in the old Presbyterian Chapel in the city of Salisbury.—Yours respectfully, EDMUND KELL.

Southampton, March 23rd, 1868.

THE NEW CHAPEL AT ACCRINGTON.

To the Editors.—The announcement made at the Mission meeting at Heywood, that the building of the chapel at Accrington must come to a standstill if funds were not provided to meet the payments as they fall due, has excited so much interest that the means have been found to prevent this disaster, and the chapel is almost completed. At the same time there is yet more than £100 wanted before all expenses can be defrayed. In the hope that this may be raised before Good Friday, when the chapel is to be opened, I desire to suggest, especially to friends in the East Lancashire district, that much may be done if an effort is made, in each congregation, to collect small subscriptions. I am led to make this suggestion from the excellent result which has followed such a movement in Bury, where many who are comparatively poor, as well as the ladies and younger members of families, the heads of which have already contributed, have rejoiced to have the opportunity offered them of giving to this object. The experience of the zealous friends who have kindly carried out this canvass here leads to the conclusion that, so far from such applications being ill-received, they will be met, almost without exception, with thanks and welcome, as well as rewarded by donations. A similar effort in all the congregations of the district would raise the money we require. It is time that Unitarians ceased to depend principally on the donations of a few rich men and learned the power of many small helps. Not the least resulting benefit will be the increased number of those who will feel they are interested, because they have a share, in our enterprises.

Hoping that many will be found willing to aid in bringing this subscription to a speedy termination, and will thus give due encouragement to our fellow-believers at Accrington, I am, yours truly,
March 25th, 1868. JOHN WRIGHT.

OPENING OF THE HASTINGS UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

The Building Committee have pleasure in announcing that the OPENING SERVICES will take place on Wednesday, May 6th, and that the Rev. R. B. ASPLAND, M.A., has kindly consented to preach the opening Sermon. The Committee trust that as many friends as can make it convenient will be with them on this occasion. The amount already subscribed is £343. 1s. 6d., leaving a balance of about £250 to be raised. The Committee urgently solicit donations towards this amount as they are very desirous of freeing the building from debt before the trust deed is completed, and the building handed over to the Trustees. Amount previously acknowledged

MANCHESTER DOMESTIC MISSIONS

—ROCHDALE ROAD CHAPEL.

In the late severe storms the wall of an adjoining manufactory, which had been left standing after a fire, was blown down, and in its fall destroyed the outbuildings, heating apparatus, &c., of the Rochdale Road Chapel. The Committee are obliged to ask for help towards Rebuilding the premises destroyed; and as the Schools have for some time past been in Want of Proper Class Rooms, avail themselves of this opportunity of erecting them on the ground where the former offices stood, and where the needful accommodation can be obtained for about £100. The street which runs behind the Chapel has to be paved, and this will require an outlay of £30. Nearly £150, therefore, is needed, towards which it is intended to devote the £40 which was given so generously by the Strangeways Sewing School, and also £10 contributed by Mr. Barry, the owner of the adjoining manufactory. £10 will, therefore, have to be raised by voluntary gifts, and the Committee trust that the liberal donations of the supporters of the truly Christian work of the Missions will speedily provide the Funds required.

Subscriptions will be thankfully received by the treasurer, Mr. R. D. DARBISHIRE, B.A., 26, George-street; Rev. W. GASKELL, Rev. S. ROBINSON, St. Oswald's Grove, Rochdale Road; or Rev. S. ALFRED STEINTHAL, 107, Upper Brook-street.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

In presenting a petition on the subject of opening the Universities to dissenters, the Bishop of London argued in favour of the compromise which he suggested viz. that all religious tests should be abolished as qualifying for admission to the Senate of Cambridge or the Senate of Oxford or for professorships, but that the universities should retain the right of electing Fellows and students. Such a plan would not only not satisfy the dissenters, and, as an Anti-Corn-Law says, "it is a very unpleasant interpretation. It comes to our assistance to this measure will agree to give up everything to Dissenters, except the loaves and fishes. They renounce any attempt at distinctive religious teaching; they will show Roman Catholics and Wesleyans, and Jews, Turks, Catholics, and infidels of every shade to fill the universities as scholars, and win the honours of the place; only, they shall not gain a share of the highest pecuniary rewards nor have a voice in the Government."

At a Roman Catholic "laymen's anti-church meeting," in Limerick, Lord Dunraven presiding, a resolution was passed affirming that, while the ecclesiastical revenues of England are appropriated by the national will to the spiritual wants of the majority of the English people, those of Ireland, against the national will, are appropriated to the spiritual wants of less than one-eighth of the Irish people, and that such appropriation is inconsistent with the first principles of justice.

We are glad to learn that it is contemplated to publish, by subscription, the hitherto unpublished poems of Charles Wesley, which appear to be numerous.

Sir Robt. Phillimore gave judgment on Saturday in the two great ritual cases. His decision is, that mixing water with the wine at the Eucharist, elevation of the elements, and censuring of persons and things during the celebration, are illegal; but he conceded to the ritualists the great privilege of having lighted candles on the communion table, and thinks that "excessive kneeling" is a matter which may be left to the discretion of the ordinary. It seems hardly likely that Mr. Mackonochie and his friends will rest satisfied with this decision, but will appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

On Sunday morning a large congregation assembled at St. Albans, curious no doubt to see what effect the decisions of the Dean of Arches would have on the services of the day. At eleven o'clock there was a "high celebration," two large candles on the altar being lighted. The Rev. A. H. Mackonochie entered accompanied by two other priests, all three being arrayed in gorgeously embroidered purple vestments, and knelt in front of the altar. In a moment the censer was swung by an acolyte, and a cloud of incense hid the kneeling priests from the view of the congregation. On the reading of the Gospel the officiating priest was incensed, and during the consecration prayer the cloud of incense was so dense that it was impossible for any one in the body of the church to say whether the elements were elevated after consecration or not. As the incense cleared away the whole congregation knelt, and before the communion was proceeded with sang "O Lamb of God, that takest away the sins of the world, have mercy upon us." The sermon was preached by the Rev. Arthur Henry Stanton, M.A., of Trinity College, Oxford.

During the short time which Church-rates have still to exist, it behoves Dissenters to be on their guard, or they may be saddled with the imposition for years to come, as the case of Whitechurch, in Hampshire, shows. This is a country town with a population a little under two thousand, of which the Dissenters form a majority. In 1863, Church-rates were abolished, and the Nonconformists supposed they would never have to pay anything of the kind again. On Valentine's Day, however, last year, a vestry meeting was called, which only 18 of the parishioners attended, and, the leading Dissenters being absent, a resolution was passed, by 13 against 5, that the sum of £2,000 should be borrowed on the security of the rates, and devoted to rebuilding the parish church, 4 per cent. interest to be paid, and the repayment of the principal to extend over 20 years. All parties were indignant, and the thirteen, who acted mainly under the influence of the lay-rector, were denounced; but strong in the power of the law, they have summoned several of those who have refused to pay; and the recusants, doubting the legality of the laws, have employed Mr. Bennett, of London, to defend them before the magistrates.

The issue raised in Mr. Gladstone's resolutions is so completely the question of the day, that our readers can need no information from us respecting the debates in the House of Commons upon it. Several important meetings on the subject have been held in the large towns, at which, we are glad to see, some of our friends have taken a leading part. In Liverpool, for instance, an influential meeting of the Liberal Association was held, under the presidency of Mr. S. G. Rathbone, who, in a powerful speech, completely disposed of the allegation that the maintenance of the Irish Church is favourable to the spread of Protestant truth, and pointedly shewed the absurdity of supposing that the majority of a nation could be converted to a particular form of faith by being made to pay for it before they were convinced that it was true, and strongly condemned the policy of a Government which held out a premium to rebellion by refusing to grant to reason and justice concessions which it seemed disposed to yield to clamour and disaffection. Speech after speech followed in the same tone; and these were appropriately brought to a close by an able and convincing one from Lieut.-Colonel Trimble, who, in answer to the charge that in disendowing the Irish Church robbery would be committed, went into the history of its establishment, showing that tithes were instituted when Catholicism was in the ascendancy, that the greater part of the property from which the Irish Church now derives its revenues was originally granted by Catholics for the advantage of their own communion, and that the State had, time after time, exercised the right to deal with these ecclesiastical temporalities, and finally convicted the Irish Church of having grossly neglected the educational and religious work it was designed to accomplish.

M. Athanase Coquerel and two other Protestant clergymen, of Paris, belonging to the liberal minority of the Presbyterian Council, who were proscribed by the orthodox majority, have been specially authorised by the Minister of the Interior to conduct religious services.

Vienna was illuminated, and there were great popular rejoicings, on the Upper House of the Reichsrath affirming, by a majority of more than two to one, the Bill declaring that marriages by civil contract are valid before the law, without the addition of any religious ceremony. This will greatly lessen the power of the priests; and it seems probable that the efforts which they are making to retain their old influence over the public schools will likewise be unsuccessful.

From several other bills standing in the way, the second reading of the University Tests Bill has had to be postponed till the 18th of May. At a special congregation at Cambridge, the university seal was ordered to be affixed to petitions against the measure by 116 votes to 61; but the Chancellor and Vice-Chancellor support it, and a petition has been presented in its favour from 32 Fellows of Trinity College, headed by the veteran, Professor Sedgwick. A telling answer has also been given to the Oxford graduates who addressed the Primate by four Baptist graduates of Cambridge, who inform his grace that at that university "the number of Nonconformists has been steadily increasing for the last twelve years, and has comprised two senior wranglers, one second, one fifth, one seventh, two other wranglers, two first-class classics, ten senior optimes, and one senior in the natural science tripos. The Nonconformists who have won honours and those who have not have been well known among us, and we do not hesitate to assert that in moral and religious excellence they have been far above the average. Had the whole university been like them, it would have presented a scene of purity and piety such as neither Oxford nor Cambridge has yet approached."

Dr. Robert Knox, of Belfast, in a pamphlet just published, maintains that his brother Presbyterians had better give up the Regium Donum altogether than accept any endowment in common with Roman Catholic priests. We can hardly agree with him that this would be "one of the grandest utterances of conscience in the history of Christendom," when we bear in mind what has been recently shewn, that a contribution of a halfpenny a week from every communicant throughout the Irish Presbyterian denomination would amount to more than the whole Regium Donum.

The governor of the prison in Cashel writes to Mr. James Haughton, of Dublin, giving a most favourable account of Tipperary, which once so turbulent is now one of the most orderly counties in Ireland. This Mr. Haughton, in a letter to the Dublin Freeman, ascribes to the influence exercised by Dr. Leahy, the Roman Catholic Bishop, in his diocese. He says:

"Several years ago this good bishop established what he calls a Sunday liquor law, whereby all the Catholic publicans were called upon to close their places of business on the Sunday. This law or regulation of the Church has been well observed, and has, I believe, met the entire approval of all the inhabitants of the diocese. The results have been of the gratifying character which you this day commemorate. You do not refer to Dr. Leahy's liquor law in your commentaries on my text; yet I have no doubt it has been the main instrument in producing the results you refer to, and which are so honourable to our country; and I have some evidence which goes far to prove beyond any manner of doubt that it is to his Grace Tipperary owes its immunity from crimes, which once rendered that name a proverb of evil all over Europe."

On Sunday last, funeral sermons were preached in Old Greyfriars' Church, Edinburgh, on the death of Dr. Lee, by the Rev. Principal Tulloch, of St. Andrews, and the Rev. R. Wallace, of Trinity College Church. The former, after some general thoughts appropriate to the occasion and the loss which the congregation had sustained, referred to the changes which had occurred during Dr. Lee's ministry of thirty-five years in connection with it, and the leading part which he had taken in them. His mind and character eminently fitted him for exercising influence, and whatever diversity of opinion there might be as to his course of action in any particular case, there could be no doubt as to the public spirit which animated him, and the independence with which he formed and carried out his own conclusions. Society is not sufficiently grateful to such men, for it dislikes disturbance; but still, when such men die, they are missed more than other men. The preacher then dwelt on Dr. Lee's character as known more immediately to his own people, who had learned to appreciate not only his manliness, but his true-hearted tenderness; not only his vigorous powers of understanding, but the unaffected kindness, friendliness, and sympathy that inspired him; and touched in a feeling manner on the bereavements which in his home circle he had had to endure. He would have been glad to rest, but did not think it right to shrink from what he considered his duty; for no heart ever beat more warmly for the Church than his did; no one ever served it with a more loyal zeal, according to his own sense of loyalty and zeal.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

In answer to the argument that, if Dissenters became part of the governing bodies of the Universities, they would introduce religious controversies among the Fellows, a correspondent of the Pall Mall says:

"I wish that the innocent gentlemen who adduce this argument could be present occasionally in an Oxford common room, and take up the cudgels for Dr. Pusey or Professor Jowett. It is true that gentlemen at Oxford or Cambridge don't argue much about the differences which divide the Particular Baptists from the Independents. But there is no creed which divides educated men which is not eagerly canvassed, and, I may add, both defended and attacked at the universities. True, there has been no controversy that I know of between Mr. Spurgeon and Mr. Liddon, which perhaps may be owing to their having been kept apart, though it is possible, too, that they would like each other much better if they were brought into contact. But, if I ask where Roman Catholics find their ablest supporters, I should be told of men who have learnt their lesson at Oxford; and if I ask who are the prophets of Comte in this country, I should be referred to the fellows of a certain Oxford college, who have published the most elaborate defence of the Positive creed. Between those extremes there is room enough for any reasonable man in want of a persuasion. Why, sir, Oxford is the very focus and centre of religious controversies in England."

At a rural-decanal chapter, the Bishop of Lichfield said, some persons supposed he was anxious for a separation of Church and State, but this was quite a mistake. He would be a madman to wish anything of the kind, but for the last twenty-six years he had been living in perfect equanimity in a country where there was no State Church, and therefore he regarded the subject from a point of view different from that occupied by those who regarded the separation of Church and State as one of the greatest evils which could befall mankind. He could not look upon it in that light. He would have all Churchmen look the subject fairly in the face. They were told that in Ireland for every Protestant there were seven Roman Catholics. It was said that Dissenters were a majority in Wales, and there were those who did not hesitate to affirm the same thing of England. When people began to count heads in this way, with the view to ascertain the right of the Church of England to establishment by law, he submitted that it was not desirable to drive out of the Church by wholesale those who were willing to remain if they were allowed the same latitude and toleration as was claimed by those who opposed them. This latter remark was evoked by an appeal made to the Bishop by two or three clergymen that his lordship should put down ritualism with a strong hand.

Dr. Vaughan, the Vicar of Doncaster, in addressing a meeting there on Church matters, said, in these times everything was called by fine names. If you wanted to get a few Christian women together to do God's work, you must needs call them a "sisterhood," dress them up in most hideous costumes, and make them perfect frights. These sisterhoods were called by the names of abstract figures, and went about doing God's work in what he ventured to call a semi-Popish way. He disliked this; and was pleased to think we had numbers of Christian women who did God's work without any distinctive or peculiar costume, and without what he ventured to call any Protestant mummery.

Martin Farquhar Tupper is contributing ballads "for the times" to the Record's satellite, The Rock. His Protestantism may be excellent, but his poetry will hardly recommend it. Here is a taste of its quality:

"For I come from the stock of confessors myself,
Of a Protestant house, before Luther was born,
Who were martyrs from power, from place, and from self,
For religion, from homes in old Germany torn;
And near the dark days when old Latimer bled,
My fathers escaped to their Sarnian home,
Or further away to America fled,
To hide from the rage of idolatrous Rome."

In addressing a meeting of Mr. Spurgeon's College the other evening, the Rev. T. Binney advised the students not to try to be mere imitators of their president. He said he knew that the young men at Bristol imitated Robert Hall, and one day Mr. Hall spoke of one who so closely followed him, that he even imitated the pain in his back. He (Mr. Binney) heard of a young man, who preached for a certain congregation, and who satisfied them, but he made so many pauses in his preaching that the people kindly remonstrated with him on the subject. "Don't you like them," said he, "why they are the great secret of Mr. Binney's popularity." The worst was, such persons generally imitated those matters which they should never copy.

On the question which is exciting much attention in the intellectual world of Scotland, Who shall succeed Dr. Lee in the chair of Biblical Criticism in Edinburgh? the Pall Mall observes:

"The principles on which the choice ought to be made are few and simple. The professor should be a man of sound learning in the ancient languages and theology, and well acquainted with the latest views of the biblical critics of the continent and England; learned, in fact, not in Latin and Greek only, but in French and German. He should be likewise a liberal-minded candid scholar, who, when it comes to be a question between the favourite views of his church and truth, will give truth the preference. Hitherto in Scotland—though not in Scotland only—men have inquired after a candidate's orthodoxy first, and then after his attainments and his disposition to embrace the results of research. But it would be useless, as well as mischievous, to follow such precedents in the case before us. A half-instructed bigot or mere popular preacher of shallow erudition in Dr. Lee's chair would not strengthen the Church at all. He would weaken it, and that at a time when it behoves all its friends and members to be exceedingly circumspect."

Of the six candidates at present in the field, our contemporary says, anybody who knows the country, knows when he glances at them that half at least do not at all fulfil the conditions thus laid down.

Remarking on the "religious difficulty" which the Duke of Marlborough, in bringing forward the Government scheme of education, made one of his objections to the system of rating, the same paper says:

"If the parents and the laity cared enough about education to take the matter into their own hands as they ought to do, they would find that this difficulty was a mere bugbear. As long as they choose to be supine, and to leave the whole subject in the hands of the clergy and of clerically-minded laymen, they must be content to see it magnified into an impossibility. It is perhaps hard to blame the clergy for insisting upon it when they alone put their shoulders to the wheel, and really do procure by far the greater part of the popular education which actually does exist, but it is impossible not to feel that the position of the laity in respect to this subject is more or less contemptible. They leave the clergy to do the work and take the trouble, and in consideration of their doing so permit them to turn what ought to be regarded as a matter of general public convenience into a sectarian question."

We take this from the Pall Mall:

"A newspaper, 'religious,' that is, Evangelical, according to the Shaftesbury pattern, contains the following advertisement: 'Wanted, by a thorough, earnest, converted Christian young preacher, a situation as laymen or missionary. Willing to spread the truth through the blood of the Lamb as in Jesus, as it is so much needed in these dark ages of Ritualism and Popery. Can preach extempore, and draw sinners to the foot of the cross through the blood of Christ.—Address, M.A., Hackney.' It is difficult—and luckily not necessary when we are addressing decent people—to comment on such an announcement. No touting juggler, advertising his feats through the Era, could beat the last two lines."

In noticing the distribution of circulars by Mr. Hope Johnstone, seeking to pledge the clergy and others to a condemnation of Dr. Colenso, the same paper says:

"The grounds on which these signatures are asked are as disgraceful as any which have ever been avowed by the narrowest trade unions. Men and women who may know nothing of the Bishop of Natal but his name are called upon to pronounce him an apostate from Christianity, not merely on the charges urged against him at the sham trial in Capetown, but on a charge for which he has been neither accused nor tried even before any self-styled spiritual tribunal. To denounce him for asserting that large portions of the Bible are not the Word of God may be only to condemn him that which a secular tribunal has declared to be no offence in any clergyman of the Church of England; but to stigmatise him for denying that Jesus Christ is the proper object of Christian worship is to make punishment precede both trial and accusation. This method of hanging first and trying afterwards is, according to Mr. Hope Johnstone and his party, indispensably necessary if the growth of scepticism and infidelity is to be kept in check. In other words, an act of palpable injustice is needed to make Englishmen believe in theological dogmas, or yield to the claims of a sacerdotal order. The inference that scepticism and infidelity must be nearer to the truth than orthodoxy, is as naturally suggested by this proposition as by the recent confession of the Oxford memorialists that the Christianity of the university can be upheld only by insisting on subscription to the Thirty-nine Articles."

A memorial on the Natal question to be presented to the Archbishop of Canterbury and Bishops in Convocation, signed by Dr. Pusey, Mr. Liddon, and others, while fully recognising the grave legal difficulties involved in it, states that they are of opinion that in a case so momentous, affecting the whole Christian faith and the truth of the Holy Scriptures, the Church of England, as a branch of the Holy Catholic Church, is bound to act as a spiritual body having spiritual relations with the Church of South Africa. They are convinced that a most grievous scandal and the appearance, at least, of indifference to heresy of the deadliest character will be justly charged against the Church of England, unless there be without further delay on the part of the English Church, as there has been on that of the sister Church of the United States in America, some authoritative act which may free it from the least shadow of such an imputation. The memorialists therefore pray that at their next meeting (in April) their lordships, together with the Lower House of Convocation, will agree in a declaration that the Church of England, as a spiritual body, can no longer hold communion with one who has so grievously departed from the faith.

In reference to this memorial, a correspondent of the Guardian writes:

"If the Bishops affirm the validity of Dr. Colenso's deposition and excommunication, these memorials will surely be superfluous; should they unhappily come to a different conclusion, those who sign must either eat their words, or find themselves by their own act placed in opposition to their bishops."

In an article on Dean Stanley's Address on the Connection of Church and State, the English Inde- pendent points out the change which has taken place in the arguments employed in defence of Church Establishments. It says:

"Two hundred years ago statesmen held that the Church ought to be established and endowed because it taught the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth on things divine, and because it was the duty of the Government to 'take order' that truth should be taught to the population. Now, it is held by Mr. Disraeli that religion ought to be established chiefly that it may influence the Government; by Sir G. C. Lewis that the State is no judge of doctrines, and cannot either be taught religion or teach it; and by the Dean of Westminster that the only possible defence of an Established Church must be based on an enlargement of its doctrinal area, until it comprehends the dogmas and vagaries of almost everybody in the kingdom. Strange that the same institution can be defended in successive generations, and even in the same age, by arguments so diametrically opposite to each other. One wonders sometimes what would be left to the Church of England if you could take away its visible edifices and secular advantages; and weak, What is the essence of that Church which, apart from these advantages, draws to itself such contradictory devotion? One can understand the Dean of Westminster's eloquent but most fanciful lament over the prospect of the sale of his abbey to the highest bidder, but it is not easy to understand the springs of attachment to a church which is specially defended on the ground that it can be shown to have no definite doctrines, no 'godly discipline,' and no special moral complexion whatsoever, except a likeness to the 'don't care' character of Annaeus Gallio. How such a church is to teach religion or morality to either Queen, Lords, or Commons, it is difficult indeed to perceive."

The Weekly Review says:

"It is a curious coincidence that Mr. Disraeli and Mr. Gladstone were both in their early years brought up under Unitarian auspices. The present Prime Minister was educated by the Rev. E. Cogan, Unitarian Minister at Walthamstow. The father of Mr. Gladstone was a Unitarian, and a member of the Rev. Mr. Yates's congregation at Liverpool, by whom the present leader of the Opposition was baptised. Another curious coincidence of a like nature is, that the late Bishop of London, Dr. Blomfield, was baptised in the Unitarian Chapel at Bury St. Edmunds; and the father of the Archbishop of Canterbury was also a Unitarian, and a member of the congregation of Chatham. Lord Brougham was also brought up as a Unitarian, as were the Rev. F. Maurice and Lord Houghton."

On which the Record remarks:

"We believe that most, if not all, of the above statements are correct, excepting that as to Lord Brougham's having been 'brought up as a Unitarian,' which is notoriously incorrect. His father, Mr. Brougham, was a well-known sceptic and disciple of David Hume, and after the philosopher's death, in 1776, became the occupant of his house in St. David-street, Edinburgh, in which the ex-chancellor was born in September, 1778. His lordship's mother was the daughter of the Rev. Mr. Syme, the Presbyterian minister of Tallybody and Alloa, and brother-in-law of the famous Principal Robertson, the historian. In his boyhood Lord Brougham regularly attended worship in St. Andrew's Church, George-street, opposite to which was the house to which the family had removed from St. David-street. The minister of St. Andrew's Church, Mr. Moodie, was certainly not a Unitarian, although belonging to 'the moderate' or anti-Evangelical party of the Church of Scotland."

Rarely, we think, has so singular a sermon been preached of late, as one delivered the other Sunday by the Rev. C. H. Crauford, of Old Swinford. After tracing his pedigree and showing how illustrious was his descent, and mentioning that he had been obliged to send his daughters to a distance because a parishioner had had the presumption to make an offer of his hand to one of them, he entered into a long justification of himself for having married his housekeeper, admitting, at which he hoped she would not take offence, that the alliance he had contracted was very like that which King Copethua contracted with the beggar girl. He assured his parishioners that Mrs. Crauford, although of low birth and imperfect education, is kind, loving, and pious, qualities which he infinitely prefers to a smattering of French and Italian, a little playing, a little singing, and a great proficiency in "round dances." Her vocabulary, he admitted, is not that generally in use in polite society, but then, he asked, how many of his congregation themselves habitually disregarded or perverted the use of the letter "h"? He implored them not to be "so brutally deficient in good breeding, so un-Christian like," as to ridicule her for her educational shortcomings; and assured them that in consequence of his infirmities, his studious habits, his numerous avocations, and her domestic nature, the society of Old Swinford would see very little of either of them in future, as they had resolved to devote themselves to the improvement of their minds, to the duties of their station, and to the preparation of their souls for heaven.

REVIEW.

The Life and Works of Gotthold Ephraim Lessing; from the German of Adolf Stahr, translated by E. P. Evans, Ph.D., professor of modern languages and literature in the University of Michigan. Boston, 1866.

LESSING lived at the dawn of an Augustan age in Germany, and helped to usher in the radiance of the coming day of the revival of literature, if he were not indeed rather himself the sun which lighted those who came after him, and gave to them the impetus which cost him, as the pioneer, so much labour and sorrow. He was weighed down with a sense of national degradation, even in his youth, to see how completely his country had sunk her individuality in blind subservience to the French school; and he did what in him lay to rouse her from her lethargy, and give to her people and her literature a new life. Lessing comes before us in the multiform character of a poet, a dramatist, a critic, and a theologian; on all of which he wrote with singular power and originality. Nor is this to be wondered at when we are told of the generations of literary genius from which he sprang. His father and grandfather were both men of letters of no common order; his mother was the daughter of the pastor primarius of Kamenz, to whose place her husband succeeded. "Thus," says his biographer, "Lessing received his inclination for learning as an hereditary gift."

It was a source of deep disappointment to both his parents that he declined the clerical profession; but his ardent love of truth and sincerity forbade his undertaking anything into which he could not enter with his whole heart and soul. Brought up in comparative poverty, owing to his father's large family and small means, he was early taught the lesson of self-denial; and with it that healthy necessity for exertion which led the way to his future fame. He entered the University of Leipsic in 1746, at the age of seventeen, when just twenty years after, at the same age, and on the same day Goethe matriculated, and the world will never know how much the celebrity of the latter was reflected from his illustrious predecessor. We must pass over the interesting details of his school and college life, simply remarking that at Leipsic his love for the drama was first developed. Getting into difficulties there, which pursued him to Wittemburg, where he had entered as a student in 1748, he went to Berlin, and became editor of a newspaper, with a view to paying his Leipsic debts; he employed himself also in translating. But his love for the theatre and dramatic writing overmastered every other pursuit, and he entered with avidity into his scheme of reforming the German stage. His object was to make it subservient to the moral culture of the people, averring that "even the sublimest philosophical and religious truths are capable of impressive representation through the drama."

This undertaking brought out his wonderful powers as a critic, and, young as he was, he did not shrink from the task of exposing the sophisms and inconsistencies of the popular writers of the day, Rousseau among the number. After a three years' sojourn at Berlin, Lessing resolved to leave it for a time and return to Wittemburg, in order to give another direction to his studies. He was now only twenty-three, when he began to examine with an acumen beyond his years the different modes of religious thought, and to mark out for himself an independent course. At Berlin he made the acquaintance of all the distinguished men of that city. In 1760 he obtained a Government appointment at Breslau, during a war with Austria, in which he was thrown into an entirely new phase of life, which he would not have chosen but for his poverty. But even scenes of war did not stifle or curb his genius, for it was during his apparently wasted time as an attaché of the army that he wrote his "Laoköon" and "Minna von Barnhelm." His next call was to Hamburg, in 1767, where he carried out his favourite project of resuscitating and improving the drama of his country. "No one of his aims," remarks the historian of the German Theatre, Devrient, "did he pursue with such devoted persistency, and nothing did he make so completely his life-mission as the untiring endeavour to revive, thoroughly and independently, the national stage." He shared the fate of all reformers in detraction, jealousy, and misrepresentation, under which a less noble mind would have sunk. He enjoyed one triumph, however. By his just and truthful criticisms of the dramas of Voltaire, "he directed so powerful a blow against the æsthetical authority of la grande nation and its gifted representative, that he put an end to its influence in Germany for ever."

A controversy with Klotz about this time brought out his "Antiquarian Letters," in which the ancients have their share of his thoughtful and searching criticism, and by which he distanced his adversary through his superior discrimination.

At the age of forty his poverty compelled him to accept the office of librarian to Prince Charles William of Brunswick at Wolfenbüttel, where he spent the most eventful years of his life. In accepting this post, forced upon him by necessity, he felt that he had relinquished his freedom for a miserable pittance. His patron was eager to secure in his suite the greatest writer of Germany, at the smallest possible expense.

It was about this period, too, that for the first time in his life a deep and devoted attachment took possession of him; the lady was a widow. Eva König was a woman of rare qualities, both of head and heart, and when we say that she appreciated and returned the love of such a man, we have said enough. Owing to the scanty means of poor Lessing, whose circumstances were made even more difficult by the frequent demands of his family upon his purse, and the involved condition of the widow and her four children, they had even yet to wait seven long years before their union, which took place on October 8th, 1776. During this weary period of suspense, he completed his celebrated tragedy of Emelia Galotti. Goethe was nineteen, and a student at Leipsic, when Lessing was writing his Dramaturgy at Hamburg; and the former, in his autobiography, thus alludes to a neglected opportunity of becoming acquainted with Lessing:

"Lessing arrived at a time when our heads were full of I know not what; we did not choose to seek his society, but rather avoided the places where he came. . . . This short-lived folly, which, however, is nothing rare in arrogant and whimsical youth, was in the sequel its own punishment, since I have never seen with my eyes this great man, whom I esteem in the highest degree."

We meet Lessing at this period as a philosopher. He was the prophet of that system which was afterwards elaborated by Kant. His criticism of the respective schools of Leibnitz and Spinoza fully establishes his claim to the philosophic brotherhood.

The study of theology occupied more particularly the latter part of his early life, though he was never wholly indifferent to the subject, having taken an interest in religious inquiry even in his early life. Thus the transition will not appear so inharmonious with his previous studies as otherwise it might do. He had never joined the philosophic scoffers of his day, but, on the contrary, had the deepest reverence for religion; he determined only that he would not take the commonly received opinions on trust, but would examine for himself. He hated intolerance, and was particularly hard on the clergy. His religious drama of "Nathan the Wise" contains a lesson from which all professing Christians might profit. His views of the Divine plan for the gradual development of man's moral nature he sets forth in his "Education of the Human Race," in which work he fully recognises the special hand of God in the Old and New Dispensations.

In his theological studies he met with the celebrated "Fragments," which he sought and obtained permission to publish, giving at the same time his own views on the subject matter of the papers. The author of the "Fragments" was Herman Samuel Reimarus, professor of Oriental languages in the Hamburg Academi cal Gymnasium, and bore the title of "An Apology for the National Worshipers of God." Lessing's motive for publishing them was to rouse the torpid spirit of his time into fresh interest towards religious subjects. In the words of his biographer:

"The purpose which induced Lessing to publish the 'Fragments' was fulfilled. The effect was wonderful. Since the period of the Reformation, no theological controversy had excited such universal interest as that which now arose from the discussion of the foundations of Christianity, weakened by the 'Fragments,' and which was poured forth in a deluge of polemical writings of all kinds. The indignation against the disturber of the sluggish peace in which the theology of all parties had hitherto rocked itself was without measure. Like the great Prussian king his contemporary, Lessing stood alone in the warfare—a single man against a world in arms—only with this difference, that he was never defeated, but always conqueror. This conflict continued for little more than one year; for nearly all that Lessing won for theology, or sowed as 'fruitful seed for after centuries, lies within the single year 1778. But the issue was decisive for the cause of intellectual freedom in all subsequent times."

Sceptical writers, anxious to augment the number of learned men on their side, have asserted that the "Fragments" contain Lessing's own opinions, but we have the testimony of his biographer to the contrary:

"Lessing assumed a different attitude to the contents of the 'Fragments' themselves, and to the inferences which the author thought himself justified in drawing from his demonstrations."

We see him sometimes "apparently taking part in favour of pious orthodoxy, whose consistency he knew how to esteem, and preferred by far to the contemptible mongrelism of the so-called enlightened theology of his day."

"If the author of the 'Fragments' thought to be able to make the divine claims of the Old Testament depend upon the perfection of its contents, Lessing, on the contrary, made the assertion that this conclusion was incorrect, and that the Divine origin of a book could no more be formed by the perfection of the doctrines contained in it, than refuted by their imperfection. For this very imperfection may be desired by God, and ordered by Him, because it corresponds to the condition of human culture, and belongs to God's plan of education."

This idea he elaborates in his "Education of the Human Race." In less than 14 months after, poor Lessing had gained the treasure for which he had so long waited; he had to resign it: he lost his wife and his child together! And "with his own death-stroke in his heart—a dying gladiator—he carried on his last great battle for freedom."

Of "Nathan the Wise," his last work but one, his biographer says that none of Lessing's friends "had supposed it possible that the promised religious poem should be so free from all direct hostility and polemics, should breathe so entirely the tranquillity of a mind in unison with itself and the world; that a work of the purest gentleness, of the most religious tendency, a poem of perfect peace, should proceed from the mental armoury of a man who had waged with the keenest intellectual weapons a life-long battle of humanity and freedom against the barbarism of intolerance and servitude, and who, before his head sank down weary through victory, left in this poem an eternally precious bequest to his nation and to mankind."

We close this notice over which we have lingered, in words which none but a true-loving memorialist could muster:

"We are all familiar with Goethe's saying, 'Lessing wished to abnegate the title of a genius, but his enduring works testify against himself.' The critical spirit of this race (the German), penetrating into all depths—where does it find more complete expression than in the man whom the historian of the proudest people of the earth called, 'without doubt, the greatest critic in Europe?' The calm greatness, the noble simplicity, which combine manly pride before the thrones of kings with unenvying devotion to all that is good and beautiful; the passionate love of truth, and courage in defending it, to which all sham is an abomination, and no sacrifice too hard for the cause of intellectual freedom; the faithful endurance and unchangeable persistence which are the conditions of all worthy and permanent results—are not all these qualities, in their highest perfection, united and brought to that powerful focus which we call character, in him whom Goethe exclaimed, 'We want a man like Lessing, for where is now such a character?' The champion of genius and its rights, and at the same time the energetic representative of law and order; the most genuine confessor and practitioner of the religion of Christ, and at the same time the keenest investigator of historical Christianity; the most thoroughly German character and writer, and yet the most decided opponent of all narrowness of national patriotism,—uniting the noblest self-consciousness with the most genuine modesty and humility, with thorough grandeur and freedom of thought and action—he stands an eternal pattern to his countrymen, a hero in the realm of the True, the Good, and the Beautiful."

MISTRANSLATIONS IN THE AUTHORISED VERSION.—No. XXVIII.

DANIEL xi. 38. "But in his estate shall he honour the God of forces." More correctly, "the God of the fortress of the sea;" meaning the God of the city Tyre.

Daniel xi. 39. "Thus shall he do in the most strong holds, with a strange god, whom he shall acknowledge and increase with glory." More correctly, "Thus shall he do in the citadels of the fortress of the sea. The people of a foreign god, whom he shall acknowledge, will increase with glory." The fortress of the sea, as in the former case, is Tyre.

Hosea i. 6, 9; ii. 1. The Hebrew names, here given to imaginary sons and daughters, should all be given in English. Lo-ruhamah is "Not pitied;" Lo-ammi is "Not my people." Ammi is "Ye are my people;" and Ruhamah is "Pitied."

Hosea ii. 16. So in this verse, Ishi should be "My husband," and Baali, "My master."

Hosea iv. 8. "They eat up the sin of my people." More correctly, "They eat up the sin offerings of my people," which ought to have been burnt on the altar.

Hosea v. 11. "He willingly walked after the commandment." More correctly, "after the decree;" meaning the idolatrous decree of King Jeroboam.

Hosea xi. 12. "But Judah yet ruleth with God, and is faithful with the saints." More correctly, "And Judah acted disobediently toward God, even toward the most holy and faithful one."

Hosea xiii. 10. "I will be thy king." More correctly, "Where is now thy king?" meaning Hoshea, who was taken prisoner by the King of Assyria.

Amos iii. 7. "Surely the Lord God will do nothing." More correctly, "the Lord Jehovah." As our translators everywhere write Lord for Jehovah, when they come to the two words both together, they cannot write "the Lord Lord," and so they change it to the Lord God.

Amos iv. 3. "Ye shall cast them into the palace." More correctly, "into the palace-tower," a kind of prison.

Amos v. 24. "Righteousness as a mighty stream." More correctly, "as an unfailing stream," not like a winter torrent which is dry in summer, as so many of the streams in Palestine are.

Amos vi. 14. "From the entering in of Hamath unto the river of the wilderness." More correctly, "From the mountain pass of Hamath to the valley of Arabah," the well known desert valley in the south.

Amos ix. 6. "God hath founded his troop in the earth." More correctly, "his arched vault on the earth."

Micah i. 15. "Yet will I bring an heir unto thee." More correctly, "a dispossessor unto thee." Again, "He shall come unto Adullam the glory of Israel." More correctly, "The glory of Israel shall go to Adullam," to hide there as David did in his distress.

Micah vii. 12. "From Assyria and from the fortified cities, and from the fortress even to the river." More correctly, "From Assyria and from the cities of Egypt, even from Egypt to the river" Euphrates.

Nahum iii. 8. "Art thou better than populous No?" More correctly, "than No-amun," or Egyptian Thebes. The Latin name for the city, Diospolis Magna, is a literal translation of the Coptic No-amun, meaning the great city of Amun.

Zechariah xiii. 5. "For man taught me to keep cattle from my youth." More correctly, "For a man bought me from my youth" to be a bond-servant.

FRIDAY, APRIL 3, 1868.

THE PULPIT AND THE PRESS.

THERE is a tendency in the present day to speak of preaching as an institution of the past, the need and utility of which are passing away before the march of intelligence and the superior influence of the press. Preachers and sermons are one of the favourite topics of social grumblers. The "foolishness of preaching" is a favourite text of the satirist; and even in the conversation of middle-class society—the class which still attends public worship—nothing is more common than a flippant tone of criticism and disparagement in regard to the inflictions of the pulpit.

The most favourite explanation of this decreasing respect for the pulpit is that the press is largely taking its place, and doing more efficiently what formerly was the work of the preacher. It cannot for a moment be doubted that the press is doing a vast work, and some part of what was once the province of the pulpit. All the intellectual side of religious culture is shared by the press. Books, tracts, and newspapers now diffuse information which men once learned from the preacher, and diffuse it far more widely and effectually than he was ever able to do. The pulpit has no longer any monopoly even of moral and religious subjects, but you find topics discussed by the press and reflections given which once would have been thought trenching upon the peculiar province of the ministry. Theology is discussed in books with a fulness and thoroughness beside which any sermons must seem flimsy and incomplete. Even the great foundations which were left for the preaching of special courses of sermons on points of Divinity, such as the BOYLE and HULSEAN lectures, have gradually come to be, in reality, the mere reading from the pulpit of works prepared for the wider audience and the closer study which books attract.

Now all this points to considerable changes in the relative place of the pulpit to the wants and the agencies of the time, but not to its being superseded. Indeed, many of the changes are rather such as to help the true preacher in his work. They clear the ground for him. They enable preaching to be made more interesting and effective. The increase of education, if it takes away the preacher's monopoly of instruction, gives him a far more prepared soil in which to sow his special seed of religious thought. The preacher can now take much more for granted as known by any ordinary congregation than he could fifty years ago. To those who have only authority to fall back upon this may be a hindrance and a difficulty, but to the preacher of a thoughtful and free Christianity, it ought to be a great encouragement. Acquaintance with literature has indeed made men far more critical of the pulpit, and far more expectant from it. The habit of finding every topic of the hour discussed in newspaper articles in a terse, lively, and varied style, makes society intolerant of mere common-place in the pulpit to an extent unknown in the good old times. Yet this is to be regretted only by those who have no living thought to give forth, and whose prosy common-places, however they might be tolerated, were just as useless in the past. The true preacher feels it a great help to him in his work that the press has thus familiarised men with many subjects, and inclined them to a less formal style of expression and illustration.

While, therefore, in what it has done, the press has done more to forward the work of the true minister than to supplant it, the largest and noblest field of influence—that which has always called into play the most truly prophetic power—remains open to the preacher as to no other. There is a power in the living voice of a man thoroughly in earnest, and whose soul is aglow with the impulses of love and prayer, which has been felt in all ages, and to which the human heart is as accessible as ever. Why, even in the lower field of arousing men to an interest in political subjects, or to an active part in public questions and matters still more thoroughly taken up by the press, there is as much scope as ever for men animated by deep convictions on those matters to make them subjects of spoken addresses to their fellow-men. There are probably more political meetings in the present day than ever before. Those who attend them are better informed, and therefore less at the mercy of every fluent agitator or unscrupulous partisan, but they are not less interested in hearing, face to face, what men who have made these subjects their peculiar study think of them. Nay, some great authors speak of their being more craving for talk, even of the wind-bag and stump-oratory kind than ever before, and charge this upon the age as one of its characteristic weaknesses. And certainly if newspaper, pamphlet, and book cannot be the substitute for the living voice on these subjects, still less can they on the subject of religion—the highest, deepest, and most varied subject of human thought. And facts bear this out. Larger numbers congregate week by week to hear the great preachers of the day, than can be got together even occasionally to hear any politician, except a few of the very highest eminence. BRIGHT and COBDEN, during the Anti-Corn Law agitation, drew from time to time assemblies as large as those of the Surrey Tabernacle. But Mr. SPURGEON draws that great concourse of people week by week, and has been doing so for years without any abatement of interest. And no book can appeal to the heart as man can. As a proof of this, see how tame almost all sermons are felt to be when printed, even those which in the delivery have had the most striking and unmistakable impressiveness. Imagine the addresses by which JOHN WESLEY revived the forgotten piety of the common people in the last century; printed and circulated as tracts! As a fact, JOHN WESLEY's sermons read even tame and insipid. There are a few books which do possess a singular power of taking hold of the heart and conscience. We might instance THOMAS à KEMPIS, and "LAW'S Serious Call," and yet it is not all who would feel touched and awakened even by these. Yet every week numbers of sermons are preached infinitely inferior in literary power to LAW's heart-searching appeals, which, yet driven home by the living voice of men who feel what they say, are infinitely more powerful than any book whatever, and that to multitudes whom, even in these enlightened days, the press hardly reaches at all. The pulpit is only one of many influences, and perhaps not the most efficient, for many parts of the wide work of religious culture, especially those belonging to its intellectual side. But it remains, as ever, infinitely the most effective agency for the arousing of personal interest in religion, for the culture of religious feeling, and for pressing home to the heart the truths of the intellect and the dictates of the conscience.

AMERICAN NOTES.

The Ottawa Indians in Kansas, now reduced to less than two hundred, and mostly Baptists, have given more than 20,000 acres of land, as good as any which there is in the State, and worth more than 100,000 dollars, to endow Ottawa University, which if the white people show anything like the same liberality, will be one of the best endowed colleges of the West.

The Monthly Journal of the American Unitarian Association has some interesting remarks on the great field of opportunity for Christian service which is presented by the condition of the four millions of coloured people, who are now for the first time accessible to any helpful influences from the North. "As was said by Dr. Ellis at a public meeting, our own denomination is especially bound to effort on behalf of this race, because it is generally acknowledged (by some regarded as a praise, by others as a reproach) that we did more than any other, in proportion to our numbers, to bring on the agitation which resulted in their being now in this condition of independence. It is for us to see that this is made for them an exalted privilege, not turned into a curse."

"We take peculiar satisfaction in the attitude our people have taken with regard to this work. And we equally rejoice in the generosity with which they have given their money, and in the liberal spirit in which they have ignored the matter of sect and creed. They have known that the thing needed now is to give to the people, just emerged from slavery, the elements of an education and those ideas which are at the basis of moral, intellectual, social, and spiritual elevation; and they know that these are in the main accepted and taught by all Christian believers. In the selection of teachers, therefore, they have inquired, not as to their creed, but only as to their fitness for this work. There are some curious illustrations of the difference in this respect between Unitarians and people of other denominations. Thus the religious society to which we personally belong has supported a teacher for three years (acting through the New England Branch of the Freedmen's Commission). The teacher, chosen because of his peculiar adaptiveness to the work, happens to be a member of a Baptist church. The society supporting her probably never thought or cared whether she was Baptist or Unitarian. But when it was attempted to make this support of teachers a town affair, and to have all religious societies unite in it, every one of the Evangelical churches refused, on the ground that they preferred to work, if at all, through their own denominational channels."

The Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, contrasting the influence over children of the rod and the sugar plum, owns to having been long and grievously in error. He said he tried the rod in governing his children, but uses the sugar plum with his grandchildren.

In a sermon on the Antediluvians, the same preacher, after expressing his belief that the age to which they were stated to have lived was not fabulous, said that, if the first human beings were created at the lowest point, it was not at all inconsistent that they should have been coarse and cumbersome and long-lived. Those men of remote antiquity seemed to have been largely animal and deficient in nerve, which was the substance of moral power. In the beginning the human race had the physical powers most largely developed, and in the text it appeared that they reached an extraordinary age before they had arrived at puberty. They were slow-going, inefficient creatures, and he did not believe Adam was different from them. Adam never did an act worthy of memory. The whole human family began at the bottom, and worked their way up, and were destined to work their way up to a much higher level than at present. Longevity, such as that of old, would be a great misfortune. Death was thought by some to be a misfortune, but it was not. For many reasons it would be unfortunate if people lived in the full possession of their powers to a great age. Suppose men who had scores of millions in their hands were to live five hundred years, nothing would prevent their becoming despots, and a man of fifty would have no chance to cope with them. There were many consolations in the death of men, if the right ones only would die.

Schuyler Colfax stands out in the social life at Washington as an ornament and an example. His weekly receptions have been the favourite resort of a large circle of friends. He is now giving a series of dinner parties, and the correspondent of the Independent says: "At these dinners he has initiated the novelty (since the time Gerrit Smith was in Congress) of giving official dinner parties without wine; and I hear that they are the pleasantest of the season. He opened the new year strictly adhering to this rule; for on New Year's Day, though his table was loaded with good things, and his parlours were full of sunshine, there was nothing to drink in them stronger than chocolate and coffee."

We mentioned, a week or two since, that an Episcopal clergyman of New York, Mr. Tyng, had been found guilty of the heinous sin of preaching in a Methodist Chapel, and had appealed from the sentence given against him to a general Convention of his Church. A similar case has arisen in Rhode Island, where the Rev. Mr. Hubbard, a clergyman, had the wickedness to exchange pulpits with a Baptist minister. The Bishop threatens to excommunicate him, but so little conscious does Mr. Hubbard seem to be of his offence that he replies in a very contumacious spirit, saying that he shall not be much concerned if the Bishop carries out his threat, but that, with others like-minded, he will form "a new and more pure branch of the Protestant Episcopal Church."

THE WANDERER—IV.

MR. SPURGEON.

A MAN who can gather several thousand hearers round him weekly for a dozen years is a rarity; and the attractive power which he exerts is a phenomenon whose nature deserves to be inquired into. That I might form my own estimate of this most successful of our preachers, and so make an interesting rhetorical if not theological study, I visited the Metropolitan Tabernacle on the morning of Sunday, March 15th. As it is possible that a fuller knowledge might not justify all the following criticisms, it is only fair to say that this was my sole experience of him. The Tabernacle is within three minutes' walk—involving, by-the-by, the same number of turnings—of the Elephant and Castle Station. It is said to seat 5,000 persons, and afford standing-room for 1,500 more. The pews are furnished with side-flaps, which shut down across the aisles, and provide seats for a large number of spectators, who are included, I presume, in the 1,500. The Sunday services are at 10 45 and 6 30; the practice seems to be to issue, to the congregation and their friends, tickets, the holders of which are admitted by a side entrance. After these more fortunate individuals are safely ensconced, the main doors are opened, and the casual congregation, who by this time will have formed a besieging crowd, are admitted. The interior of the Tabernacle has been often described. It is an oval building, with two galleries, and gas-lamps in close array around their fronts, and it is said by the profane to present a striking resemblance to a music hall. At the end opposite the main entrance is a raised platform with a table, at which various individuals of both sexes (among them a shorthand writer, busily engaged during the sermon) were placed, whether as a choir, or in token of some official position, I know not. Over this platform, and reached by steps from it, is another on which Mr. Spurgeon stands. Both have rails round the front.

Contrary to the general practice, as I believe, of Nonconforming congregations, the service commenced with a prayer instead of a hymn. A hymn followed it. Then Mr. Spurgeon read the lesson (Matthew viii.), prefacing it by explaining the position in which Christ was at the period to which it referred, and accompanying it by running comments after this manner: "Foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests. Birds don't live in their nests, as you are all aware, and the original doesn't say 'nests.' And a certain scribe said: 'Master, I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest.' Aye, young man, hot-headed and foolish, you'll follow him, even to Calvary, at least so you say. And he gave commandment to depart unto the other side. Yes, you see our Lord had an enterprising spirit. That's what his followers want, more readiness to go to the other side. There are some of you who sit here week after week with no result; I wish you would go to the other side, and see what a little street-preaching might do to awake you. I am glad that so many ministers are learning to come out of their chapels and try to preach in lecture-rooms and theatres, in short, to try the other side."

A hymn followed, and then the second prayer. The fault of Nonconformist prayers is generally said to be that they are essays, "reciting to the Deity, with more or less success, an elaborate list of His attributes, and concluding with one or two petitions."—(Pall Mall Gazette.) Mr. Spurgeon's was a rhapsody—I do not use the word in a necessarily condemnatory sense. It was a mixture of prayer, reflection, ejaculation, and exhortation. If the theory of non-liturgical prayer be, that a devout man stands in the pulpit and offers a really extempore address, i.e., that he speaks aloud, and as they come, the various thoughts that would pass through his mind in an act of mental worship, then was Mr. Spurgeon's a correct, and even excellent specimen. Such, I imagine, must have been the prayers of the Puritan ministers. (In the trial for sedition, about 180 years ago, of a minister whose name I have forgotten, one of the witnesses, in describing the service, says, "he prayed his usual time—about three quarters of an hour.") But if the sole difference between liturgical and non-liturgical worship be, that the one is composed for all Sundays in succession, the other only for the particular Sunday; if a non-liturgical prayer be a petition framed to be offered by the minister in the name of his congregation, and to express the wants and feelings which they may all be supposed to have in common, then Mr. Spurgeon's prayer was utterly unsuited to its purpose. His tone in addressing God is that of advice or command, rather than of request: he does not ask for what he wants, but points out to the Deity what, under existing circumstances, Mr. Spurgeon considers it will be best for Him to do. "There is much distress and sadness around us," said he, "in this vast city of ours. Look out"—this in a tone of strict injunction—"look out the very worst cases, O Lord, and relieve them."

The prayer ended, a hymn followed, which he prefaced by asking us to "please to hurry the tune, as it is apt to drag." I may note that no music is employed, and the unassisted singing of so vast an assembly has a most striking effect. After this he gave out his text with a prayer, "that the great Master of assemblies might bless us in our meditations on it." The subject of his discourse was the healing of the centurion's servant. It was—to my surprise—throughout devoid of that practical advice which I had expected to hear from him, and framed upon an extreme Calvinistic hypothesis—such as I had fancied obsolete, except, perhaps, amongst a few old-world and obscure preachers—of the utter depravity of both man and God. "The earth is waking into spring, the primrose and crocus are appearing; you would never suppose that it could have been so frozen as it was a few weeks since. Yet hard and cold as it was then, it was nothing to those infernal icebergs which you call hearts."

All parts of the service were devoted, almost entirely, to the glorification of our Lord. God was mentioned but seldom, and then but as the Being who was to punish us, or the awful Power whom we dare approach or pray to only when we came "sprinkled with the blood of the only-begotten." Once, towards the close of the sermon, Mr. Spurgeon mentioned Him as "the loving Father," but the epithet seemed strangely out of harmony with all that had preceded, and even he appeared to feel the discordance. That Christ had worshipped this Being, pronouncing Him to be his God, even as ours, and ascribed his own coming to the love of God who sent him, are Gospel truths, but somehow or other they are not "evangelical" ones. From the centurion's description of his soldiers' obedience, Mr. Spurgeon took occasion to describe the discipline that prevailed throughout the Roman army, and to compare it to that of Christ's army, "for Christ," said he, "is the Imperial Cæsar of heaven and earth. Blessed be God that he is not 'a man under authority,' but one who has 'soldiers under him.' They talk about a coming man. The only 'coming man' I know of is the Lord Jesus Christ, and I pray he may come soon. If he doesn't come, I don't know where we shall go,—certainly not to him." The only passage in the sermon that struck me as felicitous occurred in a description of London. "You look around you from the top of this house, and you see houses stretching away for miles on every side. What masses of sin and misery are there among them! Men call it 'a sea of houses.' Yes, but it is the sea of which Job spake—wherein creeping things innumerable." This application—or rather, wresting—of the text is quite in Theodore Parker's manner, and reminded me of his "Ah! those old Calvinist divines. Years ago they rested from their labours. Would to Heaven that their works had followed them!"

To discover the cause of Mr. Spurgeon's vast success is not easy. I believe the most likely one is his command of simple language. His words so fully express his meaning that you do not notice that you are listening to a language different from that to which you are accustomed in the pulpit, or even in conversation. But an analysis of his sentences reveals the fact. Except the phrase above quoted, "Imperial Cæsar," and one sentence in which he spoke of "taking the matter either in detail or in extenso," I noticed no word more redundant than "prominent," and that occurred but once. Nor is this faculty of conveying his meaning to every one of his auditors so inadequate a cause of great popularity as may at first sight appear; and as most preachers—to judge from their practice—would think it. The command of simple language, and a success amongst the uncultivated classes, are the only two things which the "Pilgrim's Progress," the "Age of Reason," "Robinson Crusoe," and "Cobbett's History of the Reformation," all have in common: surely, then, the one was the cause of the other. It is, I believe, to his like simplicity that Mr. Spurgeon owes his like success.

Some would attribute it to his physical powers, more especially to what they call his "buffoonery." He owes, of course, much to his powerful voice, but otherwise his physique is not attractive, unless, indeed, on the principle which a Baptist newspaper lately avowed, that only stout ministers are listened to with due reverence.† Nor is his action, though varied, so singularly telling as to be a leading cause of his popularity. On the other hand, it is not extravagant; nor, so far as I have seen, more than would be employed by any man who, instead of being shut up in the wooden box in which Protestantism deems it advisable to confine its orators, stood upon an open space and felt at ease there; not more, unless in walking to and fro, than is used by the Catholic or Ritualist who preaches from his altar steps. A clergyman in the North of England, who is noted for his personal resemblance to Spurgeon, has studied him with enthusiasm, copied his gestures most minutely, and his abruptness of speech not unsuccessfully. (I have heard him, in preaching from Ezekiel's vision of "The wall daubed with untempered mortar," denounce "that particular kind of untempered mortar with which so many in these days love to daub the wall of salvation—the untempered mortar of a piety that consists in going to church on Sundays with a large Prayer-book under its arm.") Yet he has never attained any great popularity, even locally, as a preacher. And why? because his voice is weak, and his language mainly the ordinary dictation of the pulpit.

Some may claim Mr. Spurgeon's popularity as due to his doctrines, and doubtless there are millions who would hear with calmness or even with approval all that I have above condemned. To them, as Calvinists, the threats are terrible, the praises merited, the metaphors natural and relevant, which to me, as a Broad Churchman, sound unmeaning or objectionable. Yet, though his Calvinism might win to his flock Calvinists, it would not attract—it would rather repel—those who were not such. I can hardly suppose—though the point is worth inquiry—that the bulk of his congregation are men who were Calvinists before they joined him, who have, in fact, simply been won from other Baptist and Independent congregations.

* Sermon on "Beauty in the World of Matter." I quote from memory.

The current legends about his eccentricities may safely be dismissed from belief—if any sane man ever placed them there. They are the stock stories of preaching—some of them borrowed from the famous Spanish novel of "Friar Gerund"—which are told of each popular preacher in his turn, and are applied to Mr. Spurgeon just as they used to be applied to Rowland Hill. The story of reading from St. Paul, I can do all things, then laying down money, with the words, "Nay, nay, Paul, I'll wager thee thou canst not," reading on "through Him* who strengtheneth me," and saying, "Ah! of course thou canst through Him; the bet's off," was again related by Artemus Ward's recent editor as a true anecdote of an American preacher whom he names, and was told three generations ago of Dr. Priestley's brother.

On the occasion when I heard Mr. Spurgeon, he raised a laugh only once, and that by a notice which he gave out before his sermon, much in the following words: "Your orphanage and almshouse are now finished and ready for the children and the aged women who have been appointed to them. But there is a debt of £750 still due on them: and as your maxim has always been to owe no man anything, you would hardly think it honest to use these buildings till they are all paid for. No! Stick to your old principle, 'No debt, even for God.' I told you this on Monday, and you gave me £50; since then two friends have given me £100 each. This leaves £500 still due. We shall have collections next Lord's Day, but perhaps it's too much to expect that you can raise all that at once. Still, it might save you a good deal of trouble if you did; for we shall have collections every week till the amount is raised. And if that won't do, why, I must sit here all the week, and you must come and call with the money." CYRIL.

FIRESIDE READINGS.

"THE FUTURE IS BETTER THAN THE PAST."

Not where long-past ages sleep
Seek we Eden's golden trees;
In the future, folded deep,
Are its mystic harmonies.

All before us lies the way,
Give the past unto the wind;
All before us is the Day,
Night and darkness are behind.

Eden with its angels bold,
Love, and flowers, and coolest sea,
Is not ancient story told,
But a glowing prophecy.

In the Spirit's perfect air,
In the passions tame and kind,
Innocence from selfish care,
The real Eden we shall find.

It is coming, it shall come,
To the patient and the striving,
To the quiet heart at home,
Thinking wise and faithful living.

When all Error is worked out
From the heart and from the life;
When the Sensuous is laid low
Thro' the Spirit's holy strife;

When the Soul to Sin hath died,
True and beautiful and sound;
Then all earth is sanctified,
Up springs Paradise around.

Then shall come the Eden days,
Guardian watch from seraph-eyes,
Angels on the slanting rays,
Voices from the opening skies.

From this Spirit-land afar,
All disturbing force shall flee;
Stir, nor toil, nor hope shall mar
Its immortal unity.

The Dial.

FLOWERS FROM PERSIAN GARDENS.—III.

CALL to mind what said the elephant, driven on the banks of the Nile: Wouldst thou know the condition of the ant under thy foot, think what would be thine own under the foot of the elephant.

If injury come to thee from a fellow-creature do not grieve, for from thy fellow-creatures proceeds neither quiet nor trouble. Know that from God is the difference of enemy and friend, for the hearts of both are alike in his keeping. Though the arrow flies from the bow, the wise man looks to him who directs it.

Beware of the sighs from a deeply-wounded soul, for the deep wound will at last break forth. So long as thou art able crush not a single heart, for a sigh has power to overturn a world.

*The Authorised Version reading, "Christ," is opposed to the best MSS.

The king ought to be the guardian of the poor: though affluence be his, and the splendour of fortune; though sheep were not made for the sake of the shepherd, but the shepherd was intended for the service of the sheep.

If the prime minister feared God as much as he fears the king, he would be an angel.

Life's season flies away, like the wind over the desert. Bitter and sweet, ugliness and beauty, alike pass away. The tyrant imagined that he was committing violence on us; the violence has passed away from us, but will remain on his own neck.

In so much as thou art able, distress not the mind of anyone; the pathway of life is strewn with many a thorn. Assist thou the wretched poor man in his troubles, for thou also wilt have troubles of thine own.

Never will the wise call him a great man who speaketh ill of the truly great. All these things, when once they have passed away, are nothing—fortune, and thrones, and decrees, and interdicts, and seizing, and holding. Defame not those who are departed with a good name that thine own good name may remain immortal.

Whosoever thou beholdest in the garment of piety him believe to be pious, and treat as a good man, though thou knowest not what may be the inward disposition: what business has the policeman in the inside of the house?

WHIRLING DERVISHES.

THE correspondent of the Gospel Herald, several of whose letters from Palestine we have abridged, furnishes us with the following account of a meeting which he attended, one Sunday afternoon, of the Whirling Dervishes, than which, he thinks, there is no more curious sight in Constantinople.

These Dervishes are a sect of Mohammedans, who claim to have more zeal, more devotedness, and far more sanctity than their fellow religionists. They hold about the same relation to Mohammedanism as monks do to Catholicism.

Their mosque is fitted up much in the usual style, except that in the centre of the main building, immediately under the dome, is a circular space of about 30 feet in diameter, round which is a railing about three feet high, and in which, or on which, they dance or whirl during their religious exercises.

A wide gallery surrounds the building, a portion of which is filled with close lattice work for the accommodation of the Turkish women who wish to see and dare not be seen; and another portion for the musicians, vocal and instrumental. This music is quite as singular as the other parts of the performance. Seven men blow upon reed pipes, which make a squeaking, continuous sound; two others beat the tambourine; two others kettle-drums; and one leads with his voice, the others joining in at certain intervals. The kind of music which all this makes can easier be imagined than described.

Soon after we entered, the Dervishes, dressed in long flowing robes of different colours, with coarse woollen caps, about twelve inches high, and without rims, began to march in and take their places in the inner circle. The leader stood at one side, near the altar, and the other eighteen ranged themselves round the circle. First, they walked slowly round it, each one bowing to the superior as he passed him. The music then commenced a more lively strain, and again they began to walk slowly round, but each one after bowing to and passing beyond the superior, started whirling round till the whole of the eighteen were in motion—the superior meantime standing still and intently gazing at the performance. From a slow whirl they increased to a faster one, until some of them seemed to fairly spin like a top. Their feet could not be seen, as their long robes reached almost to the floor, and made an air balloon round each as he whirled. The eyes of all were closed during the performance, and each seemed to be devoutly praying to the Prophet. Why they did not fall from dizziness was the wonder to us.

After whirling thus for some time, one after another stopped, and each took his place in the circle near the railing. After resting awhile, the superior in the meanwhile uttering a sing-song prayer, they again began to march round and to whirl, and this they repeated three times. When the last whirl ceased, and each of the performers had kissed the hand of the superior, all marched out in the order in which they had entered, and thus the service ended.

INTELLIGENCE.

BALLYMONEY.—On Tuesday, the 24th ult., the Rev. David Matts, late of Birkenhead, was ordained according to the form of the Templepatrick Presbytery, as pastor of the Unitarian church and congregation of Ballymoney. The officiating ministers were the Rev. Joseph Newell, moderator; Rev. Thomas Smyth, clerk; and the Rev. Moor Getty. The introductory service was conducted by the Rev. J. Newell, who preached a discourse on "The signs of the times," selecting his text from Matt. xvi, 3. An address was delivered by the Rev. D. Matts, setting forth his religious convictions and the aims and object of his ministry. Mr. Matts was then duly ordained by the laying on of the hands of the Presbytery—the Rev. M. Getty offering up prayer. The Rev. T. Smyth afterwards delivered an impressive charge to the newly-appointed minister and the congregation. At the close of the ordination, the ministers and friends were entertained to dinner in the manse by the committee of the congregation. A congregational tea-meeting was held in the evening, which was numerously attended. Under the presidency of the Rev. J. Newell, a most interesting and pleasant evening was spent.

BANBRIDGE: PUBLIC DISCUSSION.—On Wednesday evening, March 25, at eight o'clock, a lecture on "The Inspiration of the Scriptures" was delivered in the Town Hall by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong. As it had been announced that, at the conclusion of the lecture, a controversy with regard to the question of inspiration would take place between the lecturer and some clergymen of the Presbyterian and Reformed Churches, a great amount of excitement was created, and a very large audience assembled, the room being crowded to overflowing long before the hour for commencing the proceedings. The chair was occupied by Mr. Gilbert Mulligan, of Parkmont; and amongst those present were: Revs. R. A. Armstrong, Banbridge (lecturer); Robt. Anderson, Banbridge; J. Waddell, Annagh-lone; James Cargin, Tullylish; Professor Orr, Comber; S. Banks, Banbridge; John Rutherford, Ballydown; Dobbin, Annagh-lone; — Priestly, Loughbrickland; Mr. Simms, Loughbrickland; and Mr. John Scott, chairman of the Banbridge Town Commissioners. The meeting was opened with prayer by Rev. James Cargin, after which a considerable time was lost in debating whether there should be a second chairman appointed by the orthodox party, and how the money received at the door should be appropriated. At last, however, these things were satisfactorily adjusted, Mr. John Scott being appointed joint chairman, and the lecture was proceeded with. At its conclusion, replies were given by Revs. Mr. Rutherford and S. Simms. Professor Orr, of Comber, rejoined, after which Mr. Cargin spoke at some length. Mr. Armstrong's lecture was an able and earnest exposition of the difficulties in the way of upholding plenary inspiration of the Bible, with a statement of his own views, accepting it as containing a revelation from God. The orthodox replies were such as might be expected from bitter Ulster orthodoxy. The Rev. Mr. Dobbin, however, wound up the evening by saying he had been exceedingly pleased with the speech delivered by Mr. Armstrong; and although he was not so orthodox as he would like, he was more orthodox than he (Mr. Dobbin) had been led to expect. He condemned the use of such words as insidious, deistical, and infidel being applied to his Unitarian brethren. The proceedings only terminated at half-past two on Thursday morning!

BARNARD CASTLE.—On Friday evening last, the 27th ult., at the request of the Barnard Castle friends, the Rev. Brooke Herford, of Manchester, preached a special sermon in memory of the late Mr. George Brown, of whom we gave a long obituary notice last week. So great has been the respect felt for Mr. Brown that it was thought the little chapel would not be large enough to hold all who would wish to be present, and the service was therefore held in the Witham Testimonial Hall. Into the large room of this building were gathered at the appointed hour a crowd of about 500 people, of all sects and classes in the town, the Unitarians not numbering above a tenth of the number. The services were listened to throughout with the deepest attention.

BOLTON: UNITED TRACT DISTRIBUTION SOCIETIES.—On Thursday, March 26, the friends connected with the "Bank-street and Commission-street Christian Tract Distributing Society" held their annual meeting in the Bank-street Schoolroom. The proceedings commenced with tea, to which about 120 sat down, after which Mr. Ald. Richard Harwood presided. The report, which was read by Mr. William Ashley, showed that 886 tracts are distributed every week, with an increase of 16 in the number of distributors. Messrs. William Dornig, Isaac Barrow, J. Entwistle, Thomas Stephenson, W. Rigby, W. Taylor, Richard Hadfield, Thomas Grimshaw, and Rev. Jeffery Worthington took part in the proceedings, which were very encouraging and interesting.

DUKINFIELD.—On Monday evening, March 30th, the annual meeting was held for the distribution of first-class prizes to those scholars of the week evening classes who had attended every evening in time, and of second-class prizes to those who had attended 36 times and upwards out of 40, the full number. Between thirty and forty prizes were given, the distribution being made by the president, the Rev. J. Page Hopps, who also addressed the scholars. It is a noteworthy fact that the scholars in these classes pay all, and more than all, their own expenses, the prizes themselves being paid for out of the general receipts.

EAST LANCASHIRE: SIMULTANEOUS COLLECTIONS. The list published last week did not contain the following:

Newchurch	8 13 8
Park Lane	2 17 0

The amounts at some other places have been increased, in conformity with the suggestion contained in Rev. J. T. Whitehead's letter in the Herald. At Heap Bridge the collection was £1. 1s., not 11s., as stated by a mistake. The total sum raised in the East Lancashire district by these collections was £165. 0s. 5d. In 1867 it was £161. 7s., and in 1866, £129. 2s. 4d.

LYDGATE.—Under date March 28th, 1865, the following entry is found in the diary of Oliver Heywood: "Rode to John Armitage's. Preached in their new meeting-house: the first sermon on Exodus, xxiv. chap., 1, 2, a dedication of it. There was a full assembly. Then administered the Lord's supper to about forty." Last Saturday was the 173rd anniversary of the interesting event here recorded, and the members and friends of the congregation celebrated it by holding a tea party and public meeting. The minister of the chapel, the Rev. E. Allen, was called to the chair, and very interesting addresses were delivered by the Rev. Charles Howe, of Dewsbury, and Messrs. H. J. Morehouse and George Holden, members of the congregation.

MANCHESTER: SUNDAY AFTERNOON LECTURES.—The Rev. J. P. Hopps gave the last of these lectures, for the present season, in the Memorial Hall on Sunday. The hall was moderately filled with those who have been accustomed to attend the lectures that he has delivered there during the winter months. At the close of the lecture a business meeting was held, and the following resolutions were passed: 1st. "That the hearty thanks of this meeting be given to the lecturer." 2nd. "That in the opinion of this meeting it is desirable that these lectures be resumed next autumn." 3rd. "That certain gentlemen be added to the standing committee."

MIDDLESBOROUGH.—Sermons were preached here, on Sunday last, by the Rev. J. C. Street, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, in behalf of the Unitarian School, when the children sang appropriate hymns in a manner which reflected great credit upon themselves and their teachers. The collections exceeded those made on previous occasions.

ROTHERHAM.—A popular and very successful concert, in connection with the Hollis School, was given on Thursday evening, when there were about 600 present. A complimentary tea, of a substantial character was given, prior to the concert, to about thirty persons, who had mainly assisted at the "Hollis-school Penny Readings" throughout the season.

SWINDON.—The Rev. William Banks, of Blackburn, has accepted the appointment of assistant minister to the Rev. F. R. Young, of the Free Christian Church, New Swindon, and he will enter on his new duties on the first Sunday in May.

TODMORDEEN.—On Saturday last, a soirée was held at the Oddfellows' Hall, to mark the closing of the Sunday evening services there for the present season. The Rev. Lindsey Taplin was in the chair. In his opening remarks he stated that the first course of lectures and services which he had given in that hall was in the year 1862; that owing to the pressure of duties which the cotton famine brought with it, he had not been able to continue them through the two following seasons, but that with the close of 1864 he had returned to these services again, and they were now regarded as quite an institution of the town. During the last three years these services had been under the management of the "Hall Committee," and the expenses connected with them had been defrayed by means of an offertory. He owed many thanks to several brother ministers, who had kindly assisted him during that period in the conduct of these services. The meeting was then addressed by the Revs. S. A. Steinthal, J. Freeston, and W. Rogers (Burnley). The chapel and Sunday-school choir and instrumental band contributed to the pleasure of the evening; and a resolution having been passed in favour of the maintenance of these services during the winter months, and the usual thanks given, the meeting, which was in every respect a very successful one, broke up.

OPENING OF THE HASTINGS UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

The Building Committee have pleasure to announce that the OPENING SERVICES will take place on Wednesday, May 6th, and that the Rev. R. B. ASPLAND, M.A., has kindly consented to preach the opening Sermon. The Committee trust that as many friends as can make it convenient will be present on this occasion. The amount already subscribed is £243. 1s. 6d., leaving a balance of about £250 to be raised. The Committee urgently solicit donations towards this amount as they are very desirous of freeing the building from debt before the trust deed is completed, and the building handed over to the Trustees.

Further donations will be thankfully received by Mr. S. C. BIGGESS, treasurer, George-street, Hastings, and by Mr. THOMAS KENWARD, jun., No. 1, Blomfield Terrace, St. Leonards-on-Sea.

MANCHESTER DOMESTIC MISSIONS—ROCHDALE ROAD CHAPEL.

In the late severe storms the wall of an adjoining manufactory, which had been left standing after a fire, was blown down, and in its fall destroyed the outbuildings, heating apparatus, &c., of the Rochdale Road Chapel.

The Committee are obliged to ask for help towards Rebuilding the premises destroyed; and as the Schools have for some time past been in Want of Proper Class Rooms, avail themselves of this opportunity of erecting them on the ground where the former offices stood, and where the needful accommodation can be obtained for about £100. The street which runs behind the Chapel has to be paved, and this will require an outlay of £30. Nearly £150, therefore, is needed, towards which it is intended to devote the £40 which was given so generously by the Strangeways Sewing School, and also £10 contributed by Mr. Barry, the owner of the adjoining manufactory. £100 will, therefore, have to be raised by voluntary gifts, and the Committee trust that the liberal donations of the supporters of the truly Christian work of the Missions will speedily provide the Funds required.

Subscriptions will be thankfully received by the treasurer, Mr. R. D. DARBISHIRE, B.A., 26, George-street; Rev. W. GASKELL; Rev. S. ROBINSON, St. Oswald's Grove, Rochdale Road; or Rev. S. ALFRED STEINTHAL, 107, Upper Brook-street.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

The "woman question" is making way on the Continent, as well as in America. It is even gaining ground in Italy, and is the subject of two volumes just published, at Milan, by Signora Mozzoni. Speaking of that large class of Italian women who are still educated in convents, she says they carry from the convent "into family life that narrow, intolerant, superstitious, and retrograding spirit which, inoculated by affection into the natures of husbands and children, causes deplorable hindrance to the development of the nation."

Nice has been the scene of a novel and unprecedented ceremony, the consecration of a Greek church in a Roman Catholic town by one Crown Prince of Russia in memory of another. The late Czarewitch died in the Villa Bermond. The house was demolished, and a church built upon the site. The present Czarewitch came from St. Petersburg to witness the consecration.

The Semaine Religieuse says that the Hungarian Bishops are desirous of admitting the laity to share in the administration of the affairs of the Church, as the best means of reviving a religious spirit, and of counteracting the indifference which prevails among all classes. The same tendency seems to pervade a new sect, broken off from the Catholic Church. This sect originated in the Theiss district, and in the great plain between that river and the Danube, among the Magyar population. Its adherents have adopted the name of Nazarenes, and are found in great numbers among the pure Hungarian peasantry. As yet the characteristics of this new religion are not clearly known. It admits no sacerdotal class, and any one who feels moved to it may rise and speak or pray in their meetings. The members of this sect refuse to baptise their infants or to take any oath. Each community constitutes a closely united society in which not only the common interests, but the private affairs of individuals are discussed and arranged. Every one admits the members of this sect to be sober, industrious, and peaceable.

The accounts of the state of the Pope's health are somewhat conflicting. He is of a remarkably long-lived family, but an old complaint has returned with symptoms which alarm his physicians, and though he has rallied after its attacks, his condition is regarded as precarious. On the festival of the Annunciation, he went, according to custom, to the Church of Santa Maria-sopra-Minerva, in one of the halls of which the trial of Galileo took place, and his sentence and retraction were pronounced. The state carriage was preceded by the Pontifical cross-bearer on a white mule, and contained beside the Pope, Cardinals Bonaparte and Berardi. Though the streets were thronged, not a single voice broke the profound silence with which his Holiness was received, till he reached the piazza before the church where the clerical party had mustered in force, and greeted him with loud acclamations.

The reception of the Père Gratry, of the Oratory, as a member of the French Academy, was made a sort of liberal Catholic demonstration, M. de Montalembert and others who sympathise with him being present. The fauteuil occupied by the Père was the same in which Voltaire once sat, and before him Massillon; affording an opportunity to their successor to remark happily, in the opening of his discourse, that thus "Voltaire and his sardonic sneer at human nature found themselves placed, in the annals of the Academy, between two priests of the Oratory, and two prayers for the world." The new academician, who is the author of numerous theological works, took for his subject the historical writings of M. de Barante, especially those relating to the Revolution. He asserted with considerable firmness, and despite Pio Nono's Syllabus, his adherence to what was good in the principles of 1789, while rejecting the excesses committed in their name; and was particularly emphatic in his denunciations of "absolute power," whether as exercised by Louis XIV. or the First Napoleon; or by others whom the speaker refrained from designating more particularly.

The Vicar of Trumpington is distributing papers headed "Crumbs of Comfort for True Protestants," which contain the following:

"Who and what are Protestants?"

"Dr. Colenso and Socinians are Protestants, therefore Protestantism does not believe in our Lord's Divinity.

"Baptists are Protestants, therefore Protestantism does not believe in Infant Baptism.

"Quakers are Protestants, therefore Protestantism does not believe in Sacraments.

"Swiss Calvinists are Protestants, therefore Protestantism does not believe in the Atonement.

"Who began the Protestant movement in England?"

"An adulterer—Henry VIII.

"Who helped him?"

"Thomas Cromwell, a robber and murderer.

"Who promoted the movement?"

"Thomas Cranmer, a perjured person.

"Has the Church of England ever called herself Protestant?"

"No, certainly not; some people wanted her to do so in Dutch William's time, but Convocation indignantly refused to do so.

"What does she call herself?"

"The Bishops assembled in solemn Conference at Lambeth the other day, styled her 'the Anglican Branch of the Church Catholic.'

"What is the grand principle of Protestantism?"

"That every man can judge for himself what is right in matters of religion.

"What is the reverse of this principle?"

"The principle of external authority and of restraint.

"Who, then, was the first Protestant?"

"The devil.

"How so?"

"Because he didn't like the principle of authority, and protested against the restraints of the Heavenly Order.

"What became of him?"

"He was defeated and cast out.

"And what will become of Protestantism?"

"It will likewise be cast out of the Church, and be utterly crushed, defeated, and spurned."

The Dean of Maritzburg began his mission to England, "on behalf of the suffering Church of Natal," on Sunday last, at St. Lawrence's, most appropriately, he thought, because there had recently been assembled so many Bishops of the Church from all parts of the world.

According to the Globe, the judgment of the Dean of Arches in the St. Alban's case is not to go unchallenged. The Church Association, the real promoters of the suit, have determined to appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council against his decision respecting lights on the altar.

The Ritualists, on the contrary, seem satisfied with the result. Mr. Mackonochie, writing to the Bishop of London, says he "cannot but feel the deepest thankfulness that a judgment, conceived in such a spirit of deep and true Catholicity, should have been delivered." There is no doubt that so far Sacerdotalism has been the gainer. The altar may still be draped after the Roman fashion, lights burn upon it, priestly vestments be worn, clouds of incense wrap the worshippers, water be mixed with the wine before instead of during the service, and though the lifting of the elements is forbidden, the symbolical gestures and genuflections hitherto practised may still be continued.

A circular has been issued to the Irish Roman Catholic priests, informing them for their guidance that the diocesan authorities consider the ceremony of the approaching installation in St. Patrick's Cathedral as purely civil in its character, and therefore as not coming within the prohibition against Catholics assisting at acts of religious worship different from those of the Catholic Church.

Last week, the Rev. F. D. Maurice delivered an interesting lecture on "Milton," in the Weigh-House Chapel (Mr. Binney's), as one of a course in connection with the Young Men's Society belonging to it.

The ill-will shown [to the Compulsory Church Rates Abolition Bill by the Government, six members of which strove to delay its being passed by the Commons, has been again manifested in the Lords, where objection was taken to its being read a second time yesterday, because it was the day before the Easter holidays; and in consequence it has had to be postponed till the 23rd.

Dr. Lee's pulpit, All Saints', Lambeth, was occupied on Friday evening by Father Ignatius, and the service was interrupted by hisses, groans, and derisive laughter. It is stated that Mr. Lyne delivered an animated sermon, the burden of which was "Mary." He spoke very loudly and boldly of the "sacrifice" of the altar. There was no further disturbance in the church, but there was a good deal of rioting in the streets as the congregation left.

Some of our readers may like to know that a translation has just been published of Tischendorf's work on the "Origin of the Four Gospels." In a scholarly, but yet popular, form it presents the evidence for their genuineness, and enters into an examination of the statements of Renan and others on the subject, showing them to be unfounded.

At a late Bible Society meeting, it was stated that since the first formation of the society it had circulated 54,000,000 copies of the Scriptures in 178 languages and dialects; and as nearly the same number had been circulated by kindred societies in America and other parts of the world, the total circulation reached about a hundred millions.

On Sunday last, the Rev. Charles Kingsley, preaching in the Chapel Royal, Whitehall, combated the doctrines of the Arians, and of those who in later times had held views which were destructive of the Christian scheme, and contended that, translate them as they might, the Scriptures bore direct testimony to the divinity of Jesus Christ. If they did not believe in the mysteries of Christianity, they might say with Homer, that man is the most miserable of all the beasts of the field. If he who suffered on Calvary was not the Son of God, was it not true that there was a better person in the world than God himself? What this means we must leave our readers to discover; we confess we cannot.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

The Bishop of Oxford, whose speech on Sunday schools, some short time back, caused a good deal of remark, takes up the subject again in Good Words. Among the reforms which he would introduce, the first is the banishment of all that bears the character of work, such as that of the day-school, from the teaching. The teacher, he tells us, should never be the master of the day-school; nor should the room be the daily school-room. "The introduction of chairs instead of benches, of tables round which the classes can sit, are of great use." Teachers, too, are to be of a lively order. "Brightness, playfulness, power of sympathy, power of song,—a sort of bird-like temperament,—these are natural qualifications for the Sunday-school teacher." The importance of a high religious character is also insisted upon. "But 'perhaps the most important point of all is the selection of the scholars.'" The Bishop strongly condemns the practice of making the school a sort of "moral foundling hospital," and, not without reason, censures the parents who send their infant children to school merely to get rid of them for a few hours. In Utopia, young children would not come to Sunday schools at all; but as we are not yet in that happy state, they ought to be kept separate from the elder scholars. He urges the importance of retaining these, and recommends something in the shape of adult Bible classes for them. He thinks these should not be held in the afternoon, for young men and women will "keep company," and it is better they should do this in the day-time than at twilight; and he suggests therefore that three-quarters of an hour before afternoon service would be the best time for holding such a class for females, and the same time before evening service for the males.

Dr. Massingham, the railing itinerant lecturer of the Church Institution, appears to be dealing out his abuse too strongly even for his own partizans. The Church Journal considers that there is "a bullying in the style of his address, and an assumption of authority, not at all likely to convince the gainsayers."

In the Sword and the Trowel, Mr. Spurgeon has the following remarks on the educational question:

"Since the sectarian system has in England most evidently failed to reach the needs of the millions, a purely secular system will be established, and will be thrust upon us whether we will or no. There will be a great outcry about the divorcing of religion from education, but we shall not join in it, partly because it is useless to cry over spilt milk—the thing must be, and there is no preventing it; and yet more, because we think we see our way to a real great gain out of a small apparent loss. Children are to lose the religious training which they received in National and British schools: we admit that there may be cases in which the loss will be appreciable, but we think they are few and far between. The lads of the village might generally carry in a hollow tooth all the religion they receive at the charity schools. Do not they learn the Church Catechism? Yes; but that is not religion; it begins with an assertion of baptismal regeneration, maunders about behaving one's-self lowly and reverently to one's betters, in a manner suitable for an American negro previous to the late war; and has not a fraction of the simple Gospel of Jesus in it from end to end. It will be highly beneficial to the morality of youth to dispense with this miserable farrago, in which the false of superstition and the true of law are hopelessly jumbled. The present religious teaching of our week-day schools is, as we believe, as nearly as possible a sham, and a most mischievous sham too."

In a letter to the Freeman, giving a depreciatory estimate of "Ecce Homo," the Rev. John Aldis says well:

"Nor do I object that this book is not orthodox. That it is orthodox in any sense the author would be the last to maintain. In view of those who say it is, I imagine that if he should notice them at all, he will lift his brows in astonishment or turn away with contempt. Yet to denounce anything as unorthodox is neither wise nor right. This is a symbol and instrument of ecclesiastical tyranny, which Dissenters will do well to abandon for ever. It appeals to prejudice and digests nothing. Its rule is passion and its product delusion. It can never fetter thought, but only distort the expression of it. It makes the supple hypocrites and the daring martyrs, and lifts a denounced error into the throne of honour. But there is a far greater question, and the only one really worth asking—Is the thing affirmed true? If it be, wherever found and whatever name it bear, I am a guilty fool if I spurn it. If it be not, I am bound to reject it though it be resplendent with wit, and I am denounced as an unappreciative fogy."

Mr. Peter Bayne, in an article on education, in the Christian World Magazine, observes:

"Among the causes which have given the body of the population of Scotland so high a character for centuries, which have inspired them with worthy ambitions, and accustomed them to appreciate and value education, perhaps the very first has been the accessibility, by means of the parish schools and the cheap University system, of the profession of the Presbyterian ministry to the youth of the country. The Scottish Churches have had the cream of Scottish talent, and the Scottish commonality has never swerved in its affection for churches to which it felt itself allied by a thousand close, and tender, and honourable ties."

In noticing some sermons on the Liturgy of the Church of England, by the Vicar of Doncaster, the Freeman says:

"We cannot but feel surprise and sorrow to find Dr. Vaughan contending for the retention of the Athanasian Creed, with its awful—we had almost said its blasphemous—damnatory clauses, in the public services of the Church. That it is a curious and interesting monument of the controversies of the past, is surely a poor reason for retaining it. While as to its use as a protest against the notion that a man is not responsible for his belief, we hold it to be much more effectual in its demonstration of the bitterness of spirit which theological disputes have ever engendered, and of the fearful presumption with which fallible men venture to denounce the vengeance of heaven against those who deny the authority of their interpretations of the truth of God. The sooner it is consigned to the pages of church history, the better for the interests alike of truth and love."

In a late number of the Standard, a correspondent calling himself "One who ought to know," seems ambitious of outdoing the Premier in practising on the gullibility of his party. He says that, having been connected with the Ultramontane body for several years, and being acquainted with many of their secrets, he feels it his duty, now that Mr. Gladstone is about to attack the Church of England, to let his followers know that, when he went to Rome, he made arrangements with his Holiness the Pope to destroy the Irish Church and ultimately to make the Catholic Church the State Church for Ireland. In explanation of this extraordinary conduct we are told that Mr. Gladstone "is himself a Catholic at heart;" and in proof of this assertion we are assured that "all his nearest and dearest friends are of that persuasion," and also that the writer thinks somebody else knows that the recent announcement of a distinguished convert being about to enter the Catholic Church had reference to Mr. Gladstone alone. In conclusion the writer proposes that Mr. Gladstone should be asked in the House of Commons if he can deny the truth of all this stupid rubbish.

The English Independent is not able, any more than ourselves, to understand the "kind of petty spite" which influences the Spectator in its references to Nonconformists. Praising it for its general candour in criticising individuals and parties, the Independent remarks that this sort of spirit seems altogether to desert it in dealing with Nonconformists, and adds:

"To us the thing is more surprising because of the avowed ecclesiastical sympathies of the writers. From the advocates of a narrow and exclusive theory of the Church we are prepared to expect contemptuous treatment, and we have become so accustomed to it that it has lost any sting which once it may have had. But from men who are, par excellence, the advocates of perfect freedom, and the censurers of everything that savours of intolerance, and whose great aim is to inaugurate an era of universal peace and charity in the Church, we have a right surely to look for that respect to which a conscientious adherence to our own principles may entitle us. We should be sorry to conclude that Broad Churchism is just as narrow at heart, just as strong in its prejudices against those who do not acquiesce in its views, just as unwilling to make the concessions to opponents which not only courtesy, but simple truth and justice require, as those whose bigotry it is so fond of denouncing; but this really appears to be the fact. It claims freedom for itself; it would extend the limits of the Church, and thus embrace many who are now excluded; it would seek by this process to make it more truly national; but if the Spectator fairly represents its spirit, it would treat all outsiders with supercilious contempt. Its bigotry would thus seem to gain in intensity what it loses in extension, and the few who are not embraced within its scheme of comprehension, and by standing aloof mar its idea of a national Christianity, must be content to find themselves the objects of its indignation and scorn."

In a letter to the Daily News, Dr. Liddon repeats some of the objections to Mr. Coleridge's Bill, which he had previously urged in the Guardian. He says that, some time ago, he proposed that, instead of the subscription now required, should be substituted subscription to the Nicene Creed. This would have admitted Roman Catholics, and most Protestant Dissenters to the M.A. degree, while "it would have excluded Socinians, Deists, and the yet more negative forms of conviction beyond them." What he is afraid of is not Dissent, but sceptical philosophy. Speaking for himself and Dr. Pusey, he says "we do not propose to repress philosophy," only it must be a philosophy which, more or less, squares with theirs. It is not enough for him that Mr. Coleridge's Bill leaves the theological faculty untouched, he must have "a security that all departments of knowledge shall be administered from a Christian point of view." He hopes nothing from Liberals of Mr. Lowe's type, but something from religious ones, like Mr. Bright; and "among earnest Dissenters, even those who are conscientiously most opposed to the doctrines of the Church, would, he believes, unite in promoting an effort which might save this country from the misery of establishing a purely godless education in the chief centres of its intellectual life." Surely, Dr. Liddon must know enough of what is taking place at both Oxford and Cambridge, especially the former, to see that subscription and tests are powerless in keeping out the "philosophy" which he so much dreads, and that it is not by such means that its prevalence is to be checked.

A correspondent of the English Independent having asked some time ago whether persons holding Universalist opinions were admissible to the fellowship of Congregational churches, another correspondent, who feels a strong sense of the need that this question should be fully and openly answered, says:

"The number of thoughtful men and women who unobtrusively hold these or related opinions, and 'trust the larger hope,' is already great (so far as I can judge from the phenomena of a limited experience of what is occurring in the general Church), and is continually becoming greater. If required to give a definite expression of belief, they will not be afraid to do so; but as a rule they prefer to consider the subject as belonging to the region of that 'higher faith' which many even of true Christians are not yet prepared to enter, and therefore speak upon it only to such as they deem able to receive their words without offence. As it is unquestionable that these views with regard to future discipline and its duration are thoughtfully and honestly entertained, the objection as to whether they agree with a strictly literal rendering of Scripture cannot be raised. We have only to do with the moral sincerity of those who hold them, and must therefore assume that they have been received with full and intelligent consideration of all that the Bible says. The real questions involved in that asked by your correspondent are therefore these: Does Universalism contradict the Christian spirit? Is it inconsistent with love to the Lord Jesus Christ? Does it necessarily imply another Gospel?"

The editor of the Independent is evidently disinclined to have the subject ventilated, and dismisses it with this curt note:

"These are questions which cannot be discussed in our columns. The answer to the only question that can be raised here is, that we are not accustomed to require any doctrinal tests from our members, but it is impossible that Universalists should find themselves at home in our churches."

REVIEW.

The British Quarterly Review. April, 1868.

THE present number maintains its character by the variety and importance of its articles. We notice only those of especial interest to our readers. An article, on The Great Vatican MS. of the New Testament, details the difficulties which have prevented Biblical critics from collating this MS., describes briefly the editions by Cardinal Mai, and recounts the steps by which Tischendorf succeeded in gaining permission—not to publish a fac-simile of the MS., which the Pope wishes to do himself, but—to correct the errors of Cardinal Mai's edition. Yet he could not resist the temptation to transcribe many whole pages. This was observed, and Vercellone, the monk under whose care the two editions of the Vatican MS. were published, was appointed to superintend the completion of the work. Thus the latter part of Tischendorf's recently published edition of the MS. is not, as it professes on the title-page, "Ex ipso codice" (from the MS. itself). He was obliged to omit, in his collation of the latter part, "the spaces and punctuations, and other marks which the Codex contains."

Various critical indications show that this MS. may be referred to the 4th century. It does not contain the Eusebian canons, which were published about the year 330, and which appear in the Sinaitic MS. But those two most ancient MSS. correspond in many points. Tischendorf thinks that the hand of one copyist may be detected in parts of both MSS. There is thus considerable ground for fixing the date of each. The Vatican MS. appears to have been first written, and then corrected by the usual Diorthetes, or, as a modern printer would technically say, the "reader." Another writer has gone over it again, inking the faded letters afresh, and adding accents, breathings, &c. His own additions are in the small cursive character, and so point to the tenth or eleventh century as the time of his revision.

We quote a few of the more important of the readings given by the reviewer.

St. Matthew, vi. 13.—The clause, "For thine is the kingdom, the power, and the glory, for ever, Amen," is omitted from the Lord's Prayer: as in St. Luke's version of that prayer in the Revised Text.

St. Matthew, xix. 17, 18, reads: "Master, what good thing shall I do, that I may have eternal life? And he said unto him, Why askest thou me concerning what is good. There is the [not 'one'] good." (ἐστὶν ὁ ἀγαθος.)

John, i. 18.—"No man hath seen God at any time, the only begotten God (μονογενὴς θεός) which is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him." So also the Sinaitic and other MSS., and the Peshito Syriac.

Acts, xvi. 7.—"But the Spirit suffered them not;" omitting "of Jesus" after Spirit.

Acts, xx. 28.—"Feed the Church of God, which he hath purchased with his own blood." Tischendorf decides, against previous doubts, that this is the reading of the Vatican MS.

St. Mark, xvi. 8—20, is omitted, but the copyist has left a gap of a column and a quarter, as though it were absent from his copy, and he intended to supply it from some other source.

The text of the Three Heavenly Witnesses is omitted, and the reviewer briefly defends the spuriousness of that text against the elaborate but illogical and insufficient defence of it recently published by the Rev. Charles Foster, B.D.

A very sound and sensible article on Nonconformists and National Education adduces the early history of the Government educational grants to show that, in their recent change of ground upon this subject, the Independents are guilty of no change of principle. It shows the need of increased education, suggests that no religious instruction should be prescribed or tested by Government; that a conscience clause should be enforced; and that the requirements as to certificated masters and pupil teachers should be cancelled. It sketches out a rating system of education, much like the bill of Mr. Bruce and Mr. Forster; argues for the retainment of school fees; urges that when children at work are compelled to go to school, compulsion should be much more readily put upon those idling on the streets; and concludes thus spiritedly:

"In all these reforms we shall have against us the vast majority of the clergy, and nearly the whole strength of the Conservative party. The fight will be a severe one. But in the new electors there is a force which, wisely and resolutely used, will enable us to defy all resistance. In relation to this great question the interests of the Nonconformists and the interests of the great mass of the English people are identical. We can, if we please, place ourselves at the head of a great popular movement, and render the country the most substantial service." (p. 433.)

A brief article on the Intercommunion of Churches prefaces a notice of Dean Alford's recent liberal papers in Good Words and the Contemporary Review, by pointing out the true union that exists among all real disciples of Christ, as members of his invisible Holy Catholic Church; a union which, though it cannot agree in the expression of dogma, is often very close in the nature of its faith. It claims from the Establishment a truer recognition of the conscientious position, the refined and educated feeling, the Christian activities of Nonconformists, and then acknowledges the liberal spirit which the Dean of Canterbury has expressed in the paper above mentioned. It rejoices that a clerical meeting should, seventeen years ago, have unanimously voted that "an orthodox Dissenter may be regarded as a member of Christ's church," though wondering and almost sneering at the state of mind in which such a question could be posited and discussed. It accepts the liberal view by which Dean Alford would test Christianity, not by the dogmatic expression of faith, but by a man's own claim.

"We want for Christendom a fact, not a doctrine, as the test of inclusion; and we are thus drawn back (says the Dean) to the definition before alluded to, as furnished us by the Church herself when she explains 'the good estate of the Catholic Church' to be attained by 'all who profess and call themselves Christians being led into the way of truth.' Christendom is as wide as the Christian name; as wide as the recognition of Christ as master." p. 482.

So, says the reviewer (and apparently with approval) the Church of England "has no right to unchristianise or unchurch even the Unitarian."

Moreover, the Dean allows that the church government of the Nonconformists is not to be rejected as unscriptural or unchristian; describes the Nonconformist bodies in words of very high praise; and suggests three steps that might be taken towards a closer connection; (1) that Nonconformist divines should, under certain regulations, be invited to preach in the Established Churches; (2) that Christians should unite together in the celebration of the Lord's Supper; and (3) that efforts be made on both sides to promote mutual understanding and friendly intercourse.

We need hardly mention an article on the Irish Church Question, as it was written before the late triumphant division, further than to support its appeal for earnest and active effort in the cause of liberal church reform.

THE WORK THAT OUR MINISTERS OUGHT TO BE ABLE TO DO.

[COMMUNICATED; NO. III., BY THE MINISTERS' SALARIES COMMITTEE.]

It used to be considered essential to the character of one who aspired to minister to an important English Presbyterian or Unitarian congregation, that he should have received the most complete education, which, consistently with the exclusiveness of the national universities, could be given him; that he should keep himself abreast with the best thought and scholarship of the times; and that he should make some original and valuable contribution to theological literature. We have changed a good deal of all this; whether for the better it is not our present purpose to inquire. Change proceeds, for the most part, by a method of compensation; and, at least, a part of what is lost in one direction may be gained in another. We may be more popular in our preaching, if we are less accurate in our scholarship; if our grasp upon the educated relaxes, it may be more tightly closed upon the poor; and Sunday schools and missionary societies may supply the place of learned treatises and well written books. It is quite possible that many among us may think the gain at least equal to the loss; nor is the writer of these lines at all disposed to question the value of these popular agencies, which are among the latest manifestations of our religious life. To strike the balance of profit and loss, which is the net result of these changes, is not his present object. It is enough to point out the fact (as he considers it to be) that the intellectual status of Unitarian ministers is steadily on the decline. Look at the facts of the case. Whatever literary work of a high class is done amongst us, is done by the ministers of a generation now approaching the decline of life. An essay or two in some review is all that can be traced to our younger ministers. We mention no names; to do so would be invidious. But is it not a common reflection in our social intercourse, that vacant places involving weighty duties are hard to fill up; and that there are places, which must be vacant before long, which it will be impossible to fill up? There is a great ferment and commotion in men's theological ideas: new books every year create fresh excitement, but the ferment is not our making. And the new books are not written by us. Conjointly with this, so large a liberalising process has taken place, that the public are willing to listen to a really fresh and strong utterance from any quarter. Mr. Tayler's book on the Fourth Gospel has attracted general attention and criticism in quite a remarkable way. Yet still we are silent. Just at the moment when the very current of thought which we have so long laboured to create is setting towards us, we are wholly shut up in missionary societies and Sunday schools. Just as our neighbours are beginning to think, we are weaning ourselves from so troublesome a habit. We are getting tired of principles, just as they are finding out that it has been a mistake to try to do without them. The writer is as strong an advocate as any for missionary societies and Sunday schools, for their proper objects, and in their proper places; but the work of the free Christian churches which descend from 1862—if it is not now to be let drop from weak and irresolute hands—cannot be done by them, but only by solid learning and severe thought, and the freest and brightest speech.

This is a moral evil, and moral evils are not to be removed by material means; but material means may have something to do with causing them. What possibility is there that our young ministers should devote themselves to the highest and most permanent form of literary effort? Let us take the case of one who may have received an admirable education in Manchester New College, who has won academical distinctions in the University of London, who, aided by the Hibbert Trust, has still further pursued his studies at a foreign university, and who settles down in one of our congregations at an average salary of £150 a year. Presently, at the place of his first settlement or elsewhere, his income may rise to double that sum; but except he be a man of rare good fortune he must not look for more. And he must marry. He would be dangerous to the peace of mind of the matrons of his congregation if he did not. He must not ask any of their daughters to share his poverty; and yet he must not go into another flock, nor ask any but a lady to share it. Then come children, whom, perhaps, he is himself obliged to teach, because he cannot afford to pay a teacher. Or he "forms a class"—that is the proper phrase—and makes himself a private tutor. Perhaps he still clings to literature, having some hopes and instincts of authorship not yet worn out of him; but if so, he must make it pay, and it is of the ephemeral kind which brings him the speediest pecuniary return. Where is he to get his books? He begs them, he borrows them; circulating libraries and reviews do the rest; and he passes out of the habit of steadfast study for want of its material appliances. He can indulge in no plans which involve, ever so remotely, an invasion of his slender purse. If he have anything to spare from daily bread, it must go for insurance. To make the venture which is always implied in authorship, and especially in theological authorship, is to rob his wife and children.

It does not by any means follow that larger salaries would involve an increase of literary activity on the part of our ministers. But in some cases, at least, they would remove that activity out of the region of the impossible. A man may not choose to fly, having wings; but at all events he cannot fly without them. Ministers with libraries are not always the most zealous students, but books are, nevertheless, needful to make a student. But another important matter is the attitude of our congregations in this respect. Until they are willing to make some sacrifices of present and personal gain, ministers cannot be other than they are. Are not they held to be far more the servants of their flocks than of truth and piety at large? A man must preach acceptably, brilliantly if possible, twice every Sunday; he must attend the Sunday school once or twice on the same day, or feel that it has been neglected for want of his personal supervision; he must make and keep himself acquainted with every member of his congregation; he must respond at once to the call of sickness or of society; he must be in his place at countless "committees;" whenever a Unitarian minister can find standing room upon any public platform he must show himself; he must keep up with the politics, the social movements, the general literature of the time, and he must bear without ill-temper to be told that he works only one day in seven. There are men who do all this, unflinchingly and successfully, with large result of influence and the consciousness of a place well filled. But where is the possibility of sustained study, of deliberate thought? It is difficult to save from such calls to incessant activity the time which is needful to feed the springs of life: there is nothing left to devote to the public good. Such a labourer may have possessed the power of literary exertion; may even have tried his wings not altogether without success; but little by little cherished schemes drop out of sight amidst the press of common duties—the thirst for scholarly or literary excellence dies away from utter lack of satisfaction; he learns to look upon the thought that he might have spoken with effect to a larger audience than gathers round his own pulpit as an idle dream of youth, and he finds a compensation which God never refuses to any true dutifulness in the unintermitting energy of faithfulness. Still, is it all gain? The special congregation profits, but the wider interests of truth and goodness may be the losers. If the present conception of ministerial duty had always prevailed amongst us, we should be absolutely without a literature. But cases of Pegasus in harness, it will be said, are rare indeed: most often it is the mill horse that does the mill work, and is fit for nothing better. Very likely; but still it may be questioned whether putting all horses to one dull round, and making them go through it as the main purpose of their existence, has not a tendency to produce a breed of mill horses and to discourage the birth of Pegasus at all. It is a better thing to preach well than to preach often. There is greater gain, even for denominational purposes, in leading thought than in gathering congregations; and a minister may be better employed in writing a good book, which only himself can do, than in filling a Sunday school, which half his congregation might, if they would, do for him. Only, if we prefer our ministers to be mere hewers of spiritual wood and drawers of spiritual water, let us not wonder or grumble if the leaders of the new reformation in England are not children of our household.

EARLY ROMAN AND BRITISH CHRISTIANS.

THE second landing of the Romans in Britain occurred A.D. 43, or about ten years after the crucifixion of our Lord. There is no doubt that the Christian religion had gained a footing in Rome, and even engaged the attention of the government previously to the death of the Emperor Claudius, A.D. 54. Among the great number of persons who came from Rome to Britain, to occupy civil and military posts, was Aulus Plautius, the very first Roman whom was entrusted the government of Britain. Concerning the lady of Aulus Plautius, Tacitus gives the following account:—"Pomponia Græcina, a lady of distinction, married to Plautius, who was honoured with an ovation for his victories in Britain, was accused of having embraced a foreign superstition, and her trial for that crime was committed to her husband. Plautius assembled her kindred, and, in observance of ancient law and custom, having in their presence held solemn inquisition upon the conduct and character of his wife, pronounced her innocent of anything immoral." Lipsius and others are of opinion that what is here called "a foreign superstition" was the Christian religion. If she were really a Christian, and accompanied her husband during his residence in Britain from A.D. 43 to A.D. 47, she might have promoted the preaching of the Gospel in Britain at a very early period.

In St. Paul's 2nd Epistle to Timothy, c. iv. v. 21, we find this passage: "Eubulus greeteth thee, and Pudens, and Linus, and Claudia, and all the brethren." It is believed that the Pudens here mentioned was a Roman of exalted birth, and Claudia a British princess, daughter of Cogidunus, the client king of the Emperor Claudius, in honour of whom the daughter had been named Claudia. Cogidunus reigned over the Regni, a British tribe who inhabited Sussex and the greater part of Surrey; Chichester was his capital. Now the poet Martial, in one of his epigrams (lib. iv. epi. 13) writes: "Claudia Peregrina Rufus is about to be married to my friend Pudens. Be propitious, Hymen, with thy torches!" And again (lib. xi. epi. 53): "Although born amongst the blue-eyed Britons, how fully has Claudia Rufina the intelligence of the Roman people! What beauty is hers! The matrons of Italy might take her for a Roman," &c. There is little doubt that the Pudens and Claudia of whom Martial wrote are the Pudens and Claudia alluded to by St. Paul in his epistle. In the latter epigram quoted, Pudens is called Holy—"Sanctus Maritus;" a strong presumption that he was one of those who were esteemed such, or, in other words, that Pudens was a Christian. It is not improbable that, along with his distinguished wife, Pudens may have come over into Britain, and taking up their abode at Chichester, these bosom friends of the Apostle may have taught the truths that lay nearest his heart. Tertullian, Origen, Athanasius, Eusebius, Arnobius, Jerome, Chrysostom, and Theodoret—all of whom wrote before the Romans finally abandoned Britain (say A.D. 440)—all give evidence tending to show that Christianity had been introduced into Britain previous to the withdrawal of the Romans.—Abridged from J. Corbet Anderson's Uriconium.

The Unitarian Herald.

FRIDAY, APRIL 10, 1868.

THE PROGRESS OF THE IRISH QUESTION.

THE overwhelming majority for Mr. GLADSTONE'S resolutions on the Irish Church on Friday last makes men of all parties rub their eyes. Public opinion is generally slow in this country in gathering strength to move at all, but when it has gathered strength it sometimes moves with strange velocity and force; and it has done so in this instance. Yet stronger than even the unexpected numerical victory was the preponderance in argument and moral earnestness on the part of the majority. On no question of our times, probably, have there been so many great speeches made in one debate by Liberals of very different shades, yet all tending to one simple conclusion, and able, moderate, and with the ring of far-seeing patriotic statesmanship. On the other hand, there has certainly been no debate of late years in which the Tory party have shown themselves so utterly weak. The result can hardly be doubted. The inevitable issue of any appeal to the present constituencies, still more all the prospects of ultimate appeal to the new constituencies under the Reform Bill, make it impossible for the question to rest with mere abstract resolutions. The country is now in earnest. Wherever great public meetings have been held, and the voice of the people really heard, the result has been unmistakeable. Two months ago a town's meeting, called by the Mayor of MANCHESTER, carried, over the heads of its promoters, resolutions deprecating interference with the Irish Church, the room being packed by Orangemen. In the same city, last Tuesday, a "Great Demonstration of Protestant Working Men" was held in the Free-trade Hall; but with all the drumming up of an organisation surprisingly compact and efficient, the hall was only about two-thirds filled, the most sedulous care being used to keep out the general public. The following night, however, came a fair appeal to the people; and how was it responded to? The Hall was densely packed, every inch of standing room on the platform, in the gallery, and on the floor being crowded with such an audience as has not assembled in that Hall since the exciting days of the agitation for the Repeal of the Corn Laws. The Orangemen had attended in force, with the evident purpose of playing their usual game of preventing the meeting being carried forward. But numerous as they were—a compact body of them having even got possession of a considerable space on the platform—they were simply swamped by the overwhelming feeling of the meeting. We believe that this will be the effect wherever the people can be really appealed to, and the Irish Church, as an Establishment, may be looked upon as under sentence of death.

And now the question begins to be in every one's mouth—How will the Protestants of the north of Ireland take it? For ourselves this question has a peculiar interest. We cannot forget that we represent a religious body whose congregations in the north of Ireland are to some extent in the same boat with the Establishment, having received the Regium Donum and grown up through generations to feel it almost a necessity of their existence. We have looked anxiously for some utterance on this subject from our Ulster friends. It seems an ungracious thing for us to be volunteering sacrifices which will have to fall upon them; and while feeling that Regium Donum would have to go, along with the Church Establishment, we have waited eagerly for some sign that our friends were not blinded by any interest of their own which they feel to be at stake, to the necessity of changes which to us seem as beneficial as they are inevitable. And we rejoice that our hopes have not been disappointed. We give in another column, at greater length than usual, the report of a quarterly meeting of one of our district associations in the neighbourhood of Belfast. The Non-subscribing Presbytery of Antrim is not a very large body, but the proceedings of even ten or twelve associated congregations have both interest and importance when they involve the giving up in every one of these congregations of £70 a year—in some cases the greater part of their income—and we feel it therefore to be a noble thing to find their feeling tending towards a unanimous renunciation of all State aid. We say "tending towards," inasmuch as the subject being introduced by a deputation from one of the constituent congregations, it was felt to be hardly fair to give, without notice, any decisive utterance binding upon the whole number; but a general meeting was convened for the earliest possible day (Monday next) to consider the whole question, and from what we are already able to report there can be little doubt that from this Non-subscribing Presbytery of Antrim will come the first protest from any State-endowed body among Irish Churches against the connection of Church and State or the endowment of any religion at all. We commend especially to the attention of our readers the admirable speech of the Moderator of the Presbytery—the Rev. JOHN JELLIE. What will add weight to this utterance is that it is not due to hatred of Catholicism. One of the old Puritans, writing of a refusal of Parliament to grant indulgence to the Nonconformists, added, by way of comfort, "They have, however, passed a sharp ordinance against the Catholics, which we take as a signal mercy." We are afraid that it is in much the same spirit that Orthodox Irish Presbyterians, after the most persistent beggary for an increase of Regium Donum, have just professed that they would sooner give up all State endowments than see them extended to the Catholics. It is in no such spirit that this utterance comes from the Presbytery of Antrim. Without a word against Catholicism, it takes the broad and simple ground that it would be better for the country and better for religion, for all churches to support themselves.

AMERICAN NOTES.

A dispute, more curious than profitable, has been going on between Dr. Barrows, a Congregationalist minister, and some of his Baptist brethren. He had stated that it was customary for Baptist candidates for immersion to wear "waterproof and tight-fitting garments;" but this statement he was obliged to withdraw. He maintains, however, still that the dress which is used unquestionably does "prevent the total wetting of the person." He says:

"If total wetting of all the surface of the body is requisite for valid immersion, then I assume to say that no Baptist minister dare affirm that one in ten of his subjects has been validly immersed. The question between them and me is simply on the extent of the wetting, that is, of protection. They do not believe in total wetting, and I do not believe in total protection."

The report of the corresponding secretary of the Sunday-school Union presents an encouraging view of the progress of American Methodist Sunday-school work in 1867. There were at the close of the year 15,292 schools, with 171,695 officers and teachers, 1,083,525 scholars, and 2,737,734 volumes in library. This gives an increase, over the previous year of 1,446 schools, 9,695 officers and teachers, 102,739 scholars, and 88,489 volumes.

The Wilberforce University, the only collegiate institution in North America belonging to coloured men, was founded in 1856, but taken possession of by its present managers in 1863. It was carried on by them with great success till 1865, when it was unfortunately burnt down. Early in the following year the trustees laid the foundations of the new building, on a fine piece of land, between three and four miles from Xenia, in the State of Ohio. The college, when finished, is to be 164 feet long by 44 wide, and consist of a centre and two wings, and to be capable of accommodating at least seventy-two boarding students, and the necessary staff of teachers. As yet, the west wing only has been completed, at a cost of nearly £4,000, of which above £1,200 yet remain unpaid. To complete the whole edifice about £7,000 is needed, and an appeal is made to English Christians of all denominations to help an institution which, as its name indicates, is designed to be a university where coloured young men can be trained, as many have already been, for the learned professions, and especially as missionaries and teachers among the freedmen and other portions of the Southern population.

An American paper states that a movement has been set on foot to erect an asylum for useless young men. The only trouble which the "committee" fear will be insurmountable is that of getting the building large enough. If the design were to be entertained, we fear the same difficulty would be found here.

In the Advance, a new paper established by the Congregationalists at Chicago, a discussion has been going on respecting Dr. Bushnell's views, which the editor considers likely to do good. He says:

"The article in our number of the 16th, showing that on the Atonement he substantially agrees with orthodoxy, while rejecting some of its words and phrases, has been read with great interest; and it will not be a breach of confidence, we trust, to say that Dr. Bushnell has endorsed it as the best and truest account of his position that has been given."

On which the remark of the English Independent is: "If this be so, we, in England, have read Dr. Bushnell's books to very little purpose."

The prejudice against colour still shows itself strongly in quarters where we should hardly have expected to find it. It appears that a congregational church, recently established in Washington, has already become divided on the attitude which it should assume towards Christian negroes. Two young coloured men applied for membership. After examination by the pastor and deacons, they were told, that they were welcome to unite with the church; but the pastor, Dr. Boynton, expressed his opinion that coloured people ought, as a duty to themselves and their class, to remain in their own organisations. On the following Sunday, the doctor preached a sermon setting forth his opinions, and advising the blacks to make communities of their own, and not "to bury themselves in a living grave—an unheeded little company in the masses of the whites." The two young men, thus struck in the face, concluded not to join the church, and from that hour it was rent into two parties; the majority sustaining the pastor, and a large minority, with General Howard at its head, and embracing three of the four deacons, seven resident ministers, the superintendent, and most of the teachers of the Sunday school, rejecting his doctrine as savouring of the spirit of caste.

The Tablet, a New York Roman Catholic paper, has the following remarks on Calvinism:

"It cannot be denied that Calvin was the great man of the Protestant rebellion. But for him, Luther's movement would, probably, have died out with himself and associates. Calvin organised it, gave it form and consistency, and his spirit has sustained it to this day. If Luther preceded him, it is still by his name rather than Luther's that the rebellion should be called, and the only form of Protestantism that still shows any signs of life and vigour is unquestionably Calvinism. It is Calvinism that sustains Methodism, that gives what little life it has to Lutheranism, and that prevents a very general return of Anglicans to the bosom of the Church. It is hardly too much to say that no greater heresiarch than John Calvin has ever appeared, or a more daring, subtle, adroit, or successful enemy of the Church of God. Calvinists, too, are the hardest of all the enemies of the truth to overcome and bring back to the truth, for, like their master, they believe only in might, and disregard all justice and mercy."

We wonder whether Mr. Disraeli would allow the following to be a specimen of invective "polished ad unguem." Describing the Rev. Henry Clay Dean, General Washbourne, of Indiana, said, "he is a man so low down that it would require a miracle of the Almighty to raise him to the level of total depravity."

In noticing a work on Dervishes, the Nation says:

"Of the doctrines held by them it may be said in general that, as seen from the outside, they consist in an excellent system of morality, in the inculcation of religious practices entirely in harmony with the teachings of the Koran, and of exercises—dancing, howling, sword-swallowing, eating of live coals, musical performances, and so on—which were once held to be infractions of the law of the Prophet, but which are now everywhere accepted. But there is another view to be taken of their belief—a view not obtained from the outside nor even by all Dervishes. There seems to be taught by some, at any rate, if not by all, of the sheikhs—and to some, if not to all, of their followers—a secret as well as a public system of belief. According to the latter, the description of the true Dervish is this:—'When it is asked what Dervish means, the reply is, 'One who asks nothing of any creature; and to be as submissive as the earth which is trodden upon by the feet; to serve others before yourself; to be contented with little; to do neither good nor evil; to abandon all desires; to divorce even his wife; to submit hourly to all occurrences of misfortune and accident; not to drink wine nor to lie; not to commit fornication; not to touch what does not belong to you; to know the true and the false, and to restrain the tongue and speak little.' But when the novice has been proved, has practised the virtues above enjoined, has by austerities and mystical contemplation annihilated his individuality and purged his spiritual eyes, then, it is said, he is taught to dispense with the Koran, and to reduce his belief to mysticism, to believe that ecstatic communication with God is something within his own power, and to think of morality as a thing indifferent. 'Purity, impurity, slowness, precipitation—all these distinctions are beneath Me,' one of the sheikhs makes God say to Moses; and the Sheikh Bayazid cried out in the midst of his disciples, 'Glory to me; I am above all things,—a form of words which, in the mouths of the Orientals, is applied to God alone. 'O my master!' a disciple said to Jelal ed Deen er Roomee, the founder of the 'Dancing Dervishes,'—'O my master! you have completed my doctrine by teaching me that you are God, and that all is God.' Many such passages might be quoted showing how different from the Mohammedanism of the Ulema is the faith of the Dervish. Pantheism, identification of God with the individual mystic, the exemption of the perfect from the chains of morality—which are only for the imperfect—the denial of submission to any authority except that of the Sheikh, the emptiness of positive religions and the allegorical character of all their dogmas—these are the tenets which seem to be held by the Dervish sects. Their identity with those of Indian mysticism and much modern quietism and transcendentalism is apparent. Metempsychosis also they believe in, and, as may be supposed, they are consistent fatalists."

THE REFORMED JEWS.

We take the following account, somewhat abridged, from the Christian World:

As the Jew of the West-end, the Jew of society, rich and cultivated, the Jew who gives good dinners, drives in a faultless brougham, on whose fingers diamonds sparkle, differs from the Houndsditch Jew, toiling along painfully under a load of oil cloth considerably the worse for wear, or smoking bad cigars in the Eppingham Saloon; so do the synagogues of the west differ from those of the east. Those in the Haymarket and at Bayswater are clean and comfortable, and that in Margaret-street especially so.

On Saturdays service commences there, at ten and terminates at one. Let us go there. As you enter, of course you face the ark. On each side benches, well cushioned, are placed. On the right of the ark is a pulpit. In the middle is the raised platform for the readers and the rabbi, the Rev. Mr. Marks. There is a gallery facing the pulpit, in which is an organ, an innovation of which the orthodox do not approve, as it implies Sabbath labour; and there is another innovation equally shocking. Actually in the side galleries appropriated to ladies you can see them; and if the Christian stranger should let his eyes wander thitherward he is to be forgiven. Hebrew is a difficult tongue to follow if you are ignorant of it; and, save where there is no singing, which is very fine, the reading of the prayers is not very impressive. Nor do the gentlemen around, all wearing black hats and a linen robe over the coat, seem to be much impressed. They sit with their prayer-books in their hands, in appearance as calm and unmoved as real West-end Christians of unquestioned respectability. At a certain interval the ark is unlocked, the roll of the law is taken reverently to the platform, where it is uplifted on all sides that all may see it, and then, when the reader has finished, it is borne back and deposited in the ark as formally and reverently as it was taken out. After a little while, one of the individuals on the platform leaves it. He wears a black gown and bands, he ascends the pulpit and preaches with his hat on; that is the Rev. Mr. Marks. He is thought much of by the younger and more educated Jews. As a preacher, much is to be said in his favour: he is short, he delivers himself well, his style of address is popular, and he gives many an Old Testament lesson. He demands of Abraham's descendants Abraham's faith in God, and obedience to Him.

The Jews are not a proselyting people, but they are becoming increasingly anxious that the seed of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob should not forsake the God of their fathers; and about thirty years ago some of the London Jews agitated for a reformed mode of worship, more in accordance, as they deemed, with the circumstances of their brethren in this age and clime. They argued that there is much that is local in the Jewish ritual, and much that is inapplicable now; and that the people, in consequence, would fall away unless a reformed mode of worship was introduced. The Prayer-book was carefully revised, and an improved ritual drawn up by blending the beautiful portions of the Portuguese and German Liturgies, and a choir formed for inspiring devotional feeling by means of solemn song. In the old orthodox synagogues the custom of calling up persons to read the law for the sake of presenting their offering during Divine service, often interferes with the edification of the assembly, according to the Jewish Reformers, and this also they omit. Furthermore, they decline to recognise as sacred, days which are evidently not ordained as such in Scripture. It must be remembered the Jew of the Restoration is much more of a formalist than the Jew of David's and Solomon's time, that the rabbis returned after the captivity laden with Babylonian learning, and that a new school arose. In his sermon on the opening of his new place of worship in 1842, Mr. Marks said, on behalf of himself and people, "We must as our conviction urges us solemnly deny that a belief in the divinity of the traditions contained in the Mishna and the Jerusalem Talmuds is of equal obligation to the Israelite with the faith in the divinity of the law of Moses. We know that these books are human compositions, and though we are content to accept with reverence from our past Biblical ancestors advice and instruction, we cannot unconditionally accept their law." "On all hands it is conceded that an absolute necessity exists for the modification of our worship, but no sooner is any important improvement proposed than we are assured of the sad fact that there is not at present any authority competent to judge in such matters for the whole house of Israel. Now, admitting this as a truth (since the extinction of the right of education has rendered impossible the convocation of a Sanhedrim whose authority shall extend over all Jewish congregations), does it not follow as a necessity that every Hebrew congregation must be authorised to take such measures as shall bring the Divine service into consonance with the will of the Almighty, as explained to us in the law and the prophets?" To this reasoning the Jews as a body remain impervious, and though time has mitigated the angry feeling which the Reformers created, still the new community is yet by no means cordially received and sanctioned by the old. There is, no doubt, a ground for this. Pious Jews find all society against them; its spirit, its customs, its literature, all hostile, if not to their nation, at any rate to their faith. In too many cases they perceive that those who forsake the religion of their fathers are little the better for doing so. They find that those who begin by laughing at rabbinical absurdities end by despising the Word of God. "A Hebrew infidel, an infidel among the Israelites, to whom pertaineth the adoption and the glory and the covenants," writes a Jewish author, "is indeed a frightful and portentous phenomenon;" and thus the more sensitive and conservative amongst them shrink from in any way modifying their ritual in accordance with what is termed the spirit of the age. Christians have no idea of the earnestness of spirit, of the striving after conformity to the law of God, of the devout Jew, or of the great and grand truths which he extracts from observances or forms in which they can see no meaning. His religion requires daily observances from his birth upwards, which can only be carried out by means of a living faith. In the first place it is an expensive one, and he must pay in various ways very heavily for its support. Then on the Sabbath he has much to go through at home, as well as to attend at the synagogue and to abstain from all occupations. The first day of every month he has to keep as a feast. Then every month has certain days to be kept, especially in October, their new year, on the first and second days. It is believed that the destiny of every individual is determined on this month by the Creator Himself; that those whose demerits preponderate are sealed to death, those whose merits preponderate to life, and those whose merits and demerits are equal are delayed until the day of atonement. The first ten days of their new year are ten days of repentance, during which they are to repent and confess their sins, pray to the Almighty to write them down in the book of life, and grant them a happy new year. The last of these days is the day of atonement, and is religiously kept by every Jew. On the 15th is the feast of tabernacles. In April is the most important of all the festivals—that of the Passover and of unleavened bread, when the doors of the house are left open in the hope that Elijah, the forerunner of the long-expected Messiah, may enter. In June is held the feast of Pentecost, to commemorate the giving of the law. A conscientious Jew must have a life of intense labour and self-denial, nor can he evade his duties, nor impose them on another.

TALMUDIC PROVERBS.—III.

WHEN the thief has no opportunity for stealing, he considers himself an honest man.

If thy friends agree in calling thee an ass, go and get a halter around thee.

Thy friend has a friend, and thy friend's friend; be discreet.

He in whose family there has been one hanged should not say to his neighbour, Pray hang this little fish up for me.

The dog sticks to you on account of the crumbs in your pocket.

The soldiers fight, and the kings are the heroes. After the thief runs the theft; after the beggar, poverty.

One contrition in man's heart is better than many flagellations.

Teach thy tongue to say, I do not know.

Not the place honours the man, but the man the place.

There is a great difference between him who is ashamed before his own self and him who is only ashamed before others.

FIRESIDE READINGS.

THE MEETING PLACE.

BY DR. BONAR.

"THE ransomed of the Lord shall return, and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads."—Isaiah xxxv., 10.

Where the faded flower shall freshen—

Freshen never more to fade;

Where the shaded sky shall brighten—

Brighten never more to shade;

Where the sun-blaze never scorches,

Where the star-beams cease to chill;

Where no tempest stirs the echoes

Of the wood, or wave, or hill;

Where the morn shall wake in gladness,

And the noon the joy prolong,

Where the daylight dies in fragrance,

'Mid the burst of holy song—

Brother, we shall meet and rest

'Mid the holy and the blest.

Where no shadow shall bewilder;

Where life's vain parade is o'er;

Where the sleep of sin is broken,

And the dreamer dreams no more;

Where no bond is ever severed,
Partings, claspings, sob, and moan,
Midnight waking, twilight weeping,
Heavy noontide—all are done;
Where the child has found its mother;
Where the mother finds the child;
Where dear families are gathered,
That were scattered on the wild—
Brother, we shall meet and rest
Mid the holy and the blest.

Where a blasted world shall brighten,
Underneath a bluer sphere,
And a softer, gentler sunshine
Shed its healing splendour here;
Where earth's barren vales shall blossom,
Putting on their robe of green,
And a purer, fairer Eden
Be where only wastes have been;
Where a King, in kingly glory
Such as earth has never known,
Shall assume the righteous sceptre,
Claim and wear the holy crown—
Brother, we shall meet and rest
Mid the holy and the blest.

CHURCH CURIOSITIES.—VII. BACKWOOD PREACHERS.

CURIOUS and interesting are the accounts which have lately been published of the hardy pioneers of the Gospel in the backwoods of America; some of them, as Mr. Hood says, "scholars, men of genius, like Asbury [a bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church], separating themselves from all the comforts and conveniences of life, for 60 dollars a year, with a travelling equipage, not of a chariot and four, but of saddle-bags and one; plunging into the wilderness to seek for lost sheep, preaching in barns, on stumps of trees, in log huts, in illimitable woods, in the houseless forest, by blazed trees in deep prairies; floundering through swamps, swimming vast rivers, drenched by pitiless rains, scorched by suns, bitten by frosts and driving snows." On one occasion no little surprise was excited among the heads of the Church by a request which came to them: "Be sure and send us a good swimmer;" it appeared that the district was full of streams without bridges, and the last minister had been drowned because he could not swim. Sometimes the preacher found himself among hostile Indians in the depths of the forest; he knew their trail, heard their yell at night, and unexpectedly came within the blaze of their camp-fire and the crack of their rifle. Often they had no horse, and the saddle-bags had to be carried on foot; and sometimes there were no saddle-bags. "George," said Bishop Asbury, to one of these preachers, "where are your clothes?" "Bishop," he answered, "they are on my back. On receiving my appointment at your hand, sir, I am not compelled to return to my circuit for my clothes, but I am ready, at a moment's warning, to go whithersoever you direct." His son, Dr. Roberts, says: "I have in my possession the needle and thread case, which were his constant companions. If his clothes, from any unexpected cause, needed attention, he was in the habit of turning aside into some retired spot for the purpose of taking them off and mending them."

Sometimes, in the depth of the prairie, the preacher came upon a band of white heathens. Thus, Richard Nolley struck the track of one. "What," said the head of it, "a Methodist preacher! I quit Virginia to be out of the way of them, but in my settlement in Georgia, I thought I should be beyond their reach. There they were, and they got my wife and daughter into their church. Then I came here to Chocktaw corner, find a good piece of land, feel sure that I shall have some peace from the preachers, and here is one before I've unloaded my wagon!" "My friend," said Nolley, "if you go to heaven you'll find Methodist preachers there; and if you go to hell, I'm afraid you'll find some there; and you see how it is in this world. I'd advise you to come to terms with God, and then you'll be at peace with us."

One of them, old Jacob Kruber, besides being learned and eloquent, was likewise witty and satirical. "How is it," said some one to him, "that you have no Doctors of Divinity?" "Our divinity is not sick," was his answer, "and does not need doctoring." Living when the American Revolution was in progress, and being called upon to pray on some great public occasion, this was one of his petitions: "O Lord, have mercy on the sovereigns of Europe; convert their souls; give them short lives and happy deaths; take them to heaven, and let us have no more of them." He was very averse to read sermons, and on one occasion, having to follow a young minister who had preached from notes, it was expected that he would refer to it in his discourse. He finished, however, without any remark upon it; but in his concluding prayer he offered up this strange request: "Lord, bless the man who has read to us to-day; let his heart be as soft as his head, and then he will do us some good!" Now and then the bitter himself got bitten. When he lived at Lewiston, he often came in contact with a Catholic priest, almost as sharp as himself. Meeting the priest one day, not as usual on horseback, but trudging on foot, Kruber asked, "Where's your horse? why don't you ride?" "Oh," said the other, rather testily, "the beast's dead." "Dead! well, I suppose he's in purgatory?" "Nay," answered the priest, "the wretched creature turned Methodist just before he died, and went straight to hell."

Some of these men, who have been called graduates of Brush College, Fellows of Swamp University, had ready tongues in their heads, whatever gifts they had besides. One was asked, "Do you belong to the standing order?" "No," he said, "I belong to the kneeling order." One day, while Dr. Bostwick was riding along on what was known as the Methodist horse, a fellow rode up, and laying his hand on the doctor's bridle insolently said: "I would as soon ride the devil as this horse." "Oh!" said Bostwick, "how it would look to see a child riding his own father!" The man stayed to hear no more.

One of these preachers, always known as Billy Hibbard, was very strong in his Arminianism; and once a Calvinistic minister said to him, "You hurt my feelings in preaching yesterday." Being asked how, he mentioned some doctrinal remark in the discourse. "Oh!" said Hibbard, "I'm sorry you took that; I meant it for the devil, and you stepped in and took it to yourself; don't get between me and the devil, brother, and you won't get your feelings hurt." On one occasion, when Bishop Asbury was presiding at the roll-call of the Conference, Hibbard objected answering to the name of William, insisting that his was Billy. "Why, brother," said Asbury, "Billy is a little boy's name!" "Yes, Bishop," he said, "and I was a little boy when my father gave it me."

THE MINISTER'S RECREATION.

THERE are large numbers of people who look kindly upon the rod and the line, though they regard a man who carries a gun (unless he happens to be an African missionary or a Western settler) as belonging to the devil's regiment. How (is this? Has Isaac Walton made all the difference? Would shooting have been as innocent as fishing if its praises had been sung by a spirit as pure and simple as that of the biographer of the saintly George Herbert? Hardly. Perhaps the root of the matter lies in this—that men commonly go alone to the river, and in parties to the stubble. The angler is generally a quiet, meditative man; he is silent, he is solitary and gentle; he "handles his worm tenderly;" half his enjoyment lies in penetrating into the secret places of nature, in surprising her shy and hidden beauties, in watching the pleasant wooing which is always going on in shady places in summer time, between the murmuring rippling waters, and the ash, the beech, and the willow, which bend to kiss them as they pass. He loves stillness and peace. The country parson may think over his text while his float drifts lazily with the current, or while he wanders by the stream watching for the silver flashes which tempt him to throw his fly. The men that delight to hear the whirr of the partridge are generally of another sort. Anyhow, September brings shooting dinners as well as birds, and with many people heavy drinking is inseparably associated with heavy bags of game. They do not object to eat the partridges when they are shot, but they have the impression that the men who shoot them are a roystering, rollicking set, with whom it is undesirable that their sons should be too intimate. All this is rapidly changing, in many parts of the country has quite disappeared; but I am inclined to think—speaking of those I know best—that though a Nonconformist minister, with a cast of flies on his hat and a rod on his shoulder, would feel no shyness at meeting accidentally the very gravest of his deacons; he would rather be on the other side of the hedge if he happened to have on his gaiters and to be carrying a gun.—R. W. Dale's Weekday Sermons.

TWO SIDES TO FORTUNE.

A YOUNG Rajah once said to his Wuzeer, "How is it that I am so often ill? I take great care of myself; I never go out in the rain; I wear warm clothes; I eat good food. Yet I am always catching cold, or getting fever, in spite of all precautions." "Overmuch care is worse than none at all," answered the Wuzeer, "which I will soon prove to you." So he invited the Rajah to accompany him for a walk in the fields. Before they had gone very far they met a poor shepherd. The shepherd was accustomed to be out all day long, tending his flock; he had only a coarse cloak on, which served but insufficiently to protect him from the rain and the cold—from the dews by night, and the sun by day; his food was parched corn, his drink water; and he lived out in the fields in a small hut made of plaited palm branches. The Wuzeer said to the Rajah, "You know perfectly well what hard lives these poor shepherds lead. Accost this one and ask him if he often suffers from the exposure which he is obliged to undergo." The Rajah did as the Wuzeer told him, and asked the shepherd whether he did not often suffer from rheumatism, cold, and fever. The shepherd answered, "Perhaps it will surprise you, sir, to hear that I never suffer from either the one or the other. From childhood I have been accustomed to endure the extremes of heat and cold, and I suppose that is why they never affect me." At this the Rajah was very much astonished, and he said to the Wuzeer, "I own I am surprised; but doubtless this shepherd is an extraordinarily strong man, whom nothing would ever affect." "We shall see," said the Wuzeer; and he invited the shepherd to the Palace. There, for a long time, the shepherd was taken great care of; he was never permitted to go out in the sun or rain, he had good food and good clothes, and he was not allowed to sit in a draught or get his feet wet. At the end of some months the Wuzeer sent for him into a marble courtyard, the floor of which he caused to be sprinkled with water. The shepherd had been for some time so little used to exposure of any kind, that wetting his feet caused him to take cold; the place felt to him chilly and damp after the palace; he rapidly became worse, and, in spite of all the doctors' care, he died. "Where is our friend the shepherd?" asked the Rajah, a few days afterwards; "he surely could not have caught cold merely by treading on the marble floor you had caused to be sprinkled with water?" "Alas!" answered the Wuzeer, "the result was more disastrous than I had anticipated; the poor shepherd caught cold, and is dead. Having been lately accustomed to overmuch care, the sudden change of temperature killed him. You see now to what dangers we are exposed from which the poor are exempt. It is thus that nature equalises her best gifts; wealth and opulence tend too frequently to destroy health and shorten life, though they may give much enjoyment to it whilst it lasts."—Old Deccan Days.

SIR MOSES MONTEFIORE.

DR. WALLACE, in his "Desert and the Holy Land," thus speaks of the Jewish philanthropist, Sir Moses Montefiore, whom he met with on the way to the land of his fathers for the sixth or seventh time:

"Seldom have we met with a finer specimen of a good old man; and the evening talks we had together on deck about Palestine and the present condition and prospects of the Jews gave a special charm to that voyage, which will ever be a pleasant memory. He was so liberal and tolerant in his views that controversy was kept at a distance; and had we not heard him addressed at first by his title, when one of his friends spoke to him, we might have taken him for a worthy old Secession minister from the country. He was scarcely ever seen without a Hebrew psalter in his hand, or a book of prayer in that language; and he spoke with great delight of the growing interest that was felt throughout Christendom in his fatherland. Often did he express an earnest desire to improve the condition of his brethren who had found their way to Jerusalem. He was the centre of attraction to all on board, especially to those who were going to that city; and on one occasion, when we were all gathered around him, it was truly affecting to see his old kindly face glowing with delight as he quoted the words of the prophet from the Hebrew Bible: 'Thus saith the Lord of hosts, in those days it shall come to pass that ten men shall take hold of the skirt of him that is a Jew, saying, We will go with you, for we have heard that God is with you.'"

POSTING DRUNKARDS.

In New Zealand a practice has been adopted in the treatment of drunkards, which might be worth trying here. The New Zealand Examiner thus notices the application of it to a case at Nelson: "The first case of posting a drunkard under the new Licensing Act took place yesterday, when the following notice from the resident magistrate was served on all the publicans, respecting a well-known individual of the name of John Smith, formerly a brewer in Nelson: 'Notice, the undermentioned person having been convicted of drunkenness three times within the space of six calendar months, you are hereby cautioned not to supply him with spirituous liquors, wine, ale, beer, or porter, for a period of one year from this date.' Then follows the name and description of the offender."

NON-SUBSCRIBING PRESBYTERY OF ANTRIM.

THE REGIUM DONUM QUESTION.

THE quarterly meeting of this Presbytery was held on Wednesday, April 1st, in the vestry of the Second (Non-subscribing) Presbyterian Church, Belfast. After devotional exercises and the confirmation of the minutes of the last meeting, the Rev. John Jellie was appointed moderator for the ensuing year, the Rev. David Thompson being deputed as clerk pro tem.

A deputation from the York-street (Non-subscribing) Church, consisting of Mr. Robt. M'Calmont, Mr. Robert M'Millen, Mr. R. W. Gordon, Mr. Nathaniel Ferguson, and Mr. Wm. Service, waited on the Presbytery for the purpose of submitting the following resolutions, which had been agreed to at a meeting of the congregation held on the preceding Sunday:

"1. That, as the question of religious endowments is now occupying the attention of the Parliament of the United Kingdom, and of thoughtful men in all churches, we feel called upon to express our conviction that, inasmuch as the State is not competent to decide infallibly between truth and error, it should place all churches on a footing of absolute religious freedom and equality.

"2. That we have long felt it to be gross injustice, and a prolific source of irritation and disaffection, that a church, which contains only about one-ninth of the population of this country, should enjoy special civil and religious privileges, whereby a badge of inferiority is necessarily attached to the other eight-ninths of the people, and the great principles of civil and religious liberty are violated.

"3. That, having regard to the marked differences in theology which obtain, and to the sectarian spirit which unhappily prevails in this distracted land, we consider the voluntary system better suited to the condition of the country than a system of universal State endowments.

"4. That we would gladly co-operate with our brethren of the Presbytery of Antrim in devising a scheme for adequately supporting the ministers of our Church independent of State aid."

Mr. McCALMONT and Mr. MILLER spoke in favour of the resolutions.

Rev. WILLIAM HALL said the Presbytery would be unanimous as to the principle that perfect religious equality should be established, and, in order to that, of course, that the Established Church should be disestablished; and he believed that the voluntary system was likely to be the future as to Churches in Ireland.

Rev. R. A. ARMSTRONG (Banbridge) considered State pay a paralysing thing to a Church. Wherever a Church was paid by the State it was weak, and when it supported itself it was strong and healthy.

Rev. S. C. NELSON (Downpatrick) concurred with the resolutions; but, he confessed, he thought it was a question for grave consideration whether it would be expedient at the present moment to take any decided action.

Dr. RITCHIE, J.P., thought that some time should be allowed to consider the matter. He suggested that a meeting should be held as soon as possible to consider this question, so that they might be among the first to protest against the connection of Church and State, or the endowment of any religion.

Rev. S. C. NELSON then moved that a special meeting be held on Easter Monday, the 13th inst., to consider this question.

Rev. Mr. ARMSTRONG seconded the motion.

The MODERATOR, in supporting the motion, said: This is a time when religious societies should speak out and make known their sentiments in reference to the question of ecclesiastical endowments. It is especially a time for those who have the interests of Ireland at heart to consider the best plan for establishing peace in the country, for making the people one with each other, and one with the people of Great Britain. (Hear, hear.) The Catholics of this country—4,500,000—are, with a few exceptions, disaffected, if not disloyal—the exceptions being those who have a stake in the country, in the shape of property or lucrative Government appointments. Has the action of the State, in reference to the Churches of this land, been calculated to win the homage of the Catholics in Ireland? I unhesitatingly say No. (Hear, hear.) Had the Calvinistic Presbyterians been 5,000,000 strong, and had they been treated as the Catholics have been, how would they have felt towards the State? I very much fear that '98 would have been repeated again and again until justice had been done. (Hear, hear.) I verily believe that, if Presbyterians were 5,000,000 strong in Ireland, they would never rest until State connection with Episcopacy were dissolved, and Presbyterianism made the established religion of this country, as Presbyterianism is the established religion of Scotland. Permanent tranquillity there cannot be, so long as a badge of inferiority is attached to the great body of the Irish people. Now, I feel satisfied that this Presbytery is prepared to sanction the principle of religious equality in relation to the State. The Antrim Presbytery has never shrunk, on proper occasions, so far as I know, from advocating the cause of civil and religious liberty. But the enjoyment of civil and religious liberty implies the existence of political and religious equality. I feel satisfied, therefore, that we are all prepared to endorse the first resolution passed by the York-street congregation. Unquestionably, the State should either support all Churches or none—it should place all on a footing of equality—it should give perfect toleration, and show no favoritism. Under existing circumstances, I believe it would be better for this country, and better for religion, if Protestants and Catholics, Presbyterians and Methodists, Trinitarians and Unitarians, were obliged, respectively, to support their own systems, independent of State aid. Our Church would, doubtless, sustain some temporary losses by the withdrawal of State pay. And I may here remark that I should be extremely sorry to deprive any brother minister of the slender means of support which he has hitherto enjoyed. I would much rather that our incomes were all doubled, than that they should be reduced. I believe that every educated man, who devotes his time to the work of the ministry, should have at least £200 per annum. But, when individual interests conflict with general or public interests, the former ought to give way. Better that a dozen Churches should go down altogether than that this unhappy and disaffected nation should remain in a chronic state of disaffection, ready to crop up in rebellion whenever a favourable opportunity presents itself. But surely there are wealth and spirit in the body sufficient. It is important for us to consider that we have lost more than we have gained by the principle of State patronage. What is the Regium Donum? A Royal gift to each congregation amounting to £70 per annum. That is very good as far as it goes. But what is it compared to the enormous incomes of some of the ministers of the Church of England? Besides, it was originally given out of the king's secret service money—given as a reward for political services, or to secure loyalty—given by a king who declared repeatedly that Presbyterianism was no religion for a gentleman. The loaves and the fishes of the Establishment have been to ours as large shilling loaves and salmon to penny buns and salt herrings. I reiterate the statement that we have lost more than we have gained by State patronage. What is the fact? Why that the very cream of the Churchmen of Belfast was skimmed off the Unitarian milk-vessel. As soon as ladies and gentlemen are in a position to drive their carriage and pair, they acquire an extraordinary liking for short sermons and Church millinery. They may have to suppress some little qualms of conscience about professing doctrines which they don't believe, but they soon settle down on the State cushions as disciples of Him who was cradled in a manger, and brought up under the roof of a humble village carpenter. If the voluntary system were established, truth would have a fair field—the only thing which it requires to ensure a victory in the end. The Bishop of London recently declared himself to be opposed to the dissolution of the connection between Church and State, because that in America the most highly cultivated minds had drifted into Unitarianism, and he did not wish England to become Unitarian or Rationalistic, which he feared it would do if the Voluntary system were adopted. Let us be just, and leave the consequences to the great Disposer of Events.

The motion was passed unanimously, and after some routine business the Presbytery adjourned.

INTELLIGENCE.

HEAP BRIDGE, NEAR BURY.—Last Friday evening the concluding lecture of a series, delivered during the winter in connection with the Mutual Improvement Society, was given by E. H. Grundy, Esq., the president, on "A Visit to Italy." The lecture was illustrated by a numerous series of beautiful photographs of Genoa, Florence, Rome, Naples, Venice, &c., and the attendance was very good. The chair was occupied by the Rev. J. Wright, B.A.

LEEDS.—On Monday evening last, a penny reading and musical entertainment was given to the scholars of the Mill Hill Sunday schools and their parents, by a number of ladies and gentlemen connected with the schools and congregation. It was the first of this character given in these schools, and a hope was expressed that it might not be the last.

LIVERPOOL: ROSCOMMON-STREET.—On Tuesday, the 31st ult., the services for the ordination of the newly-appointed minister, Rev. J. Cuckson, were held here. The charge to the minister was delivered to a large congregation in the morning, by the Rev. Wm. Gaskell, M.A., and the address to the people in the afternoon, by the Rev. J. Page Hopps. The afternoon address was a clear and simple statement of the relations between a minister and his congregation, with the obligations which should bind each to the other. Tea was provided at six o'clock, and about 120 partook of it. After tea, the recognition meeting was held in the chapel, and among those present were—C. T. Bowring, Esq. (chairman), the Revs. A. Gordon, M.A., C. B. Upton, B.A., J. Alsop, J. Shannon, T. Jones, R. H. Cotton, and W. B. Pope. Thanks were very cordially voted to the Revs. Wm. Gaskell, M.A., and J. Page Hopps for their very valuable services during the day. The motion was responded to by the Rev. J. Page Hopps. Mr. J. S. Nuttall, the chairman of the Chapel Committee, offered, on behalf of the congregation, a unanimous welcome to Mr. Cuckson, who made a suitable reply. The Revs. J. Alsop and W. B. Pope gave the welcome of the district ministers. The sentiment, "Success to the Roscommon-street Chapel and Sunday School" was given by the Rev. A. Gordon, M.A. The speeches were interspersed with anthems, and the usual thanks to the chairman brought a very pleasant day to its close.

MANCHESTER: STRANGWAYS BAND OF HOPE.—A very successful concert was given on Monday evening last, in aid of the funds of the Band of Hope in connection with the Strangeways Free Church.

SHEFTON MALLEY.—The Unitarian Chapel, in Cowl-street, was re-opened on Sunday morning last, after undergoing repairs, &c. The Rev. Samuel Martin, of Trowbridge, preached both morning and evening, to large and appreciative congregations, who appeared to be much struck and highly gratified by the gospel preached to them.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

All letters, articles of intelligence, &c., should be addressed to the Unitarian Herald Office, 74, Market-street, and not to the private addresses of the Editors. No anonymous letters inserted: the writer of ever. Letter must append his name for publication.

J. R. H., J. A., and W. S. P.—Declined with thanks. ERRATUM.—In the review of Lessing's Life and Works in our last number, second column, the eleventh line from the bottom, for "weakened by the fragments," read "awakened by the fragments."

THE COMING WEEK.

MANCHESTER DOMESTIC MISSIONS

—ROCHDALE ROAD CHAPEL.

In the late severe storm the wall of an adjoining manufactory, which had been left standing after a fire, was blown down, and in its fall destroyed the outbuildings, heating apparatus, &c., of the Rochdale Road Chapel.

The Committee are obliged to ask for help towards Rebuilding the premises destroyed; and as the Schools have for some time past been in want of Proper Class Rooms, avail themselves of this opportunity of erecting them on the ground where the former offices stood, and where the needful accommodation can be obtained for about £100. The street which runs behind the Chapel has to be paved, and this will require an outlay of £30. Nearly £150, therefore, is needed, towards which it is intended to devote the £40 which was given so generously by the Strangeways Sewing School, and also £20 contributed by Mr. Berry, the owner of the adjoining manufactory. £100 will, therefore, have to be raised by voluntary gifts, and the Committee trust that the liberal donations of the supporters of the truly Christian work of the Missions will speedily provide the Funds required.

Subscriptions will be thankfully received by the treasurer, Mr. E. D. DARBISHIRE, B.A., 26, George-street; Rev. W. GASKELL; Rev. S. ROBINSON, St. Oswald's Grove, Rochdale Road; or Rev. S. ALFRED STEINTHAL, 107, Upper Brook-street.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

The real state of the Pope's health still forms a subject of speculation. On Maunday Thursday, his voice is said to have been powerful and clear, when, after officiating at mass in the Sistine Chapel, he gave his blessing to the people, fifty thousand being present, and he then washed the feet of thirteen pilgrims, and served them at table. He has conferred on Cardinal Bonaparte the title of Altezza Eminentissima, instead of Eminenza Reverendissima, the title borne by the other cardinals. He has likewise placed at his disposal, for ecclesiastical ceremonies, four state carriages, the servants of which will wear the Imperial livery.

The Papal Nuncio in Paris has formally repudiated a letter which has been published in the Debats and other journals, purporting to have been addressed by the Holy Father to the Emperor of Austria on the new laws touching the rights of the Church. It certainly had the look very much of a fabrication.

Telegraph wires are laid down at the back of the high altar, Notre Dame, to convey the Pope's blessing for the Prince Imperial on occasion of his taking the Communion on the 20th inst., the Emperor's birthday.

The promoter in the case of Martin v. Mackonochie has addressed a letter to the Bishop of London, in which he states that he entertains no doubt that he owes it to the Church and to the interests of religious truth to prosecute an appeal from the late decision to the fullest extent that his learned counsel shall advise. Notice of appeal has been lodged in the Arches Court as to the decision on lighted candles and costs. But when the case comes before the Committee of the Privy Council, the judgment of that tribunal will be invited not merely on the legality or illegality of the use of lighted candles, but also on all the points on which the reverend defendant was "admonished"—elevation of the sacrament, the mixed chalice, and the "censing of persons or things."

There was "high celebration" at St. Alban's on Sunday morning, at which the Rev. A. H. Mackonochie officiated, and the various ceremonies observed were finely divided from those of the Romish Church. In the sermon, the preacher, one of the clergy connected with the place, recommended the people to accept many church traditions which, he admitted, had no corroboration in the Scriptures, and especially urged them to receive one—the appearance of our Lord to his mother, to assure her of his resurrection, immediately after that event—even though the Bible implied a doubt as to that tradition, in passages, however, which could be explained. To illustrate the way in which the world received what the Church had to say, he replied at great length to the "superficial writings" of a "certain evening newspaper which circulates in the best society" (evidently the Pall Mall Gazette). He said "the writer displayed an amount of ignorance with regard to questions of doctrine and polemics, that would have excited universal ridicule had he been dealing with politics. His only weapon was supercilious banter; he used the language of a refined infidel, whose feeble ignorance in matters of faith was perfectly astounding."

The other day, Dr. Boyd, the recently-appointed Dean of Exeter, was making a speech in behalf of the Colonial and Continental Missions, when he went off into a somewhat violent tirade against the attempt to disestablish the Irish Church. He was reminded by the chairman, Sir John Kennaway, that the audience might have two opinions on that subject, and that it was hardly one before the meeting. The Dean replied that he was going to show the position of Ireland as a colony. The chairman admitted that this would be perfectly relevant when Ireland was a colony. At present it was an integral portion of the United Kingdom. This seems to have extinguished the Dean.

The Prolocutor of the Canterbury Convocation announces that the next meeting on the 28th inst. will be only formal. As it has been the practice to have an April or May sitting, it is rumoured that the object is to save the Bishops from the necessity of dealing with the Natal difficulty, which hundreds of petitions, ready to be presented, request them to do. The meeting of the York Convocation too, on Wednesday, was only pro forma. So, inconvenient discussions will be prevented in both provinces.

That portion of Baron Bunsen's "Bible-Work for the People," which contains the translation of the New Testament, has been published at Leipsic, omitting the exegetical notes which originally accompanied it. The present publication is intended for those who would be unable to procure the fuller work, and of those who would like to read the New Testament in other than the strong and antiquated speech of Luther.

It seems probable, from a decision arrived at by a recent meeting of the committees of the Rotherham and Airedale Colleges, that the two will be united, and that the new Congregational College will be built on the Newton Hall estate, near Leeds.

The census returns of 1861 give the following as the number of persons belonging to the Established Church—men, women, and children—in the several dioceses of Ireland. The Archbishop of Armagh, Primate of All Ireland, and also Bishop of Clogher, is returned as presiding over 150,773 souls, being rather more than 23 per cent. of the population of the two dioceses; the Archbishop of Dublin, with the diocese of Kildare annexed, 112,766 souls, being a fraction over 18 per cent. of the population; the Bishop of Down and Connor, 108,993 souls, being nearly 20 per cent. of the population; the Bishop of Dromore, Derry, and Raphoe, 110,425 souls, being above 17 per cent. of the population. These four are the only prelates who have in their dioceses belonging to their Church so many as 100,000 souls, or so large a proportion as a tenth of the population; they are the dioceses comprising Dublin and the north-west, and including 42 per cent. of the population of Ireland. Of the other 58 per cent. the census tells a different tale. The best return is that for the united dioceses of Kilmore, Ardagh, and Elphin, showing 53,196 souls belonging to the Established Church, being less than 10 per cent. of the population. Next stands the Bishop of Ossory, Ferns, and Leighlin, with 35,663 souls, being 8 to 9 per cent. of the population. The Bishop of Cork, Cloyne, and Ross is returned with 43,228 souls, or a fraction over 8 in 100 of the people. The Bishop of Meath, 16,289 souls, being above 6 per cent. of the population. Last come four dioceses containing together above 1,600,000 souls, nearly 28 per cent. of the population of Ireland, and each of the four having less than 1 in 20 of its population belonging to the Established Church. The Bishop of Killaloe, Kilfenora, Clonfert, and Kilmacduagh is returned as presiding over 15,906 souls, or 4.71 per cent. of the population; the Bishop of Limerick, Ardfert, and Aghadoe, 15,103 souls, or 3.83 per cent. of the people; the Bishop of Cashel, Emly, Waterford, and Lismore, 13,853 souls, or 3.73 per cent. of the inhabitants; and the Bishop of Tuam, Killala, and Achonry, 17,157 souls, being 3.37 per cent. of the population. Since the returns were made, the population of Ireland has become less by about a quarter of a million.

The High Church party were naturally indignant at Mr. Disraeli's charge, that they had entered into a conspiracy with the Romanists against the Protestant faith, and one of its constituents, a Rev. Mr. Baker, having asked him to explain what he really meant, our artless Premier returns the following answer, dated "Hughenden Manor, Maunday Thursday," which we leave our readers to characterise as they think fit:

"You are under a misapprehension if you suppose that I intended to cast any slur upon the High Church party. I have the highest respect for the High Church party; I believe there is no body of men in this country to which we have been more indebted, from the days of Queen Ann to the days of Queen Victoria, for the maintenance of the orthodox faith, the rights of the Crown, and the liberties of the people. In saying this, I have no wish to intimate that the obligations of the country to the other great party in the Church are not equally significant. I have never looked upon the existence of parties in our Church as a calamity; I look upon them as a necessity, and a beneficent necessity. They are the natural and inevitable consequences of the mild and liberal principles of our ecclesiastical polity, and of the varying and opposite elements of the human mind and character. When I spoke I referred to an extreme faction in the Church, of very modern date, that does not conceal its ambition to destroy the connection between Church and State, and which I have reason to believe has been for some time in secret combination, and is now in open confederacy, with the Irish Romanists for the purpose. The Liberation Society, with its shallow and short-sighted fanaticism, is a mere instrument in the hands of this confederacy, and will probably be the first victim of the spiritual despotism the Liberation Society is now blindly working to establish. As I hold that the dissolution of the union between Church and State will cause permanently a greater revolution in this country than foreign conquest, I shall use my utmost energies to defeat these fatal machinations."

Seeing that the withdrawal of State aid is at hand, and that this will fall most heavily on the Presbyterian congregations of Ireland, Lord Dufferin begs his agent to assure the ministers belonging to such congregations on his estate that it is his intention, as soon as circumstances require it, to guarantee to each a permanent subscription (unfettered by any conditions except such as may be suggested by the General Assembly) to an amount equivalent to whatever proportion of the present Regium Donum they may be deprived of under the impending settlement.

After a somewhat stormy meeting, on Monday, a "Protestant" churchwarden was chosen for the parish of St. Alban's, Holborn, in opposition to Mr. Mackonochie's nominee, Mr. Hubbard, M.P.

As was to be expected from its Tory proclivities, the Kirk of Scotland has lost no time in espousing the cause of the Irish Church, and numerous petitions from its courts have been forwarded against Mr. Gladstone's Resolutions. In the Haddington Presbytery, Dr. Cook said he regarded the proposal made in them as the most revolutionary one that had been proposed, since the days of the Great Rebellion, and characterised the measure as essentially one of confiscation, maintaining that the revenues and property at present in the possession of the Church were as sacredly hers as were the estates of the landed gentry. Both in this Presbytery and in others of the Scotch Establishment it was stated that the blow aimed at the Irish Church would, if successful, be next directed at their own, and hence it was their duty to assist their neighbour when his house took fire. The only Free Church Presbytery which has yet taken action in the matter is that of Arbroath, at which it was resolved to petition in favour of Mr. Gladstone's policy, on the ground that the endowment of an Episcopal Church in Ireland was inexpedient politically, objectionable religiously, and tending to lead on the Government to the endowment of Popery in various forms. Such will, most likely, be the prevalent opinion throughout this powerful denomination.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

The question of the Irish Church is exciting considerable interest abroad as well as here. In an article on "Sir Gladstone and the Italian Revolution," the Osservatore Romano attributes his motion for abolishing the Established Church in Ireland to no love for Catholicism, but merely to the spirit of "Freemasonry, which makes war on the Papacy, the Catholic religion, and divine revelation, and seeks to destroy even the heretical and Protestant churches, out of hatred to that remnant of positive religion, and that glimmering of divine revelation, which some Protestant sects still preserve, and among them the Anglican Church."

Lord Hobart thus fairly analyses the Premier's speech (eliminating mere personalities) in the Irish Church debate:

"There is no crisis in Ireland; Fenianism is not formidable; the condition of Ireland is indeed not entirely satisfactory, but it is improving. (It must be admitted that there was room. Irish misery has been, and still is, a European proverb.) Irish grievances are 'sentimental' grievances, not, however, on that account, to be altogether ignored. But is Ireland a 'conquered country?' If Ireland was conquered, so was England, by Norman William, Cromwell, and others; and therefore the Irish Church is no more a 'badge of conquest' to Irish Catholics than the English Church is to English Dissenters. (English Dissenters will receive this statement with considerable surprise.) The true policy is to do justice to Irish Catholics not by destroying but by creating; and this we intend to do by founding a Catholic University (i.e. by 'creating' a molehill of justice, instead of 'destroying' a mountain of injustice). Also, we ought to regard the 'sentimental' feelings and requirements not only of the Irish Catholics, but of the Irish Protestants. (No one would propose to regard the sentimental requirements of the Irish Catholics if, being sentimental, they were also unjust.) This is a policy of conciliation; whereas yours is a policy of discord, because it would exasperate the Protestants of Ireland. (Unfortunately, to take anything from anybody, whether it properly belongs to him or not, is apt to exasperate him.) One could understand a proposal to restore to the Roman Catholic Church the property which was taken from it and given to the Protestants; but you propose to confiscate the latter without saying what is to be done with it. (Is there anything unreasonable in placing stolen goods in the hands of the police as soon as possible, reserving for after consideration what shall be done with them?) You ought not to disturb a prescriptive title. (Any injustice, if only it is old enough, may of course be defended on this ground.) You might perhaps elevate the status of the Irish Catholic Church. (This means either nothing of any importance, or something which the Conservative party would view with unqualified dismay. Probably it means the former.) To dissolve the union of Church and State is to strike at the very root of government; for government is nothing if it is not divine. If the Church of Ireland falls so will the Church of Scotland, so will the Church of Wales, so will the Church of England. (Mere assertion, which has been repeatedly shown to be unfounded.) The whole thing is, in fact, a conspiracy of the Papists and Ritualists combined to change the character of this country."

Such was the doctrine administered to the Imperial Parliament for its guidance in a most important crisis; such the whole foundation, except bigotry and folly, upon which, if Conservative efforts succeed, the Irish Church will continue to insult a nation, disunite an empire, and scandalise the world.

In a strong speech for the disendowment of the Irish Church, the Rev. Mr. Hains, incumbent of St. George's, Wigan, declares his belief that the reason why that Church had not succeeded was because she was hampered, and hindered, and fettered by the State. He said:

"He believed Mr. Disraeli would treat the Church of Christ as his forefathers treated the founders of that church, would clothe her in garments of royalty, bow mockingly the knee to her, crown her with a crown of thorns, say 'Hail' to her, but in the language of scorn and mockery; and he did say that Mr. Disraeli, who they had no reason to believe was a Christian at all, for he had never been baptised into the Church of Christ, was not the person to promulgate Christianity in Ireland. The ministers of the Scriptures were the persons to do this, without the support of armed battalions, or of that worldliness and pomp which connection with the State gives. He believed in the divinity of the Church, and he called upon statesmen to take their profane hands off her."

There is no telling, of course, what artful dodge our shifty Prime Minister, during these Easter holidays, may devise wherewith to meet Mr. Gladstone's Resolutions, but the reliance of his party seems to be on the old cry of "The Church in danger," and the damage which the State will sustain if the connection between them is destroyed. The John Bull's heart, however, is evidently failing it for fear. It says:

"We know with the Premier, how almost superhuman are the forces arrayed against us; High Church Radicals jostling Infidel Philosophers, and Nonconformist agitators taking counsel with Whig place-hunters; but we yet believe—we hope, if against hope—that the country will, ere it be too late, shake off its fatal lethargy and rally round the Government, which, while desirous of giving fair play to Roman Catholics and Protestants alike who do not conform to the Establishment, would fain preserve to this country the untold blessings of a religious sanction to her Government."

In an able speech at a meeting of the London Young Men's Liberation Society, the Rev. A. Hannay contended that

"True religion could only grow on liberty. The church was an organisation of the Christianity of the whole world, and constraint was as abhorrent to it as to religion. He was pained to find some distinguished Nonconformists saying that they did not see how Protestantism would have been conserved if it had not been for the Established Church. That was the expression he believed of those who did not go down to principles for their belief. If it had been left to the Established Church the spirituality of religion would have been dead long ago. The 'bulwark of Protestantism' was to-day the hot-bed of Popery."

The Dean of Maritzburg says he has come to England with three objects: 1. "To endeavour to have some difficult questions resolved respecting the internal organisation of the Church of Natal, including therein the appointment of a Bishop. 2. To have her external relations to the civil power clearly determined. 3. To raise funds for the support of the clergy, to build up new churches, schools, &c." For the settlement of 1 and 2, he looks to the rulers of the Church; for the 3, he expects the laity to aid him, "if the buildings which were our churches are henceforth to be meeting-houses, where heresy, or rather worse than heresy, is to be taught."

In the Church News, Father Ignatius mourns over the "impiety" of those who have converted his monastery at Norwich into a cheese warehouse, but speaks with pride of a large barn which has been converted into a chapel at a village near Staines. Here have been established the monks of "our first order," who have charge of a few destitute old men. Some friends imagine he is making his fortune out of the offertories in Lombard-street, but this is a mistake. The amount is seldom so much as £5. Protestant attacks always make it go up, and for this cause he would wish the Protestants to attack them oftener "if it were not for the large amount of guilt they incur by the innumerable falsehoods they tell." Sick of such caprices, the Brethren, like their predecessors, pray for something substantial and look lovingly at the soil. If any one will but give them a piece of land, and endow the community, this is what shall be granted in return:—"We would give them a share in all the holy acts of the community, in our prayers and intercession, and a resting place before the high altar in the monastery church, when their spirit is called away to the other world."

The Rev. A. Campbell, rector of Liverpool, writes thus to his senior curate:—

"I am extremely sorry that you preached at St. Martin's in a coloured stole, because, to a certain extent, it implicates me and indenfines you in public opinion (whether rightly or wrongly does not much matter) with that practice of so-called ritualism which I have studiously avoided, as not only offensive to a vast majority of our people, but contrary, in my humble judgment, to the dictates of common sense. A friend of mine who preached at St. James the Less was offered a coloured stole, and he respectfully declined it, and preached in a surplice without any stole at all. I wish you had done the same. Preaching in a surplice is, in my opinion, innocent enough. If I were merely to consult my own inclinations, I should preach in one myself, as the most becoming, and, I suspect, the most canonical dress for a clergyman, no more Popish than a black gown; but I abstain from doing so because in non-essentials I feel it my duty to comply with what I believe to be the wishes of my people. With regard to what is called Ritualism, I must beseech you to avoid even the slightest appearance of it. Apart from doctrine, it seems to me simply vanity. As indicating a belief in the Romish doctrine of a sacrificing priesthood armed with judicial powers, I believe it is repudiated, and I hope ever will be repudiated, by the common sense of the people of England."

A correspondent of the Guardian, after showing the origin of endowments, says:

"Whatever resistance may be offered by the clergy to the proposed demolition of the Irish Establishment, it should be clearly understood that they will be contending neither for the faith, nor for any spiritual right, of the Church, but simply for its money and civil privileges,—advantages which, as it was neither theirs to give in the first instance, so neither is it theirs to retain when statesmen, for purposes of national expediency,—whether wisely and religiously on their part or not,—may think fit to withdraw such temporalities of the Church."

He considers that whatever takes place now in the Irish Church will be "the rehearsal of the eventual disestablishment (though from different causes) of the English. The terms in respect to the former, he says, will be these:

"1. The retention, in its integrity, of the existing spiritual organisation of the Church; 2. The retention of all churches and parsonages where the population will use and maintain them; 3. The retention, moreover, of all recent endowments and benefactions." And he adds, "Well might the English Church itself look forward with calmness to disestablishment on such terms."

We can hardly give the Record credit for so much simplicity as to believe that it was really taken in by Mr. Disraeli's bugaboo story of a combination against the Protestant faith between the Ritualists and the Irish Romanists; and no doubt our contemporary adopted the story as affording a good opportunity for hitting both the objects of its hatred at once. Of course, as the Spectator says, no one supposes that the Premier himself is imposed upon; and it is a dishonour to the House of Commons, and a slur upon England, that our Prime Ministers should, for election purposes, affect to believe in conspiracies—likely to revolutionise the realm and "touch dangerously the tenure of the Crown,"—which his own tickled fancy has invented to amuse his own leisure, and with which he is striving to hoax the Evangelical party into extending to him the valuable support which he saw that, thanks to the influence of Lord Shaftesbury, it extended to Lord Palmerston. That a Prime Minister should angle for party support which he does not fairly deserve is, unfortunately, no new thing in the annals of even the more respectable administrations; but that he should bait his hook with a solemn announcement of belief in a conspiracy which can only excite in all shrewd minds (and his own amongst the number) the utmost scorn and ridicule, is a new step in the downward path of political demoralisation, a step which ought to awaken us all to the shame we are incurring. It were better to have Mr. Whalley for Prime Minister, for he at least would not say these things without honestly believing them. But bad as it would be to have a fool for Prime Minister of England, is it not worse to have one who, not being a fool himself, but very much the reverse, addresses himself, in the depth of his cynical faith in our folly, to the fear and silliness that are in us, and not to the wisdom and the courage?

In an article on Theological Education, speaking of a system proposed for the Universities which would require a number of Professors each at liberty to teach any belief he chose, the Guardian observes:

"The students would be taught the history and meaning of the various creeds and symbolical books, and the Professor would give expression to his own conclusions and the reasons of them, but no other influence would operate to affect the perfect freedom of conviction in the pupil's mind. That such a system would be intellectually stimulating we cannot deny. But it obviously supposes that the Universities should have ceased to have any peculiar connection with the Church of England. The very elements of religious belief would be unsettled; an Unitarian Professor would (if a man of genius like Mr. J. Martineau) gain a large hearing: another would deny the possibility of miracles, and a third perhaps the personality of God."

The Madras Churchman has the following delectable bit of High Church absurdity:

"We feel sure that those of our readers who noticed the marriage of the Rev. A. Theophilus, C.M.S., with the daughter of the Rev. Mr. Kajahgopaul, of the Free Kirk Mission, at the Free Kirk, Black Town, by the Rev. W. Stevenson, A.M., a minister of the Free Kirk of Scotland, will have been as greatly shocked as we were ourselves at the announcement. The Rev. A. Theophilus is fortunately only a deacon as yet, but ecclesiastical discipline has indeed fallen very low in the Church of England in this diocese if so grave a scandal be permitted to pass unnoticed and unpunished. If a member of the English Church were to consent to go through a religious ceremony purporting to be a marriage according to the usages of any schismatic body, it would indeed be cause for grave scandal; but what shall we say or where shall we find words to express our opinion of one in holy orders in the Catholic Church who shall do such a thing? We think that this is a case that the English Church Union should take up strongly, and that both the Bishop and the C. M. Society itself should be memorialised either to force Mr. Theophilus to be married, or excommunicate him."

Mr. Hughes, M.P., has declared himself in favour of such a relaxation of ecclesiastical exclusiveness as would allow clergymen and Dissenting ministers to exchange pulpits occasionally; but he does not state how far he would carry this; whether or not, for instance, he would permit Dr. Stanley and Mr. Martineau now and then to supply for each other.

In his last "Protestant Ballad for the Times," Mr. Tupper has the following enigmatical stanza, which we confess we cannot unriddle:

"We want Reformation to bring these all in,
Wesleyans, and Baptists, and Brothers,
Independents, and all who wage war against sin,
And who preach Paul's pure creed, 'not another's';
For we fear and we feel there must soon be here seen
A fierce and distinct separation, When High Church and Low Church, the Pope and the Queen,
Contend for this new Reformation!"

THE BISHOP OF CAPETOWN v. THE BISHOP OF NATAL.

THE following appeared in the York papers of Saturday last:

"I was present in the nave of the Minster on Sunday evening last, and, in common with the thousands there assembled, I heard the Bishop of Capetown announce from the pulpit the 'Deism' of the Bishop of Natal. If no one else, more nearly concerned, should propose to notice the subject in your columns, pray allow me to utter a few words of protest and denial, on behalf of an absent and much-abused man. Upon the unseemliness of one minister of the Church commenting in the pulpit upon another, with and against whom he has been engaged in legal conflict, I need make no observation. But I would appeal to the common sense of Englishmen, and Englishwomen too, and ask them to consider what is the real ground, or rather the real want of ground, of this uncharitable imputation of one Anglican Bishop upon another. The case, I submit, stands simply thus:—the Bishop of Capetown, in the exercise of his learning and judgment, has formed for himself a very definite idea of Christianity; the Bishop of Natal, in the exercise of his learning and judgment, has done precisely the same—and both, as they maintain, within the limits allowed by the Church. The two Bishops differ widely from each other in some of their conclusions. Does this give to either of them the right to stand up before the world and proclaim the other a 'Deist?' If it does confer such a right, which of the two Bishops shall be the Pope, and sit in judgment to condemn the other?

"I should much like to have the Bishop of Capetown's answer to these questions. I do not expect he will send it, but, at any rate, and till it comes, I would beg the more reasonable part of the public not to allow themselves to be carried away, without personal inquiry into the merits of the case, by the prejudiced ipse dixit of the Bishop of Capetown; not to be led, in short, to do injustice to a learned, candid, diligent scholar—an earnest and fearless lover of truth—an upright and devoted minister of the Gospel, as many of us believe the much calumniated Bishop to be. These high qualities are conspicuous in his works, to say nothing of the temperate, patient, forbearing spirit towards opponents which pervades them, as any one may see for himself who will take the trouble to read them.

"And this remark reminds me of an incident with which I have met within the last few days. I happened to be in conversation with a young woman, a zealous Church woman of the very high school. She told me she had signed the address, or petition, or whatever it may be, calling for the excommunication of Bishop Colenso, or denouncing him as one with whom Christian men and women cannot hold communion. I asked her if she had ever read any of the Bishop's writings? No, she said, she had not, but she had been told a good deal about him which convinced her he was not a true Christian. What, I would ask, is the value of an address, or petition, 'got up' in this way? What is its value as an expression of the deliberate judgment of competently instructed Christian people? It is scarcely so much as that of the paper on which it is written, and no wonder that the minister of St. James's, Marylebone, on reading the document, lately, from the altar, to his congregation, concluded his remarks upon it by contemptuously tearing it to pieces in their presence.—I remain, &c.,

FRIDAY, APRIL 17, 1868.

THE GOOD FRIDAY MEETING.

THE Good Friday gathering of the Manchester District Sunday-school Association on each recurring anniversary has become, in the course of the past three and twenty years, an institution so widely known as to have earned the distinction of "The Good Friday Meeting;" and certainly the meeting of this year will not do anything to lessen its prestige, or make it less popular among our teachers throughout Lancashire and Cheshire. In spite of a rival attraction in the opening of the new chapel at Accrington, and in a similar Sunday-school gathering at Leeds, which will henceforth absorb some of those who previously allied themselves to the older society, the attendance was as large as ever; from eight to nine hundred people being present at the services and conferences. Never were the arrangements for the material supply better carried out. Never was a sermon preached more thoroughly in harmony with the spirit of the occasion, and more calculated to set the key note of the conference in a tone of trustful and devoted endeavour; while the evening discussion was animated and full of practical point. If there be any matter on which we should like to offer a word of criticism it is rather of those who were not there than of those who were. We could not help feeling that, large as was the gathering, it ought to have been far more largely composed of actual teachers. Probably there were none present who were not interested in Sunday-school education, and we should have been sorry for one of them to have been crowded out, but still of the whole number of teachers who are actually working in the affiliated schools, it was but a small proportion who were present. Nor were those present who might have most benefited by the occasion. Those who were there were the most earnest and efficient of our teachers, but, as we felt the spirit of the service, and listened to the homely and practical suggestions which came out in the course of the day's meeting, and especially as we noted how all present seemed to catch a new spirit of resolve to make their future work worthier than their past, we could not help wishing that the other class of teachers—the half-hearted, the unpunctual, and indifferent, whose work is fairly described in the phrase "taking a class"—had been present in larger numbers to feel the same inspiring influence. We are afraid, however, that a good many of this class are of the sort of young people who vote religious meetings on Good Friday a nuisance, and who think that such "taking a class" is all that can be expected from them, without such extras as attending conferences on Sunday-school work, and indeed in many cases without any collateral labour or preparation whatever.

Among the subjects which cropped up once more, as it has constantly done for years back, was that of secular instruction in the Sunday school. For ourselves, we thoroughly concur in the opinion which found strong expression from some of our best teachers—that it would be far better if the brief space of time available on Sunday were devoted, if not to purely religious instruction, at any rate to religious subjects and such other subjects as are calculated to give efficient stimulus to higher thoughts and studies. The strongest ground taken was that by Mr. GEORGE SMITH, who broadly affirmed that the teaching of writing and arithmetic in the Sunday school is doing a direct injury to education by inducing parents to send their children earlier to work, in reliance on the Sunday school for secular education, which ought to be continuing, and would otherwise continue in the day school. This testimony is corroborated by a fact which has since come to our knowledge in one of our best Sunday schools, a few miles out of Manchester. It was resolved to continue to teach writing and arithmetic to those scholars who should show to the satisfaction of the superintendent that they had no other means or opportunity of improvement in these, and out of the whole school the number who came under this category was exceedingly trifling—we believe not more than twenty out of some hundreds. Whether the case would prove to be the same in our Sunday schools generally we do not feel assured, and certainly the one great argument against any sweeping abolition of secular instruction remains: it is, that there are comparatively few teachers who could occupy the school time with anything worthy of the name of religious instruction. It may be urged—indeed it was strongly urged at the meeting—that it requires quite as efficient a teacher really to teach writing and arithmetic well as to teach religion; but it must be remembered that a teacher who cannot teach writing and arithmetic well, but who still does the best he can to help his scholars in practising these things during the school hours is, at any rate, not doing any harm—can hardly help indeed being of some use to them—while a teacher of similar inability who should attempt religious instruction would probably do deep and permanent injury. We doubt, therefore, whether any sweeping change could advantageously be made, but we cannot too strongly express our conviction that the tendency in all our Sunday schools should be especially in a religious direction.

The Rev. Henry Alexander, of Newry.

WE regret to announce the death, at his residence, the Manse, on Saturday last, of the Rev. Henry Alexander, senior minister of the First Presbyterian (Unitarian) Congregation of Newry. During a ministry there, extending over twenty-eight years, Mr. Alexander not only enjoyed the cordial attachment and sincere respect of the religious community over which he presided, but was held in the highest esteem by the members of every denomination in the town and neighbourhood. Mr. Alexander was a native of Antrim, son of the late Rev. Thomas Alexander, minister of Cairncastle. Having been educated for the ministry under the care of the Remonstrant Synod of Ulster, he was first settled as minister of the Presbyterian Congregation of Lancaster, in England, where he remained for five years. From thence, on the death of the Rev. John Mitchel, he was transferred to Newry in the year 1840, where his superior talents as a preacher, his devotedness to the work of the Gospel ministry, his singular penetration and soundness of judgment, his undeviating uprightness and consistency of character and principle, his warmth and tenderness of heart, and his unflinching Christian charity soon won for him that high place in the general regard which he has held without interruption during the whole course of his life. While his salutary instructions and his zealous labours vitally contributed to the prosperity of the congregation to which he ministered; and while mainly to his exertions they owed the erection in 1853 of their present beautiful church, which forms an ornament to the town, Mr. Alexander felt that he had many duties to perform to others as well as to the members of his own faith, and in these he was at all times equally zealous and efficient. On the Committee of the Fever Hospital, and of several Poor Relief Associations, as Trustee of the Windsor Hill Schools, as many years Secretary of the Savings Bank, as a leading speaker on the memorable occasion of the opening of the Newry Model National School—the first in Ireland—and as a supporter of various other charitable and useful institutions in the town and neighbourhood, Mr. Alexander's valuable services were always available, and were always acceptable, and his loss will be deeply and widely felt. In the year 1865 he was obliged, from failing health, to resign the active duties of the ministry, the Rev. John A. Crozier, the present minister, being appointed his assistant and successor. Several of Mr. Alexander's valuable discourses have been published; amongst others "A Lecture for the Times," one of a series delivered in the Music Hall, Belfast, at the time of the passing of the Ecclesiastical Titles Act; a treatise on "Human Nature," and a very remarkable and able discourse, which at the time attracted general attention, on the subject of the "War in the Crimea." His remains were interred in the Old Meeting House Green, High-street, where they will find a fitting resting-place by the graves of his predecessors—the Rev. Dr. Malcolm and the Rev. Mr. Mitchel.

POTTERY, OR POETRY?

THIS is said not to be a poetical age, but certainly it is a rhyming one. On Good Friday, a Mr. Potter, who has a shop in one of the leading thoroughfares of London, inscribed the following lines on a piece of paper, and pasted it upon his window-shutter:

We're off by rail; don't rail at us for that;
'Tis Easter time, and Springy, breezy weather;
That brain and nerve may rest from business-toil,
Resolv'd—we all take holiday together.
'Tis very good, we know, to pray and fast;
For soul and body such is often needed:
And in the headlong race for speedy wealth
Body and soul, alas! are little heeded.
'Tis also good to mount the breezy hills,
And hold with words and fields some sweet communion—
To breathe the pure air by pasture-winding rills,
That soul and body may keep longer union.
On Nature's carpet—carp at this who may;
When high above the skylark chants his praises;
If any one requireth Potter's clay,
They'll find him neck and heels among the daisies.

THE NON-SUBSCRIBING PRESBYTERY OF ANTRIM.

ON Easter Monday, an adjourned meeting of this Presbytery was held at the Second Presbyterian Church (Rev. J. Porter's), Rosemary-street, for the purpose of considering the resolution with reference to State endowments remitted to them. The Rev. J. JELLIE moderated.

The MODERATOR having stated the purpose for which they were assembled, said that, since their last meeting, Mr. Gladstone's motion had been carried in the House of Commons. It might be supposed by some that the great victory achieved by the Liberals had rendered it inexpedient for them to take any movement in the matter at present, but it ought to be borne in mind that Mr. Disraeli had signified his intention to oppose strenuously step by step Mr. Gladstone's resolutions in committee. He thought, therefore, they were called on to consider that great question, and to express their opinion upon it. He might state that the eyes of their co-religionists in England had been directed to them since their last meeting, and an article had appeared in one of their organs, in which it was stated that the Unitarians of England had been long looking to them for a sign, and they were exceedingly glad that they had not been disappointed. He trusted that whatever they might do, and whatever the Legislature might do, would tend to promote a good understanding amongst people of all races and creeds in this unhappy land, and promote the general interests of the country. (Hear, hear.)

Rev. R. A. ARMSTRONG, Banbridge, read the article to which the Moderator referred. This article had appeared in the Unitarian Herald. It called upon them to adopt a definite course. He thought when such an article as that appeared in an English paper they should at once answer to the call. The Presbytery of Antrim had long been attached to free thought and liberal religion. It would have been well if they had given utterance to a certain sound sooner in this matter, while around them there was only a Babel of uncertain sounds. Even now, at the eleventh hour, they should not hesitate to send forth their opinion, in the hope that it would not be too late to have some effect. It was something that they should be the first religious body in Ireland to express their sympathy with Mr. Gladstone, and their willingness to renounce all State endowments, though it might appear that an insignificant body like theirs could have no weight in the councils of the nation. When all religious bodies were hugging their temporalities—hugging them unanimously—a single dissentient voice breaking that unanimity might not be without moral force if it reached the public press and the House of Commons. (Hear, hear.) He concluded by reading a letter from Mr. Gilbert Mulligan—an elder of his congregation—who was unable to attend; and who wrote very warmly in favour of disendowment.

Rev. JOHN PORTER regretted that he was unable to attend the last meeting. The morning after it, he was very much surprised to find, when he took up the News-Letter, that this question had been discussed, and still more surprised and gratified when he found that the ministers of their smaller and poorer congregations were prominent in magnanimously declaring their readiness to give up their endowments. He had confidence in the laity, but his experience did not altogether warrant him in sharing the confidence expressed by some of their members. As he and several other ministers were much better situated than some of their neighbours, he thought he should act for himself, and he had consequently prepared a petition to Parliament. On Sunday he laid it before his congregation, and it was signed by some. It was clear that either Mr. Gladstone's or Mr. Disraeli's proposition would be ultimately carried. It would be a great misfortune to all their religious communities, and to the State itself, if Mr. Disraeli's plan were acted upon—a plan which would, in the long run, make them all mere slaves to the State. He was glad to find that Bishop Alexander, a day or two ago, while expressing his sorrowful feelings at the woes which he foresaw coming upon his Church, expressed a firm belief that it would weather the storm, and maintain itself at the last. He, for one, found himself in accord in regard to a matter of this kind with a Protestant Bishop, for he believed that the Established Church would come triumphantly through the assault aimed against her. For so far, with all her wealth and dignity, she had not gained in this country. But he believed that the beginning of the prosperity of that Church would date from the day when it should be disestablished and divested of all State endowments.

Rev. Mr. HUNNONS (Carrickfergus) said there was a phrase in the document that was somewhat harsh. The Established Church was spoken of as the Church of an insignificant minority.

Rev. J. PORTER said it could be expunged if it was likely to be taken as offensive. If he had to do it over again he should say "small minority."

The MODERATOR: Leave out the porridge Protestants, and you will not be far wrong in allowing the expression to remain.

Dr. RITCHIE: It can do no harm to remain as it is. I should prefer seeing it kept as it is, and in the form in which the petition was adopted.

Rev. WM. HALL (Greyabbey) said he was the minister of a weak congregation, and he had much pleasure in concurring with his brethren in regard to this question, which was pre-eminently one of the questions of the day, and stood second to none except the land question. Against endowments in their hitherto existing condition he did not shrink from protesting. They were, in his opinion, a marvellous injustice. They were asked, would the Established Church suffer by reason of disestablishment? Well, justice was good for all, whether they believed it at the time or not. Religious equality, he believed, was the coming future of the churches in Ireland. Discussing for a moment the application of the property of which it was proposed to divest the Established Church, he said he believed it might be divided proportionately between the different churches without involving the necessity of State connection. That would be a graceful tribute to religion. But, however these revenues were to be applied, the fabric of the future must be built upon religious equality. Our country is greater than our sects, and justice is greater than all.

Rev. JOHN HALL (Ballyclare) would offer no obstruction to the disendowment of all churches.

Dr. RITCHIE moved the adoption of a series of resolutions agreed to at a meeting of the York-street Nonsubscribing Church, held after morning service, on Sunday, 29th March, Mr. Robert M'Mullen in the chair.

Rev. WM. HALL seconded the motion.

Rev. H. MOORE (Newtownards), while earnestly arguing that the churches should be put on a footing of perfect equality, could not cordially join in the proposition for the disendowment of them all. He thought all might be endowed; and that the various congregations should have had an opportunity of discussing the matter.

Rev. D. THOMPSON was of opinion that, as a Presbytery, they could only affirm the voluntary principle. The matter should be brought prominently before their congregations.

Mr. LOGAN (elder), Carrickfergus, said they, as Unitarians, would never see the success of their system while religious inequalities were allowed to remain.

Rev. S. C. NELSON, while approving of the resolutions generally, objected to some expressions contained in them. He should feel great reluctance in disagreeing with anything that came from a congregation which had made such a noble stand as the congregation of York-street. He was, perhaps, more Conservative than some of his younger brethren. It was a feeling of Conservatism that led him to take the part he did in the earlier struggles in connection with the York-street congregation. Coming to the more immediate subject in hand, he declared his belief that the question as to the establishment of any sect was now settled for ever. He gathered this not merely from the recent vote in the Commons, but from what had transpired as to the report evidently about to be made by the Royal Commission, most of the members of which are decided friends of the Established Church, and also from the tone of the Conservative and High Church journals of the day, by all of which it was admitted that it was impossible that the Irish Church could be upheld as it at present stood. Of course, the admission came too late, and for this he was sorry, as he had the highest respect for the majority of the members of the Established Church with whom he had had the good fortune to come in contact. Some of the clergy of that church with whom during his ministry he had come in contact, had not hesitated to allow him the shelter of their church to perform funeral services when the weather was inclement. Dealing with the abstract question of religious endowments, he remarked that very many who had formerly held different views were now coming round to the opinion that it was the duty of the State to educate the young; and if it were the duty of the State to give secular education, why should not the State afford opportunities for religious education too, provided that could be done without interfering with the perfect religious equality of all religious sects? (Hear, hear.) This might be accomplished by means of a capitation grant. Mr. Nelson concluded by suggesting a variety of schemes for meeting the existing difficulties in regard to churches.

Finally, on the motion of Mr. LOGAN, seconded by Mr. ARMSTRONG, the following resolutions were passed without dissent:

"1. That, as the question of religious endowments is now occupying the attention of the Parliament of the United Kingdom, and of thoughtful men in all churches, we feel called upon to express our conviction that, inasmuch as the State is not competent to decide infallibly as to the truth or error of the theological opinions of the several communions who compose the population, and contribute to the support of the empire, it should place all churches on a footing of absolute religious freedom and equality.

"2. That we have long felt it to be gross injustice, and a prolific source of irritation and disaffection, that a few churches, which contain but a fraction of the population of this country, should enjoy special civil and religious privileges, whereby a badge of inferiority is necessarily attached to the majority of the people, and the great principles of civil and religious liberty are violated.

"3. That, having regard to the marked differences in dogmatic theology which exist, and to the spirit of sectarian animosity which unhappily prevails in this distracted land, we consider the voluntary system better suited to the condition of the country than any system of State endowment."

THE MANCHESTER DISTRICT SUNDAY-SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

ON Friday last, the twenty-third annual meeting of this association was held at Dukinfield. The day was fine, and by ten o'clock large numbers of our friends began to assemble from all parts of the district. During the proceedings we noticed present the Revs. J. Page Hopps (Dukinfield), H. E. Dowson, B.A. (Gee Cross), W. Oates (Derby), James Drummond, B.A., S. A. Steintal, Brooke Herford, J. Harrop, W. H. Herford, B.A. (Manchester), C. W. Robberds (Oldham), J. Black, A.M. (Stockport), J. Freeston (Rochdale), E. Allen (Lydgate), J. Fox (Heywood), D. Berry (Mossley), P. W. Clayden (Nottingham); Messrs. J. Dendy, B.A. (president), Jesse Pilcher and J. Reynolds (secretaries), H. Rawson, C. J. Herford, J. Brookes, J. Ogden, Geo. Smith, Dr. Marcus, J. Lee (Barnard Castle), and other friends.

THE SERVICE

was held in the chapel at half-past ten o'clock in the morning, when the Rev. P. W. CLAYDEN preached an appropriate discourse from Eccles. xl. 1: "Cast thy bread upon the waters, for thou shalt find it after many days;" and Gal. vi. 9: "Let us not be weary in well-doing, for in due season we shall reap if we faint not."

At the close of the service, about 800 took dinner in the schoolroom.

THE BUSINESS MEETING

was held in the chapel at two o'clock, when Mr. JOHN DENDY, B.A., president of the society, took the chair.

The CHAIRMAN, in opening the meeting, said that he thought they might congratulate themselves that through so long a period the labours of the association had continued to grow in usefulness. The address of Mr. Clayden in the morning was a touching one, and must have come home to every Sunday-school teacher, who, looking up from his labours, found as year after year rolled by the same instance had he been requested to test the character of the instruction given in the schools."

Various business resolutions, adopting the report, and appointing officers, were then passed, in the course of which Mr. J. MARSHALL and the Rev. J. PAGE HOPPS cordially welcomed the meeting to Dukinfield. A vote of thanks to the Rev. P. W. Clayden for his sermon, moved by Mr. GEORGE SMITH, of Manchester, and seconded by Mr. JOSEPH LEE, of Barnard Castle, was carried with warm acclamation.

A vote of welcome to the delegates from other associations brought up

Mr. I. M. WADE, who, in responding, expressed his sense of the refreshing effects of such a meeting as theirs, which those could best appreciate who were accustomed to more formal meetings. Mr. Clayden, he thought, had given them the spiritual side of the subject in his morning's discourse; in the evening he expected Mr. Herford would bring them down to the practical side. Well, it was a good work for which they were united—its very essence being love to God and love to man. There was something important in knowing how to plant and how to water. They were fortunate, therefore, in having the spiritual and practical sides of the question brought under their notice together. With regard to himself, he was a visitor in London, and listened with extreme interest to Mr. Chadwick's report. He had not surveyed the whole ground. What man could? He had said enough, however, he had no doubt, giving here and there to some a kindly knock. But would they permit him to say that he thought Mr. Chadwick was asking too much in seeking himself to examine the children? When a visitor goes into a school, children are too busily engaged in casting him up at their own value to stand the test of an examination. He would prefer getting the children to ask him questions, rather than to ask them. But who was the right person to do this business of examination? Whom were we to look to to give the tone to a school but the minister? He supposed he should have Mr. Herford down upon him in the evening, nevertheless he thought the minister ought to be the recognised head—and that he was responsible for the "go" of their congregational life. But of course he could not do everything alone—he wanted volunteers—for he could not force them into service. He must, however, be the help of the volunteers. He must be the ruling spirit, and responsible if anything went wrong. If the minister would thus keep the spirit alive, and in addition work hard himself, their schools could not fail. With regard to books, Mr. Wade then proceeded to recommend two volumes just published by the Sunday-school Association on the "Epistles," Mr. Poynting's new "Services," and a penny "Teachers' Magazine," published by the Orthodox Dissenting Sunday-school Union.

The Rev. W. OATES also responded on behalf of the North Midland Association, saying a few kindly words of greeting. He especially remarked that it was satisfactory to find in this one district that this year there was a real increase in both scholars and teachers. He approved of their having one visitor, as they got more consecutive reports generalising the whole facts. In the North Midland district they had many visitors, and as a consequence they had detached reports. The report read by Mr. Chadwick for that reason was not only better but simpler.

An invitation for the association to hold its next annual meeting at Bury was then accepted, and a hearty vote of thanks was given to the Dukinfield friends for their hospitable reception.

After tea, at which again from 800 to 900 were present in the schoolroom, at six o'clock was held in the chapel, when Mr. JOHN BROOKS presided.

THE EVENING MEETING

The CHAIRMAN said that he assumed that their presence at that meeting might be taken as a pledge that they took a lively interest in Sunday-school education. He could assure them that their presence had gladdened the hearts of the Dukinfield congregation, and if he must judge from their feelings as expressed, he believed the gratification was mutual. (Cheers.) Sunday schools had been of great advantage, especially to these manufacturing districts, and if we could only picture to ourselves the state of society before their introduction, and compare it with what it was now, we should be more impressed with the very great advantage they had been to us. After a few other remarks, the chairman called the attention of the meeting to the subject of the evening, viz., "Some improvement possible in our Sunday schools as at present constituted," and stated that each speaker must be limited in his remarks to ten minutes.

The Rev. BROOKE HERFORD then introduced the subject, as announced above, and said: I think we shall all agree that, though not failures, out yet our Sunday schools are not keeping pace with the educational standard of the day. Many believe considerable modification of our general Sunday-school system needed. For instance, some go in for purely religious instruction, which would be a very sweeping change indeed, while others think half-day Sunday schools are what we must eventually come to. We have to do with facts, however. Evidently any such radical changes cannot be made at present. Our best teachers are against the half-day system, while our indifferent teachers are incapable of profitably giving exclusively religious instruction. So we are thrown back on the question, "What can we do with our Sunday schools as they are?" On their present plan, with their present calibre of teaching power—with their present lessons, and their present books—what can be done to render them more effective? And mark, I take "more effective" here in a very broad sense. I do not ask for special results; but I do want our schools to be such that the scholars will love to come to them; will come without being overmuch looked after; will feel proud of belonging to them—such that while there they will have a pleasant, animated time, and go away feeling they have got something by coming. Now, the two things which strike me as at present most hindering such a feeling on the part of our scholars are these:

1. Our school work, generally, too straggling; lasts too long, wants compressing into shorter school hours.

2. Our teaching, too mechanical; wants to be made more an exercise of thought, and wants more adaptation to the needs of humble life.

First, then, we want more compression in our arrangements, to take the work shorter and quicker. Children need life, change, movement. At present a great deal of time is lost both by superintendents and teachers; and the work is actually worse done than if a shorter time were taken. For instance, there are few afternoon schools that might not be shortened by half an hour, yet leaving the same time for teaching. Let me show how this might be. I suppose the usual afternoon school is two hours—say from two to four, or 2 15 to 4 15. Well, how is this actually spent? The bell should be rung at two, but actually it is mostly 2 5 or 2 7 before the bell is rung. Then the teachers, who have been grouping together, have to get to their places; then there are the names to call over, so that it is near 2 15 when the hymn is fairly given out. Then the music is almost always too slow, often the hymn too long, so it is 2 20 before the bell rings for actual lessons. But do lessons really begin even then? How many teachers "get under weigh" in less than five minutes more? First there are the books to get out, then there is the difficult question of where to read to be settled, so that in average schools it is nearly half-past two before all the classes are actually at work. At "three" the change takes place; but here again there is five minutes lost through teachers not being ready, and through noise. Then comes "writing." How many get under weigh with the writing in less than ten minutes? There are the copy-books to give out, then pens: probably one inkstand is dry; three pens are bad; two lads want copies setting, and probably at least one copy-book is altogether missing. So that it is near 3 15 by the time the classes are fairly at their writing. Writing should stop at 3 45, but probably at 3 45 the superintendent is not ready—doesn't ring till 3 50. Then he wants a few words of address; then, what with hymn and prayer, it is 4 5 or 4 10 before scholars and teachers have cleared out. Now, mark,—out of a school session of upwards of two hours, there have been two actual lessons of 30 or 35 minutes each, and all the rest of the time has been taken up with extras.

Who is responsible for this? Who can mend this? Partly our superintendents, partly our teachers. The two great things are to have everything ready beforehand, and to do everything to the moment. First, consider the superintendent's part, and here let me say that our schools want stricter supervision, superintendents who shall really be "captains." The superintendent should be there ten or fifteen minutes before school, should see everything ready, have his hymn chosen, the tune chosen also, class registers ready, and above all, should see to it that the teachers are in their places and not gossiping about in cliques, as they are too apt to be up to the very moment for commencing. Then comes the teachers' part; every teacher should be in his place at least five minutes before school. He should see that his books are all ready, the place found; that the copy-books are ready also, the pens good, pencils sharpened, ink-pots full; and then if he has any spare time let him have a kindly chat with those lads who have come early; by this means every scholar may be at work in two minutes after the hymn is sung. Then again, teachers must be ready to close their lessons at the moment. Lessons should stop all at the instant; and then when the bell rings, every teacher should devote himself to keeping absolute order and quiet. Then the superintendent's part begins again. He must not let there be any time for getting into disorder. I would say to superintendents, never address the school for the sake of addressing it, only when you have really something to say. Then have the hymn short and lively; and the prayer short and very earnest; and every scholar may be out of school in fifteen minutes from the time when the lessons actually closed. Now, see the gain of this: It will save half an hour, without lessening the time for learning, for, mark, thirty or thirty-five minutes is as long as at present for each lesson—and is enough. You may do just as much work in half an hour less, and this to the gain and enjoyment of both teachers and scholars, who will all be far more alive and far more interested in all the work of the school.

Then, as to the second part: how the teaching of such subjects as are taught at present may be

Mr. E. L. CHADWICK read the financial statement, from which it appeared that at the beginning of the year there was a balance in hand of £45. 14s. 4½d.; receipts from other sources, £134. 1s. The expenditure had been £104. 13s. 3½d., leaving a balance in hand of £75. 2s. 0½d., which, however, would be almost absorbed by payments due to the lecturers and the visitors.

Mr. J. CHADWICK, the visitor, then read his report, of which the following is an abstract:

"At the schools mentioned in the general report, I have examined most of the classes, and have in almost all of them given suggestive lessons, chiefly upon Scriptural subjects, to several classes grouped together, with the teachers thereof sitting near, noting the mode of teaching. These classes have been well attended, sometimes more than one hundred scholars and a dozen teachers being present. I have also sat in the presence of individual teachers, and conducted the class for them. Superintendents have frequently invited me to address the scholars, and pulpits have also been freely opened to me from which to address the congregations. I have in all these schools met the teachers in conference, to give them verbally an expression of my judgment on their ways of teaching and their general school routine. Afterwards, to each of these schools I have sent a written report embodying the suggestions made to the teachers in conference, in the hope that they would give them a fuller and deeper consideration than we were able to do when together. I have also attended the annual meeting of the Accrington Local Union; at Bury, I introduced for discussion "The discipline of the Sunday school;" at Stockport, before the North Cheshire Union, I urged the object and interest of local unions; at Ford-street, Salford, under the auspices of the Manchester Union, I dwelt upon the value of acquiring a knowledge of scholars. On the days of my visit there have been present 2,240 scholars, 248 teachers, and 511 teachers and elder scholars have attended the conferences, the latter manifesting a great desire to be present. The demeanour of the scholars has been most praiseworthy, and in several instances most exemplary. Although the evidences of spiritual life and vigour among some of the schools were not so apparent as could be desired, still there were not wanting signs of earnestness which it is hoped may be further developed by God's blessing. The report closed with some general remarks on the art of teaching and other auxiliary influences of the schools he had visited, and remarked that in no improved. At present, it is all too much mere mechanical drilling. It wants making more an exercise of thought, and more adapted to the actual needs of the scholars. Let me illustrate this. Take e.g. arithmetic: I don't like arithmetic in Sunday schools, yet it is still taught in many, so I will just say a word about it. Now you constantly find scholars working at advanced sums who can only do them when set down for them, and cannot apply their knowledge to the real questions in which they actually need arithmetic; e.g., you will find scholars dealing with long rows of figures who could not for their lives set down for themselves "two hundred thousand and thirty;" and so you may see elementary scholars doing great square addition sums, who could not possibly set down and do this:

So I would say, never set down a sum. 432
Teach the scholars notation; give much 8 simpler but irregular sums to do. 301

Then, again, as to writing. From the very 1064 beginning writing may be made really interesting. Take even a class of very little ones.

At present, you know each is set to do a slateful of pot-hooks. Instead, have them round you; teach them to make an o. Well, that is a letter. Let them also make an i; that also is a letter. Show them how to join the two together, thus, a; and then by lengthening out the straight stroke they have another letter, d. Here they may learn four letters, and feel they have really got something, and that as easily as doing line after line of meaningless strokes. Again, take a class of middling writers. Some of them will write very poorly; others, perhaps, quickly and well. At present, for the most part, it is copy-book, for ever, for all of them. Now why not give the better writers copying out of books, or a letter; that will be something like what they will have to do in actual life. They will get no "copies" set them in the world. Best of all is dictation. Choose something familiar for them to write about, even if it is only a list of things they can see at school or at home, or a parable to be written in their own words. Especially mind it be something simple enough, and encourage them to try, and not be afraid of mistakes.

Then take reading. It is said to see what are called by courtesy the "reading lessons" at present. You see about one attending at a time, all standing up in turn to read. Now the very first thing is to secure unity in the lesson—to make all keep their eyes on the place—so that each one's reading may really be a lesson for all. So let them keep seated while reading, and if inattentive, dodge them about and take them irregularly. Then let there be at least so much conversation and questioning as may secure that they get at the bare meaning of the words, and as may make that meaning a living thought to them. And to do this it is the same tale as before—preparation. You must have read the lesson over beforehand, and you must have considered what thought there is about it which will most take hold of the scholars' minds.

Now in all that I have said, there is nothing but what every teacher who likes may do, that is, every teacher who really wants to do his little bit of work for God the best he can; and that is the only spirit that can make anything out of Sunday-school teaching. It can't be done shipshod and half-heartedly. It will come to no good whatever if you are afraid of your time, or if you are afraid of your trouble. But if you really will do your best, I have shown you what lies close to your hand without making any changes whatever in your general system. It is, to think over beforehand what your children know, and what they don't know, and what they most need. It is always to be at school five or ten minutes before school, to get everything ready, and have a quiet chat with your scholars, instead of a gossip with your fellow-teachers. It is especially to feel a deep desire to do something for these children to help them on a little, and give them a spur towards self-improvement. And most of all, as strengthening all, it is to have the spirit of prayer, to go to your work praying.

Mr. GEORGE SMITH said he was sure all would be pleased with the spirited manner in which Mr. Herford had introduced his subject, and if they could catch something of that spirit from him they would be all the better for it. The age in which we lived was professedly advancing, but he was afraid that many of our teachers, while liberal in other matters, were extremely Conservative in Sunday-school management. Now there were some things that belonged to olden times in our Sunday schools that wanted sweeping away. He could, however, hardly agree with all Mr. Herford's remarks, for although it is desirable to get through mere mechanical exercises without loss of time, there is the fact that they were not only superintendents, but they had to turn their hands to everything. All is left to the superintendent. To superintend is to see things done—but he is compelled to do things himself, for he cannot get everything done and arranged always at the right moment. The changes he would effect would be somewhat different. He really thought the time had come when writing and arithmetic should make way for something better. The fact is that many children who would otherwise be kept at the day school, are taken away to work, the parents thinking that they can learn reading, writing, and arithmetic at the Sunday school.

He would devote the time to a kind of oral instruction, which would give them something to think and talk about. What our teachers want is some kind of lesson—a common object or story—which would call forth the affection of a child as well as its thought. Our teachers want lessons of this kind, and the idea had struck him that it would be well if a page of the magazine were used for teachers, giving them what they might take for lessons. So far as the school hours are concerned, he agreed with Mr. Herford that an hour and a half is long enough; but he would not be over-rigid as to time. The great thing that is needed is that teachers should prepare for their classes before going into them. If they prepared themselves for the Sunday school as they did for business, their children would get thought that would be food for them in the week day. (Hear, hear.)

The Rev. W. H. HERFORD, B.A., agreed with Mr. Smith that thought and common sense were what were required in our Sunday schools. If mechanical teaching was to be continued, he would have the scholars distinct from those capable of a higher kind of teaching; and if reading, writing, and arithmetic must be taught them, he would have a teacher who knew how to teach them. They all knew that the regular day-school teacher had to prepare himself for his work, and Sunday-school teachers who thought they could teach without preparation had simply missed their vocation. If proper preparation was made by our teachers, he felt persuaded that religious teaching would be found more within their power even than secular teaching. All who possess any education—who can read for their own pleasure, who have some taste for natural history, or love any kind of study—if they would only believe in their own knowledge and powers, would be able to interest children, if they would speak to them out of the fulness of their own minds. He would like to say a word to the educated classes, and urge upon them that it is a melancholy thing to think that the members of our cultivated and wealthy families do not take that part in the Sunday school which, as Christian men and women, they ought to do, on the ground of their living a long way off. Such people regularly attend to their business, distance is no barrier in that direction, yet they think that they, living in their pleasant country houses, with everything beautiful about them, cannot be expected to go and teach those who live in close alleys and who have a hard lot to bear. All he could say was that if such people were not willing to take a little pains and trouble in this way—and it would give them a large amount of pleasure if only they took up the work in a right spirit—the sooner they put aside their Christianity the better. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. THOMAS BRITAIN said a few words urging the study of natural theology.

Mr. D. BAXTER said, from common report, he expected Mr. Herford was going to upset the whole Sunday-school system as it existed at present, instead of which he found he had gone into mere questions of drill. His portrait of Sunday-school as actually carried on was certainly true, and in the introductory part he understood he was going to be practical, but in that he was disappointed. He was afraid it was impossible to carry his suggestions out; they seemed simple but yet were impossible. Where could they find the men able to carry them out? In our Sunday-schools at present but a very small percentage could do it. In one or two, such promptness might be possible, but only in our very best schools. They had to deal with the average, and where there was one who could do it the great bulk could not, and so it seemed to him impracticable. On the other hand, he did not agree with Mr. Smith's suggestion to do away with reading, writing, and arithmetic, because he was afraid such a course would drive away the elder scholars. The great want in our Sunday schools is efficient teachers; where were they to get them? (Hear, hear.)

Dr. MARCUS said he was not prepared to say that our Sunday schools required a radical change. He believed they must keep pace with the spirit of the times, by which was meant that now we are better educated and far more intelligent than thirty or forty years ago. If that were so, there ought to be no difficulty in getting more intelligent teachers into our schools, which would thus gradually change for the better. But here they were met by the fact that superintendents have great difficulty in getting suitable teachers. The reason alleged was that our best educated people lived some distance from the school. He regarded that as a paltry excuse—and considered it a lasting shame upon our Christianity that appeals for good teachers should be made in vain. (Hear, hear.)

The Rev. H. E. DOWSON gave a spirited comparison between Sunday-school teachers and soldiers. They were soldiers of Christ, but they were volunteers. He felt, however, that when once they had volunteered they must come to them with the exactitude of regulars. Until that was the spirit at work in our Sunday schools, the old complaints would continue to exist. He thought they could not insist too strongly on having a good system in their Sunday-school management. Bad teachers would do more when working on a good system than good teachers on a bad one. He laid great stress upon questioning the scholars. In his own classes he had often spent half the lesson hour in questioning them upon the subject of the previous week. He thought, too, that secular teaching could not be spared. It was not that any secular instruction given was important in itself, but it was a help towards self-education.

After addresses from the Rev. John Page Hopps, Mr. Jesse Pilcher, and Rev. S. A. Steintal, the Rev. Broke Herford briefly replied, and the meeting closed with a hymn and prayer.

OPENING OF ACCRINGTON NEW CHAPEL.

THE Unitarians of Accrington, and their friends who have sustained and assisted their efforts, had the satisfaction of seeing the completion of the enterprise in which they have been engaged, in the opening of the new chapel, on Good Friday. The building is plain and unpretending, but neat and pleasing in appearance. The interior is arranged in a very convenient manner. At the end opposite the entrance is a platform in place of pulpit. The seats are open benches. On each side of the entrance are classrooms which, by the movement of sliding windows, can be thrown open to the chapel. Over these is a gallery. The whole will seat 300 persons.

The chapel was well filled at the opening service. The music was particularly good. The Rev. J. K. SMITH, of Newchurch, conducted the devotional service, and the Rev. J. WRIGHT, B.A., preached. The sermon contained a statement of the reasons which led to a desire to add one more to the various places of worship already existing in the town, and showed why the congregation which would assemble there found themselves unable to join any of the "orthodox" bodies. They desired to pray to God as a loving Father, and to Him alone; to exercise the right of free inquiry, and be every one persuaded in his own mind; to work out their own salvation; and to do all in the spirit and under the influence of Jesus Christ. The preacher contrasted on each of these points Unitarian and "orthodox" principles, and, without censuring persons who worship in accordance with the latter, contended that the Unitarians must either found chapels of their own, or lose the benefit of public religious services. He concluded with an urgent appeal to the members of the congregation to discharge worthily the responsibilities of the added advantages they would henceforth possess. A collection was made at the close of the service of upwards of £21.

After partaking of tea in a room in the Peel Institute, the friends re-assembled in the chapel, when the chair was taken by ROBERT HAYWOOD, Esq., of Bolton. A hymn having been sung, the chairman expressed his pleasure at being present, believing our views to be true, and calculated to make us happier and better. He rejoiced to find another temple, though a small one, erected for their maintenance in the district, and only regretted that there had been any difficulty in raising the needed funds. He mentioned instances of the liberality shown by orthodox bodies in the matter of chapel building, and exhorted to an imitation of their zeal and energy.

On the motion of the Rev. L. TAPLIN, M.A., seconded by R. T. HEAPE, Esq., of Rochdale, a vote of thanks was passed to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association for the help given by it to Accrington. This was replied to by Mr. Alderman J. CLARKE LAWRENCE, who was present as a deputation from the committee of the association. He pleaded for a more general support of the association in the north, and showed the duty of active exertion in reference to religion, in a speech of great spirit and power, which was enthusiastically responded to by the meeting. He had no fear for the future, if an earnest spirit reigned in that place, for he held it as a truth incontrovertible, that wherever a body of earnest men and women were gathered together, and made up their minds to maintain a place of worship, they would do it. (Hear, hear.) He looked forward to the time when they would have to use that place as a school, and build a new chapel on adjoining ground.

JOHN GRUNDY, Esq., of Summerseat, in proposing "Prosperity to the Accrington Congregation," remarked that there must be a strong feeling that the proceedings of that day were important, and a lively interest in the principles advocated, or the meeting would not have brought together so many persons from different parts of the country. Referring to the denial, in some cases, of the Christian name to Unitarians, he vindicated their right to the title by enumerating their distinctive principles, and by showing that the doctrines they reject are opposed to the natural reason, and heart, and conscience of human beings. Wherever men have been left, unnumbered by verbal creeds, to form their opinions, as among the English Presbyterians and the American Universalists, Unitarian doctrines have been the result. We might be encouraged by seeing that there is progress from age to age. A hundred years ago John Wesley—whom he desired to speak of with much respect—said if men gave up a belief in witchcraft, they must give up a belief in the Bible, whereas now no educated man believes in witchcraft. So, one after another, the superstitions of mankind die away among the shadows of the past. He looked upon religion in its influence and effect on the character of men. His own opinion was that, preach heaven as they might, each man had his own heaven in his own soul, and just in proportion as they were worthy to enjoy and capable of enjoying the condition of a saint heaven had come to them. (Hear, hear.) He next alluded to the absence of Unitarians among the criminal or pauper classes. Men might talk as they would, but they wanted a religion which improved and blessed the people. (Hear, hear.) They wanted a religion which, whilst holding out the brightest hopes of the immortal life, would teach a man to live in the practice of virtue and obedience to the will of God. It was because he thought Unitarianism was that religion that he was inexpressibly pleased at being at Accrington on that occasion. They were doing well to bring their views of religion to "the common people," the artisans of the country, for these views would command the love and reverence of this class, since by teaching the great principles they held they would banish sin and tyranny and oppression from the earth.

The motion was seconded by ROYSTON OLIVER, Esq., of Rochdale, and supported by Rev. THOMAS HARRISON, of Nottingham, and carried with much applause. Mr. MILLS, of Accrington, responded, and offered the thanks of the congregation to all who had helped them; he declared their intention to work hard to make a good use of the advantages they now enjoyed.

Addresses were afterwards given by Revs. J. K. SMITH and JOHN WRIGHT, and Messrs. THOMAS HOLLAND, A. MACKIE, ROBERT KAY, J. H. HARGREAVES, and others. Votes of thanks were passed to the preacher for his sermon of the afternoon, which he was requested to print, to the choir for their music, and to the ladies for their trouble in providing tea. The meeting closed with a very hearty and enthusiastic vote of thanks to the much-respected chairman. Revs. J. T. Whitehead and Thos. Carter were present, but had to leave at an early period of the proceedings.

INTELLIGENCE.

BATTLE, SUSSEX.—On Good Friday and Easter Sunday, our friends here celebrated, as usual, their Sunday-school anniversary. On the Friday afternoon upwards of eighty friends had tea together, after which a meeting was held in the chapel, when addresses, on the importance of Sunday-school instruction and the necessity of its being distinctively and purely Christian in its tone, were delivered by the Rev. W. Birks, who was in the chair, and by Messrs. Hale (London), E. and R. Burgess (Brighton), J. Burgess (Battle), S. C. Burgess (Hastings), and others. The report, read by Mr. Chettle, the secretary, testified to the general efficiency and prosperity of the school, which now numbers over eighty scholars. On Easter Sunday, the annual sermons in aid of the Sunday school were preached to good congregations by the Rev. R. C. Jones, B.A., of Bexhill, near Hastings. The collections exceeded former years. In the afternoon the communion was celebrated. At the close of the evening service, numerous reward books were distributed by the minister of the congregation to the scholars who had attended not less than forty-six Sundays in the year.

BELFAST.—On Thursday evening last, a soirée was held in the Music Hall, in connection with the York-street Nonsubscribing Congregation. There was a large and respectable company of members of the congregation and friends of other denominations. After tea, Mr. Robert McMillen was called to the chair, and addresses were delivered by the Rev. J. Jellie (minister of the congregation), on the condition and prospects of the congregation, the Rev. R. A. Armstrong (Banbridge), on the late meeting at St. John College, Rev. D. Thompson (Monaghan), on "Our Sunday-schools," also by the Rev. J. Cooper, late of Topsham, Devonshire. A pleasant social evening was spent, and the proceedings were brought to a close by singing a hymn.

BIRMINGHAM: UNITARIAN DOMESTIC MISSION.—On Sunday, April 5th, two sermons were preached in the Old Meeting House, by the Rev. James Black, A.M., of Stockport, after which collections were made in aid of the mission amounting to £56.2s. On the Monday evening following, the twenty-eighth annual meeting was held at Newhall Hill Chapel. After tea A. W. Wills, Esq., was called to the chair, and opened the business of the evening with a suitable address. The annual report of the committee was read by the secretary, Mr. Earl, from which it appeared that in every department of the mission progress had been made during the year. The treasurer's accounts showed that the income of the general fund was £239. 11s. 4d., and the expenditure £240. 17s. 1d. The income of the school fund was £652. 4s. 1d., and the expenditure £671. 14s. 1d. On the motion of the Rev. Samuel Bache, seconded by Mr. Jesse Collings, the report was adopted and the accounts passed, after which the Rev. B. Wright read a very satisfactory report of his proceedings as domestic missionary.

BOLTON.—A monument has been placed over the grave of the late Mr. John Gordon, formerly secretary to the trustees of Bank-street Chapel, erected by the members of the Ancient Noble Order of Odd-fellows, Bolton Unity, to which Mr. Gordon acted as corresponding secretary for upwards of twenty-eight years. The ceremony took place on Good Friday, when, after a portrait of Mr. Gordon had been formally handed over to the Grand Lodge Committee in the lodge room, a procession was formed of the grand master of the order and the other chief officers, accompanied by between 150 and 200 members, and the Rev. Jeffery Worthington, who had been invited to assist in the ceremony. A considerable crowd was present at the cemetery, where the proceedings were of an impressive character. The monument—an obelisk upon a square base—is of Bradford stone, the entire elevation being 11 feet. It bears a suitable inscription, and representations of the emblems of Oddfellowship.

CIRENCESTER: FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.—A most interesting meeting was held in this church on Good Friday. After a sumptuous tea, very able and instructive addresses were delivered by the Rev. Henry Austin, H. E. Howse, of Bath, an old and valued friend of the cause, and Dr. Jeffrey, who has recently settled here, and others who take an interest in the Cirencester movement.

HULL: BOWLALLEY-LANE.—On Tuesday evening, April 7th, an interesting meeting of the Mutual Improvement Society was held. There was a large attendance after tea. After an address by the Rev. J. M. Dixon, who was in the chair, the secretary and treasurer read the reports, which were highly gratifying. During the year sixteen new members have joined the society.

LONDON: FOREST HILL.—On Sunday last, a room, which has been neatly and comfortably fitted up under the auspices of the London Lay Preachers' Union, was opened by them for Unitarian and Christian worship. The sermon was preached by the Rev. J. Taylor. After the service, a meeting was held to make arrangements for the future, when several ladies and gentlemen kindly offered their help. From the expression of opinions, it may fairly be said that there was a felt need of a Unitarian chapel in the neighbourhood, and that a good field presents itself for future efforts.

LONDON.—The Unitarians at this place held a tea meeting on Good Friday, in their temporary meeting room, the minister, Rev. N. Green, in the chair. The secretary read the annual report, which showed an increase of members during the year. Speeches were delivered by Messrs. Brough and Sutherland.

MANCHESTER: WHITEFIELD-STREET.—The bazaar, got up for the purpose of raising the sum expended in purchasing the building at Ardwick which, for about two years, has been used as a Free Church and Sunday school, was yesterday opened by the Rev. Wm. Gaskell, in the Memorial Hall, with every prospect of success. We trust as many of our friends as are able will take the opportunity, to-day or to-morrow, during which the bazaar will continue open, to show their sympathy with a little faithful band of labourers in a good cause, and render them generous help.

SWINDON.—The North Wills Herald says that the Rev. F. R. Young intends to spend the forthcoming months of May and June in the United States of America, in the hope that a sea voyage, with rest and change of scene, may restore him to health.

WALMSLEY.—On Saturday evening last (April 11th), the Unitarian congregation of Walmsley partook of tea together in their chapel schoolroom, when 100 of its members joined in that friendly repast. After which Mr. Thomas Bromley, of Bolton, was voted to the chair. The spacious room became filled, and a pleasant evening was spent.

RELIGIOUS SERVICES FOR THE YOUNG.

To the Editors.—Last year you kindly admitted into the Herald some letters of mine to a Sunday-school teacher. In these I strongly urged that the chief work in the Sunday school should be moral and religious culture, and I endeavoured to show how such culture could be most effectually pursued. What I said then has again and again called forth the reply: "The principles you lay down, and the plan you recommend, seem plausible enough; but where are we to get the materials for carrying them out?" I answer: I confess the materials have been very difficult to find, and knowing this by experience, I have devoted the greater part of my leisure time for the last two years in endeavouring to supply the need as I best could.

There appeared to me four wants in Sunday-school teaching:

1. A course of lessons for the simple moral impression of the scholars.
2. Lessons and services for more particularly awakening the religious or devotional feelings.
3. A later course of lessons for the elder children on doctrinal subjects, showing wherein and why Unitarianism differs from the popular faith.
4. A course on the true nature and history of the Bible.

I have endeavoured to supply the first in the Sunday-school Penny Magazine. For the second, I this day publish "Religious Services for the Young," written on the plan suggested in my letters to a Sunday-school teacher. For the third, I now beg the kind use of your columns; and the fourth is already in an advanced state.

The following sketches are attempts to present the doctrines of the Trinity, Inspiration of Scriptures, Eternal Torment, &c., not as mere dead abstractions, but as living convictions in human souls, deeply affecting their whole being.—Yours faithfully,

T. E. POYNTING.

MANCHESTER DOMESTIC MISSIONS

—ROCHDALE ROAD CHAPEL.

In the late severe storms the wall of an adjoining manufactory, which had been left standing after a fire, was blown down, and in its fall destroyed the outbuildings, heating apparatus, &c., of the Rochdale Road Chapel.

The Committee are obliged to ask for help towards Rebuilding the premises destroyed; and as the Schools have for some time past been in Want of Proper Class Rooms, avail themselves of this opportunity of erecting them on the ground where the former offices stood, and where the needful accommodation can be obtained for about £100. The street which runs behind the Chapel has to be paved, and this will require an outlay of £20. Nearly £150, therefore, is needed, towards which it is intended to devote the £40 which was given so generously by the Strangeways Sewing School, and also £10 contributed by Mr. Berry, the owner of the adjoining manufactory. £100 will, therefore, have to be raised by voluntary gifts, and the Committee trust that the liberal donations of the supporters of the truly Christian work of the Missions will speedily provide the Funds required.

Subscriptions will be thankfully received by the treasurer, Mr. R. D. DARBISHIRE, B.A., 26, George-street; Rev. W. GASKELL; Rev. S. ROBINSON, St. Oswald's Grove, Rochdale Road; or Rev. S. ALFRED STEINTHAL, 107, Upper Brook-street.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

During the Holy Week, the crown of thorns, a nail, and a piece of the true Cross, were exhibited at the Church of Notre Dame, in Paris.

The Abbé Bauer, a converted Jew, chaplain of the Tuileries, in a recent sermon at the Madeleine, informed his fashionable audience that, in presence of the general depravation, he demanded the glorification of the Pontifical cause. "For that object," said he, "I ask, my brethren, all your money and all your blood." His preaching, it appears, has made one Privy Councillor turn monk.

We are glad to learn from Le Lien, that the ill treatment which the Liberal Christians of Paris have received at the hands of the orthodox has only served, as we hoped it would, to quicken their zeal. The Sunday after M. Athanase Coquerel had been authorised by the Minister of the Interior to preach, the hall which was taken for him was found too small to hold all who wished to hear him, though not less than eight hundred persons were present. M. Martin Paschoud preached the same day at the Oratoire, which was completely filled by an attentive and deeply interested congregation.

A magnificent Livre d'Heures (Prayer-book) is preparing, by command of the Empress, to be presented to the Prince Imperial on the occasion of his first communion. The volume consists of 125 pages, entirely done by hand, beautifully illuminated and enriched with designs and miniatures in the style of the fifteenth century. The Pope will also, it is understood, send a valuable token of his affection to his godson.

According to the Paris correspondent of the Guardian, Ritualism is growing in France as well as here, the Easter services having been more ornate than ever. The different parishes seemed to vie with each other in the decoration of their churches, and especially of the altar fitted up for the Adoration of the Cross. The curé of the Madeleine made a special appeal in writing, which was posted outside the church, to his numerous and wealthy flock, for "flowers and shrubs" to deck the altar; and, in consequence, it looked as if the adjoining market des fleurs, which is held outside, had been transported bodily into the interior of the building.

A most tempting advertisement of an advowson for sale appeared last week. The income is between £800 and £900 a year, the situation pleasant, plenty of good fishing in the neighbourhood, postman calls morning and evening, duties light, incumbent in his seventieth year, and "prospect of early possession;" how the incumbent likes that prospect is not stated.

The Friends in Manchester, who form the largest congregation of members of the society in Great Britain, have been a good deal exercised by a discussion which has lately been going on amongst them. It appears that several of their most influential members have, for some time, been publishing sentiments on religious questions, not very dissimilar from some of those propounded by Bishop Colenso, and in "Essays and Reviews"; such as denying the infallibility of the Scriptures, casting doubt on the Deity of Christ, and the orthodox view of the Atonement. In support of their opinions, they appeal to the writings of Barclay, George Fox, and other early Quakers, and like them, lay great stress on the "inward light." All the official ministers and elders are opposed to the new movement; but its adherents have become so numerous and powerful that special assistance has had to be invoked from the general body of Friends in Lancashire, and a deputation was appointed by them to support the ministers and elders of Manchester. But at "the meeting for discipline" just held, the adherents of the new school were strong enough to prevent any exercise of church authority adverse to them; and it is thought likely that an appeal for assistance will be made to the Yearly Meeting, in London, next month.

The Church seems determined to find work for the Privy Council and the lawyers. The Dean of Maritzburg, who has come to England to raise an endowment for a new Bishop of Natal, and the prosecution of the old one, directed his curate, Mr. Robinson, to act as Colonial Chaplain in his absence; but the Governor declines to accept the services of Mr. Robinson, and appoints another in his stead, and further sends home a petition from Bishop Colenso that the Dean may be deprived altogether of this Chaplaincy. The Duke of Buckingham, however, who belongs to the Dean's party, refuses either to grant the Bishop's petition or to confirm the Governor's appointment. The Supreme Court of Natal, too, having given Dr. Colenso possession of the Cathedral at Pietremaritzburg, and the land attached, which, in the first instance, was vested by deed of grant in the Bishop of Capetown, he has lodged an appeal to the Privy Council.—The Court of Queen's Bench, also, has granted a rule nisi, calling upon the Bishop of London to show cause why a mandamus should not issue, commanding him to proceed against Mr. Bennett, the High Church vicar of Frome, for certain heresies, especially as to the doctrine of the Real Presence, contained in two books, published within his lordship's diocese. If the Bishop is liable to be called upon to take proceedings in the case of every heresy published in London by clergymen throughout the kingdom, he is likely to have a hard time of it.

Dean Milman is said to be preparing a work on St. Paul's Cathedral, similar in character to Dr. Stanley's "Memorials of Westminster Abbey."

There was another Murphy riot at Stalybridge last week, when the mob attacked the Roman Catholic Chapel at Dukinfield, and did considerable damage. On Monday, one of the priests was charged before the magistrates with having fired at and wounded a spectator present at a disturbance, on the 8th instant, but the case was discharged.

The Scotsman informs us that, forgetting the counsel given long ago by one Paul about not letting any man judge another in meat and drink, the members of the Evangelical Union Church at Wishaw have resolved that no person who is not a total abstainer shall be admitted a member of their body, and that any present member who shall use "alcoholic liquors" not medicinally shall "for the time being" be cut off from their communion.

Mr. G. Appleton sends to the Leeds Mercury the following shameful case of clerical intolerance:

"A Mrs. Archer, of Lady Lane, Leeds, a friend of my family, was taken seriously ill about five weeks ago. She died on Sunday, the 12th instant. A week previous to her death she was attended to spiritually by a curate of the parish church, named Cargill. Mrs. Archer had not been baptised, and the curate on learning this not only refused to pray with the poor woman, but discontinued his visits. She then requested to be baptised, which was also refused, and the next day she died. The day following her death the curate again called, and informed the survivors that the Church Burial Service could not be read over her at the grave. On learning this, I went privately to the chaplain of the consecrated portion of the Burmantofts Cemetery, the Rev. Mr. Bickerdike, to remonstrate, but was very firmly told by the reverend gentleman 'that Christian burial was intended for Christian people.' On telling him that I should make his intolerance known to the public through the press, he replied, 'I shall be glad if you do; it is high time our principles were known.' The decision was faithfully carried out, and Mrs. Archer lies interred in one of the burial grounds of the Corporation without Christian burial."

To a deputation which waited upon the Duke of Marlborough, on Wednesday, to protest against Mr. Gladstone's Church Rates Bill, the second reading of which stood for last night, his Grace stated that, as the bill had been unopposed in the Commons, the Government could not oppose it in the Lords, and had, therefore, come to the conclusion that it should be referred to a Select Committee, and he hoped that amendments would be introduced that would make it more satisfactory.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

We have to express our sincere regret that, a fortnight ago, we gave circulation to a statement (taken from the English Independent) that the Vicar of Trumpington was distributing an absurd paper of questions and answers, headed "Crumbs of Comfort for True Protestants," of which a few were given. The Vicar writes to say that the statement is quite untrue, and requests us to publish his distinct and indignant contradiction of it which we are glad to do. He says:—

"The papers, of which you seem to have given a specimen, were distributed—at whose instigation I know not—after a meeting in the Town Hall, Cambridge, at which I had been lecturing on the Protestantism of the Church of England, which I strenuously upheld, amidst much enthusiasm from my audience. Three papers in all were distributed. They were evidently meant to throw ridicule upon my lecture; and so far from being due to me, were given in direct opposition to the cause which I had been defending."

The Jewish Chronicle observes that

"There seems to be a singular mistake as to the relation of Disraeli to Judaism. Some Jews censure him as an apostate, and urge his apostasy as an instance of tergiversation. Some Christians scoff at him as a Jew, with a singular disregard of all they owe to the Hebrew race. Now, the fact is that, in plain English, Disraeli is neither an apostate nor a Jew. He was born of Hebrew parents. His father, Isaac Disraeli, the author, and his mother, a scion of the Basevis, were members of Sephardim Jewish families. His grandfather and grandmother, indeed, rest in the Portuguese cemetery at Mile End. Benjamin Disraeli was admitted into the communion of Israel, but his father, thinking fit to quarrel with his synagogue, failed to teach his child Judaism. One day Rogers, the celebrated banker poet, happening to visit at Isaac Disraeli's house at Hackney, when Benjamin was about five or six years old, and regretting to find so intelligent a youth without religious instruction, took him to Hackney Church. From this event dates his absolute and complete severance from the Jewish communion. He became a Christian, and a great genius was lost to us."

The Chronicle does not throw any light on the important point, which has been a good deal mooted since his elevation, whether the Premier was ever baptised; we are inclined to think not.

At a meeting of the Manchester branch of the Liberation Society, the Rev. C. Nevile, who, from adopting its principles had given up two family livings of the value of £700 a year, said that when he was at college he studied the Thirty-nine Articles and was not satisfied with them, and he found that there were, on the highest authority, 686 theological propositions contained in them. It could not be expected that a young man of 22 could grapple with such a number of propositions. He found that he was commanded also to study the Scriptures, in order that he might instruct his people out of it, but if he bound himself upon every question by signing the Articles, what was the use of studying the Scriptures in order to find out what the truth might be? If he found it out, and it was contrary to the Articles, he could not make use of it. He applied to his parish clergyman, who told him he was very presumptuous to set up his opinion against the opinions which had been held by dignitaries of the Church of England for 300 years, and added that if he did not then agree with the Articles, there was no doubt he would entirely agree with them in five or ten years. He spoke to another friend, not a clergyman, who reproved him for his evident wish to throw away a good position and income; and eventually, with a sinking heart and unwilling hand, he subscribed to the Articles and took the livings; but he was never happy until, many years afterwards, he gave them up.

In a letter to the Guardian, the Rev. W. H. Lyttelton, rector of Hagley, writing on the worth of tests, says:

"What I wished in my letter to urge was, not that we have no reason to fear the miasmata of false philosophies and religions for our young men, but that to build a wall of tests to keep them out was really to help the enemy by erecting entirely delusive defences against him, or putting to sleep our only competent sentries, besides that we bribe our enemies to put on the garb of friends, and so perhaps to deceive themselves as well as others. Do not such artificial defences do very deep mischief by concealing from us the real state of men's minds, and preventing them from speaking out fully the thoughts that are in them? It is often said that it is characteristic of our time that men are learning much more clearly than of old to know what it is that they really believe; to range themselves under their true standards, and to be conscious on whose side are their real sympathies. If so, surely this is a very desirable state of things. Bribes do not alter men's belief, but only their professions."

In an article on the Old Gravel-pit Meeting-house, Hackney, in the Christian World, "The Rambler" says, "he (Dr. Price) was succeeded by the late Joseph Priestley, who began his religious career by being an ultra-Calvinist, subsequently became a Unitarian, then a Materialist and Universalist, and closed his life in a state of almost infidelity." How long, we wonder, is this unchristianising of the excellent of the earth for a simple difference of opinion to be tolerated?

The Rev. T. W. Fowle, of the Holy Trinity, Hoxton, makes an indignant protest, in the Guardian, against the fresh services which are being introduced even into "moderate" churches. As instances, he mentions two of the most popular. One is metrical, "The Litany of the Passion," and its character may be judged of from two verses of its doggerel:

"By Thy drops of painful sweat,
Wherein Blood and Water met,
Till the earth around was wet—
By the folly of the Jews
When Barabbas they would choose,
And would Christ their King refuse."

The other is the "Reproaches," which, with an approach to the "Miracle" plays of the middle ages, represents our Saviour as reproaching the Jews by the memory of all that He did for them in the days of old, such as having "brought them out of the land of Egypt," and contrasting their treatment of him; the congregation in their turn personifying the Jews and deprecating the Saviour's vengeance for the personal wrong thus offered to him. Nothing could well be in worse taste or worse feeling.

We can hardly imagine that Mr. Disraeli's absurd figment of a conspiracy between the Ritualists and the Irish Roman Catholics really imposes upon any one, but there is a good deal of party make-believe going on. Thus the Globe, officially, no doubt, declares that the plot threatens us with a "relapse into barbarianism," and that "the Norman conquest, Magna Charta, the civil war, the advent of William III. (an odd concatenation, surely) were really of far minor moment." And plain prose not being equal to the occasion, another writer sounds an alarm in the following soul-animating strain:

"Think of the proud Armada,
Our Howards and our Drakes!
Old England's wrath is dreadful still
When she in might awakes!
Stand up, then, Englishmen, and fight
With Disraeli, for our right!"

These things call to mind, not quite pleasantly, what the author of "Coningsby" wrote, some three-and-twenty years back:

"I am all for a religious cry. It means nothing, and, if successful, does not interfere with business when we are in."

At an Archidiaconal meeting, last week, the Bishop of Peterborough, after some weak alarms about the danger to the State which would arise from disestablishing the Church, drew a distinction which, we confess, is too fine for us to appreciate. He said "he for one should regret the time when this ceased to be a Christian country, and became only a country with Christians in it." To our apprehension, the latter is what it is now.

In the Wesleyan Methodist Magazine for this month there is an article by Dr. Osborn, on the proposed union of his co-religionists with the Church of England, in which he points out the preliminary difficulties arising from the purely clerical composition of Convocation, its want of powers, and the necessity of a parliamentary sanction, and then shows that the union must either set aside or preserve the existing Methodist discipline and doctrines. Upon this view of the case he comes to the conclusion that, in every point, these proposals for union are impracticable, ill-considered, and inexpedient, and recommends those who make them to devote all their efforts to redeeming the Protestant character of their own Church.

In a meeting at Buckingham, on Saturday last, the Bishop of Oxford took his stand boldly on "no surrender" principles in regard to the abolition of tests at the Universities. The Pall Mall subjects his speech to its keen criticism, and shows the utter worthlessness of his arguments. In reply to his assertion that up to this time these places have been "distinctly connected with that form of Christianity which the nation has received and professes," our contemporary remarks that this is a very convenient but not an accurate way of telling the story, and adds:

"Whilst he was about it the Bishop might and ought to have observed that nearly every college, both at Oxford and Cambridge, was founded in connection with the Roman Catholic creed, and in many instances expressly for the purpose of securing spiritual benefits for the souls of the founders. Surely the fact that when the nation saw fit to change its views all this was violently altered by law, is the strongest precedent which could be cited to show that both the Universities and the Colleges ought to be treated as emphatically national institutions, and that the religious teaching given in them ought to correspond as closely as possible with the existing religious state of the nation. Is that the case when their government and their prizes are confined to the adherents of a creed which does not embrace much more than half the nation?"

The answer which the Bishop gives to the question why, if Christianity be true, there is so much fear of leaving it to take care of itself is, that "the problem to be solved is not to create critical discernment among men already trained, but to train on a fixed system men not already trained;" and he asks, "Is it possible to attempt this unless you have some fixed system on which to train them?" Upon which the Pall Mall remarks:

"It is difficult to decide where to begin in exposing the nonsense which it would thus appear is capable of imposing upon a Bishop of the Church of England. We had supposed that the Bishop belonged to that party which is always insisting on the distinction between education and instruction, which is continually telling us of the vast importance of forming the mind, and of the extreme unimportance of merely imparting information; yet his notion of religious education is mere cramming. The metaphor by which he describes the process is that of pouring a liquid into a bottle. He repudiates the notion of 'creating critical discernment' in the pupil, and, twist it how you will, critical discernment is not really distinguishable from intelligent interest. He insists above all things on the necessity of a fixed system. The problem is to pour so many gallons of Wilberforce's patent Oxford mixture, warranted genuine, marked with the Government stamp, free from the corruptions of Rome on the one hand and those of infidelity on the other, straight down the necks of a set of wide-mouthed young bottles, which are simply to drink and pay without any sort of attempt at assimilation; and how, as he judiciously observes, can you do this without a fixed system, in fact without a monopoly? Probably you cannot, but, convenient as such a process may be to the vendor of patent medicines, those who are to buy them for their children may take a different view of its advantages. Surely the only condition upon which one intelligent creature can teach anything whatsoever to another is that of appealing to his reason. . . . The Bishop would not only teach the Christian religion to young men of twenty as a sailor teaches a parrot to swear, but he considers it rather impious to suppose that it can or ought to be taught in any other way. He treats theology like a bolus. Hold your nose and shut your eyes; bolt it whole; the more you look at it the less you'll like it. This is perfectly intelligible, but not particularly respectful. It is the fixed system on which nurses administer medicine to refractory infants. It irresistibly suggests the reflection that when medicine is taken in this manner a stomach of any sensibility is apt to find a certain degree of difficulty in keeping it down."

In our last "American Notes" we mentioned a singular dispute respecting the influence which dress might have on the efficacy of adult baptism; one equally curious has been going on in the Church Times. "A London Priest" stated that he had submitted the wafers used in Roman Catholic churches to the analysis of three separate chemists, who all declared that they are not bread, because some of the constituents of bread have disappeared in the process of manufacture. Hence, according to the eminent canonists Merati and Gavanti, the Eucharist celebrated with them would be invalid, and therefore it is doubtful whether any Roman Catholic layman in England ever sacramentally communicates at all. Father Lockhart responded in great indignation, insisting that the wafers were simply unleavened bread, and that the revelations of the "London Priest" were dictated by sheer spite and alarm at recent conversions. The "London Priest" rejoined by insisting once more on the bona fides of his analysis, and stating that for ten years he had by preference used Roman wafers himself; and that even after doubts had been suggested to him of their propriety he had relied upon the minute care of the Roman Church in such matters, thinking it most improbable that such defect existed; but the report of the chemists was decisive.

The Freeman having some time ago said, "the author of 'Ecce Homo' deserves our gratitude for what strikes us as a most sincere attempt to search below conventionalism for the treasure which it is so apt to conceal," the Rev. John Aldis, who cannot tolerate that work, writes to our excellent contemporary thus:

"I venture humbly but earnestly to ask where and what is this conventional theology? In which of our pulpits is it proclaimed? or in which of our colleges is it taught? Fidelity to truth and compassion to souls require you to be explicit and copious. Such fidelity may be painful to you, but it ought to be profitable to others. Till then, and speaking for myself, I can see in that which you recommend to us nothing but the old Unitarianism robed, blooming, musical with evangelic terms, and decorated with some blossoms of tradition attempting a compromise betwixt Christianity and modern rationalism."

OLD TESTAMENT CHAPTERS FOR THE SUNDAY SCHOOL.—I.

SUBJECT: "The earnestness of the Hebrews to teach the knowledge of the Unity of God."

Read Deut. chap. vi., 4—25, and point out that other gods were worshipped by the nations around, but the love and the service of the Israelites was to be given to Jehovah alone, and the great precept that they were to keep themselves for Him, was to be diligently impressed upon them and upon their children. Verse 4, with which this passage begins, is called by the Jews the Shemang, from the first Hebrew word it contains. It is the celebrated sentence that they are even now in the habit of repeating three times a day with their prayers, "Hear, O Israel, Jehovah our God is one Jehovah."

Read also on this subject Zech. chap. xiv., 1—11, one of the many descriptions given by the prophets of the expected day of Jehovah. Point out that among the other blessings of peace and happiness here looked forward to, is the more universal acknowledgment of one God. It is to be a time, the writer declares, when "Jehovah shall be King over all the earth. In that day shall there be one Jehovah, and His name One."

REVIEW.

The Deity of Christ a Doctrine of Divine Revelation.
By Silas Henn.

MR. HENN is, we believe, a very worthy watch-maker; in his own estimation he must be a great critic and theologian as well. Nothing else, and hardly that, could authorise him to speak as he does of a faith which he knows to have been that of Newton, and Milton, and many others not less noble-minded, true-hearted, and sincere. Of the belief in which they, after study perhaps as profound and searchings as patient and conscientious as his own, were brought to rest, he feels him warranted, among other things, in decisively saying, "it is a human fable;" "it is absurd in the highest degree;" "away, then, with the false and blasphemous notion."

In reality, this pamphlet is only another illustration of the way in which the spirit of orthodoxy often leads shallow ignorance to assume the tone of infallible knowledge; and it would be utterly unworthy of even a passing notice were it not a specimen of the kind of reading which still finds currency in certain religious circles, and receives praise from certain religious journals. To go through its poor attempts at argument, and show how little the writer really knows of his subject, would be a sheer waste of time; one or two examples of his manner of dealing with it will suffice.

Our Lord, we know, calls himself "a man," and so do his apostles too. But if he was nothing more, Mr. Henn contends, with wearisome iteration, they ought to have told us this. "The Scriptures," he says, "nowhere affirm that Christ was only a man; they never make use of any such term; and if such was the belief of the apostles, we have a right to ask, Why did they not plainly state their belief?" That is to say, they ought to have guarded against the possibility of any false doctrine arising from the fancies of men by meeting it beforehand; they should not have been content with speaking of Christ as a human being, but at the same time should have said "he is not the Divine Being"—which no one then, we venture to think, ever suspected him to be. Surely, even Mr. Henn might see with how much greater reason his question might be put, if the apostles believed their Master to be God, "Why did they not plainly state their belief?" That he was a man needed no proof, that he was God required every proof.

Trying to force a proof of the Deity of Christ out of his declaration, "Destroy this temple, and I will raise it up in three days," Mr. Henn kindly informs us, "it is plain his divine nature must have raised up his human nature," but we wish he had at the same time told us what we are to understand by a nature raising up a nature. We confess, too, we are somewhat at a loss to know what is meant when he says, "Christ was in heaven in his divine nature, and on earth in his human;" and, in our blindness, it does seem to us "an argument against his Omniscience" that "there were many things which, as man, he was ignorant of," unless we are to believe that the same Person can know and not know a thing at the same time.

We are told, "while our Lord was on earth he frequently received worship, which, if he were not God, he ought not to have received." Of course, when the man, in the Marriage Service of the Church, says to the woman, "with my body I thee worship," Mr. Henn would maintain that he could never possibly do this unless he believed her to be divine.

Whatever else Mr. Henn may be deficient in, he certainly is not wanting in boldness. Many eminent Trinitarian theologians have taxed their ingenuity to discover reasons why such reserve should have been maintained in the New Testament respecting the great doctrine on which their system was based; but, according to Mr. Henn, they need not have troubled themselves at all in the matter, and their sight could not have been of the clearest, for, as he assures us, "The sacred writers frequently speak of Christ as God, and ascribe things to him which are utterly false on any other principle."

We need, however, proceed no further. We do not wonder, after reading his pamphlet, and seeing what ignorance of the subject and what little power of reasoning it displays, that the author, who for a time slipped into Unitarianism, should have slipped back again so easily into his old Trinitarianism; and we are also led to see the need which there still is of some short work, giving in a plain and popular manner explanations of the leading passages of Scripture on which men like Mr. Henn rely for proof of their system, and so grievously wrest from their true meaning, and we should be glad if some one, with the requisite knowledge and ability, would supply the want.

THE WANDERER—V.

THE meeting held in St. James's Hall, London, on the 16th inst., in support of Mr. Gladstone's resolutions on the Irish Church, was densely crowded. I entered some twenty minutes before the chair was taken, but only succeeded in getting a seat under the gallery at the back of the room. In a few minutes more all seats were taken, and many new-comers had to go away disappointed. Earl Russell was loudly cheered on taking the chair, but his speech was almost entirely inaudible where I was sitting. I caught, however, his allusion to his own proposal of dividing the endowments amongst all sects—which was met on the part of the audience by loud cries of "Disendowment." Occasional calls were made to him to "Speak up," but they appeared to come from one or two small parties of Conservatives, whose plan throughout the evening seemed to be to manifest their presence, not so much by hisses or disapprobation, as by endeavours to divert the attention of the audience from the speakers by loud talking, laughing, or disputing with those around them. Some one suggested that they were the bellringers from the neighbouring churches, sent there by their clerical employers, and the joke was repeated whenever they renewed their interruptions. A good deal of verbal "sparring" took place between them and the majority: one cried out, "I hope Englishmen will never cease to be religious," to which a man near me replied, "And I hope Englishmen will never be religious merely because the State makes them so."

On the Hon. Auberon Herbert being introduced to the meeting, a voice was heard to exclaim, "Ah! he's one of 'the upper ten.'" His speech was the most eloquent one of the evening, and much more audible than the chairman's. The finest passage in it was the lesson that "when God placed us all here with all our differences of opinion side by side, He meant us to live in peace and love in spite of those differences, and learn that though they seemed so great to us, they were in His sight very small indeed."

Mr. Mason Jones, who of all the speakers seemed most at home on the platform, met with most opposition from the dissentients—probably he was thought to be the most dangerous of their foes. After expressing his belief that the English Church did not stand (as was commonly asserted) on the same basis with the Irish one, but ought rather, when she heard the Conservatives employing this argument, to cry, "Save me from my friends!" he went on, "But if that be so, and the one is as indefensible as the other, I can only say—Then let them fall together!" This sentiment was received with the greatest applause; the audience, indeed, seemed on every occasion to manifest sympathy with the Voluntary principle in its fullness. Mr. Jones eulogised the American people, in whose constitution there was not, he said, one word about religion from beginning to end, and yet among whom there was as much piety and morality as in England.—Here a voice called out "How about Johnson?"—thought the connection between the President's misfortunes and the non-existence of a State Church in America does not appear very evident. Another fervid gentleman on my left limited himself to exclaiming at intervals "Traitor!" to which a congenial soul on my right responded, "At any rate, he's not a Christian!" What they were thinking about I cannot tell. Perhaps they could not.

Mr. Miall pointed out that the Irish Anglicans would lose nothing by disestablishment: "Their Bible would still remain; their Prayer-book would still remain" (an Hibernian voice: "Ah, thin! shure we don't keer about it at all!"); "their organisation would still remain; their task of supporting the doctrines of the Reformation would still remain—and would perhaps be done all the better when they did it at their own expense."

After him Sir Saml. Hoare spoke with considerable power and fluency, and from his clear and resonant voice was best heard of all the speakers. His speech, however, was rather a party attack on Mr. Disraeli than a discussion of the question of the evening. His denunciations of the Premier's appeal to the evil passions of the bigots were met by cries of "Durham Letter! Durham Letter!"—an allusion to the past follies of the noble chairman, which seemed to cut his adherents keenly.

Earl Russell's voice being, as I have said, not audible by all the audience, he deputed the task of announcing the speakers to one of his colleagues. When Mr. O'Beirne stood up, looking rather "unaccustomed to public speaking," there were very loud and general cries of "Name? name?" which he apparently took for applause at his appearance, and bowed his thanks. His repetition of the formal "My lord, ladies, and gentlemen," raised another laugh; and his "Though I am an Irishman, I glory in being an Englishman," provoked still louder mirth, mingled, however, with applause. Of this he dexterously availed himself, saying, "Ah! I'm never ashamed of making an Irish bull, so long as it's met with an English cheer."

He was followed by Sir Patrick O'Brien, who spoke with a clearness and energy that would have been more effective if he had taken his hands out of his pockets. He announced himself as an Irish Catholic, and in the name of his co-believers disclaimed any sectarian aims in the disestablishment of the Irish Church, or any wish to crusade against his Protestant fellow-countrymen—whom, by a slip of the tongue, he first of all called his "fellow-Protestants." He trusted we might soon arrive at a peaceful ignorance of sectarian differences, such as he had seen in France, where a man's faith was unknown to any of his neighbours except those who might chance to meet him entering his church on the Sunday.

Mr. Vernon Harcourt—whom many of the audience fully believed to be Professor Fawcett—followed, but was yet more inaudible than Earl Russell; and many of the audience left the hall during his speech.

CYRIL.

ARCHDEACON DENISON.

As I was staying for a few days in the neighbourhood of East Brent, I gladly availed myself, on Good Friday, of an opportunity of hearing this eminent Churchman, whose name has been so prominently before the public in reference to nearly all the ecclesiastical questions of the time. The Archdeacon's family is, as no doubt your readers are aware, connected by marriage with that of Lord Derby; and of his brothers, one (Sir Wm. Denison) holds a high position in India, one (Sir Geo. Denison) is the chief commissioner of rivers, and one is the Speaker of the present House of Commons.

The church is charmingly situated, on a gentle slope at the foot of Brent Knoll, a lofty hill, which springing abruptly from the fertile Somersetshire moorland, overlooks Bridgewater, Burnham, Weston-super-Mare, and the Bristol Channel. The churchyard is a model of neatness and beauty. Flowers blooming and about to bloom abound. The church also is remarkable for several handsome stained windows, a richly-decorated chancel, and a general effect of care and good taste.

The service was attended by some eighty persons, including thirty children. About one-fourth of the adults appeared to belong to the labouring class, and the others were probably farmers and the tradespeople and residents of the village. There was, on the whole, an absence of any pretence to gentility or refinement in the congregation, which, however, seemed to attend devoutly to the prayers and exercises. The seats in the centre of the church are free to all comers, whilst those adjoining the walls are reserved for the parishioners. Thus the free-seat system and the allotment system are combined, and an excellent place is retained for the poor and for strangers. The old-fashioned central benches are, however, very uncomfortable; narrow, uncushioned, and having a projecting ledge which excoiates the back of the worshipper, they seem designed to prevent drowsiness.

The ven. Archdeacon is tall, and about fifty-five years of age. He is a hale, vigorous man, of commanding appearance, with a thoughtful countenance, handsome, regular features, and a lofty forehead, scantily crowned with light brown hair, the colour of which seems fading into gray. There is, however, a coldness and want of sympathy in the eyes, and a severity of expression about the mouth which prevent his appearance from being prepossessing. The effect is rather that of an aristocratic, or perhaps ecclesiastic hautueur, which is heightened by a strong nasal twang which marks his utterance, and renders his reading peculiarly unpleasant to a stranger.

The service was conducted in the manner peculiar to High Churches of moderate ceremonial; much of it was intoned by the Archdeacon (who was assisted by an excellent choir), the Psalms and Athanasian Creed were sung, and the remainder said in the nasal twang already referred to. It was, however, to me very tedious and monotonous, and of inordinate length. It occupied an hour and a half to the commencement of the sermon, and, including further prayer and benediction, was quite two hours long. The text was, "Behold and see if there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow," Jer. i. 13. The preacher referred to the destruction of Jerusalem, and then to the sufferings of Christ, who, he said, from his double nature of God and man, must have suffered infinitely more than we can imagine; and proceeded to call upon his hearers to observe the day with a due sense of their own sinfulness. He went on to inquire why the day was so largely kept as a holiday, which was, he considered, most disgraceful in a Christian land. He said the true and only answer was, that the majority of Christians had no proper sense of their own sinfulness and guilt before God. Men were born in sin and were so sinful that none of them could bear the weight of their own sin, much less could they bear the weight of another's. How great and how incomprehensible to us the purity of Christ, who was without sin and who bore on the cross the weight of the sins of all mankind, both those who lived before and those who live after his coming, and who seek him with sincere repentance. He concluded a gloomy discourse of about twenty minutes, delivered with much force and power, by a solemn injunction to observe the day reverently, and to discourage its desecration by others.

It struck me that the Saviour's boundless love and the glorious message he was sent to announce, the truth he came to bear witness to, and sealed with his precious blood, of the Father's infinite love and pity for His human children, was little felt, as it was little urged by the preacher, of whose earnestness and sincerity, however, I entertain no doubt.

AMERICAN NOTES.

The case of the Rev. Stephen Tyng, of New York, which we referred to a short time since, is to be brought before the next general assembly of the Church. It is exciting a good deal of interest throughout the Episcopalian body, and seems likely to lead to greater "liberty of prophesying" among its ministers. At a meeting where fifty of them were present, a resolution of sympathy with Mr. Tyng was passed, and the tone of several of them was clear and defiant. Dr. J. C. Smith declared, that "if he were called upon in God's providence to preach the Gospel he would do it under any and all circumstances. They of the Episcopal Church had not enjoyed more of God's blessing because of their exclusiveness," and Dr. Dyer said he "would take a great many more such 'admonitions' as they had listened to before he would be ashamed to preach the Gospel." Though the public reprimand administered by Bishop Potter to Mr. Tyng was for having violated the canon which forbids a clergyman to officiate in the parish of another clergyman without his permission, the real issue is whether he shall be allowed to preach in the "meeting-houses" of other denominations.

The design of building an international church in London as a memorial of President Lincoln has been brought forward at a public meeting in New York, and liberal Christians were invited to contribute towards it. This they were quite ready to do, if, as the English agents were willing to grant, they were allowed the same privileges in the new church as were accorded to other Christian bodies; but the American managers would not agree to this, and decided that the enterprise should be restricted entirely to the "Evangelical" sects. Like our able contemporary, the Liberal Christian, we fail to see how a church can be called "international" which shuts out all the Liberal Christian bodies of one of the nations represented in it, or with what propriety such a church can be a memorial of Mr. Lincoln, who scorned all dogmatic tests and exclusiveness, and said he would have inscribed on the walls of a church, as the only condition of membership, the two great Christian commandments. "Will our 'Evangelical' brethren, who have done their utmost to stretch their very elastic lines around Mr. Lincoln, who, they know, was essentially a Unitarian, put his chosen words over the pulpit?"

In her new book, "The Men of our Times," Mrs. Beecher Stowe relates some incidents of her brother Henry's boyhood, of which we may give one. When eleven years old, he was placed in his sister's school, where the rest of the pupils were girls. The school was divided into two divisions in grammar, each with a leader at its head, and at the examinations, when there was a contest for superiority, it was important that each member of the division should be up to the mark. This, however, was not the case with Henry, who, in such reviews, was accounted more amusing than profitable. On one occasion, the leader of the division to which he belonged, concerned for the honour of her class, undertook to give him some private instruction in grammatical definitions and distinctions, and this was the result:

"Now Henry, A is the indefinite article, you see—and must be used only with the singular number. You can say a man—but you can't say a men, can you?" "Yes, I can say Amen too," was the ready rejoinder. "Father says it always at the end of his prayers."

"Come, Henry, now don't be joking; decline He." "Nominative he, possessive his, objective him." "You see, his is possessive. Now you can say his book—but you can't say him book." "Yes, I do say hymn book, too," said the impracticable scholar, with a quizzical twinkle. Each one of these sallies made his young teacher laugh, which was the victory he wanted.

"But now, Henry, seriously, just attend to the active and passive voice. Now I 'strike' is active, you see, because if you strike you do something. But 'I am struck' is passive, because if you are struck you don't do anything, do you?"

"Yes, I do—I strike back again!"

Sometimes his views of philosophical subjects were offered gratuitously. Being held rather of a frisky nature, his sister appointed his seat at her elbow, when she heard her classes. A class in natural philosophy not very well prepared was stumbling through the theory of the tides. "I can explain that," said Henry. "Well, you see, the sun catches hold of the moon and pulls her, and she catches hold of the sea and pulls that, and this makes the spring tides."

"But what makes the neap tides?"

"O, that's when the sun stops to spit on his hands," was the brisk rejoinder.

After about six months, Henry was returned on his parents' hands with the reputation of being an inveterate joker and an indifferent scholar. It was the opinion of his class that there was much talent lying about loosely in him if he could only be brought to apply himself.

An article in the Atlantic Monthly, on the Roman Catholics of America, states that their Church has accumulated an enormous property. It has for many years carefully anticipated the progress of population westward, and by small investments in land at points along the probable directions of future railways, has become very wealthy. A professor in one of the Western colleges saw two years ago at Rome a better map of the country west of the Mississippi than he ever saw at home, upon which the line of the Pacific Railway was traced, and every spot was dotted where a settlement would naturally gather, and a conjecture recorded as to its probable importance.

According to the New York Independent, conversion must be going on at a much more rapid rate across the Atlantic than it is here. The Independent has counted up the number of converts recorded by Methodist preachers in a single week, and finds them to be 8,201; among the United Brethren, 2,000; among the Presbyterians over 1,000; and nearly the same number among the Congregationalists, Baptists, and Lutherans.

We understand that Professor Noyes, whose translations of the Prophets and other books of the Old Testament must be favourably known to many of our readers, expects to go to press, in the course of the summer, with his version of the New Testament, on which he has been for a long time engaged.

We take the following estimate of Liberalism in theology from a sermon by the Rev. J. L. Corning, a liberal orthodox minister:—

"That great manifold sect which goes under the general name of Liberalism is a reaction of intellect against blind superstition in religion. It has had its representatives in all ages. It had its Origin in the third century and its Abolition in the tenth, its Lessing in the eighteenth, and I know not how many thousands of apostles in every civilised nation in this nineteenth. Who shall say that it is a superfluous and abnormal development of history? Who shall say that religion needed not some sort of disenthralment which reason alone could give? Who shall dare to affirm that faith requires not to be ridden of some artificial impediments by the help of the critical faculty? Liberalism has to-day the most scholarly literature of the world doing its work of emancipation. It has subsidised all the sciences to its noble mission. I like it for its bold scrutiny of tradition. I like it for its manly contempt of usage. I respect it for its profound and patient research. I revere, beyond the power of words to express, the great names, both in the Church and out of it, which it has given to history: Robertson and Young and Bushnell, Buckle and Martineau, Channing and Parker and Miss Cobbe, Schenkel and Lecky, besides a great host of lights hardly less brilliant. But I do not love Liberalism as a perfect system, for it is very far from being such. It is human, just like all the other isms that I have named. It is too deficient in the culture of the spiritual instinct, as many of its best minds are ready to acknowledge. It has lived so much in the realm of intellect as to have become somewhat coldly philosophic. It has not quite so many saints as could be desired. Yet this fact is not proof that its religious postulates are not adequate to the problem of saintliness. They are fully adequate to it; for if Robertson, Channing, and Parker were not saints, I know not where to look for them."

SECULAR OR SOCIAL MORALS.

OUR satisfaction at the present widely-awakened interest in popular education is dashed by a feeling of sadness because of fear. We are afraid that, though we may soon obtain more general education, it will not be real and efficient education, or effect the results which are expected from it. More than fifty years society has been occupied in learning the lesson that the education of the people was needed; more than fifty years more may possibly be spent in learning what true education is. Another generation, at least, may grow up while we are casting about in blind and abortive efforts; and at last we shall awake to the discovery that what we have been giving as education has not answered our expectations, nay, has woefully disappointed them. For, we take it, we all hope by the education of the people to make GOOD CITIZENS of them. This is surely what we mean, if we mean anything, when we say that the schoolmaster will supersede the policeman, and the school the gaol. Now to form good citizens we must educate not only the intellect but the conscience. We must train children not only to be intelligent, but to be truthful, just, kind, pure, temperate, unselfish, loving—all that is good and noble. We believe the aim of education, which society in general has in mind, is that of forming good citizens—that is, citizens whose existence will, on the one hand, not be a detriment, and, on the other, will be a benefit to the community—who will not commit mischief against themselves or others through blind ignorance or vicious inclinations and habits—but who, on the contrary, will serve themselves and others through their intelligence and developed mental faculties, through their moral dispositions and habits. We think an ever-increasing public opinion would declare that if the State, by the education which it intends to give, can turn out such citizens as we have described, it will give a real and effective education—the very education which it ought to give.

We know that many among the sects will not be satisfied with this. They will say that the education which makes only good citizens in this world by no means fulfils their idea of education. They will insist that education must fit men for the life to come still more than for the life that now is. Probably Unitarians alone would admit that this world, being a school to prepare us for the future world, whatever fits us to live as we ought to live—to discharge our duties—to fulfil our relations here—fits us also for the life hereafter. But we must not expect that the other sects will agree with this. They will admit that men may be formed to be good, useful, estimable, even loveable citizens on earth, and yet not have the saving faith that shall give them an entrance into the happiness of heaven. We reply—If this be so, then it is evident that there are two branches of education, social, usually called secular, whose aim is to form good citizens for this life, and celestial, whose aim is to form citizens for the life to come. Now the first belongs to the State, and in it the department of social morals quite as much as any other branch of education. The second cannot be undertaken by the State without both imposture and injustice. The State has no infallible judgment to decide which of all the sects has the real saving faith; and it is itself composed of men of various sects. The celestial education, then, must be left to voluntary and denominational zeal; but the social education—especially as to social morals—must not be so left. And here is our fear, that it will be so left, that the State will take the sects at their word, and because they say, "We will take care of morals whilst we are taking care of instruction in our religious tenets," will leave the moral education to them, and confine itself to intellectual education. It will be a fatal mistake. The sects have not given, and will not give, moral education. They hardly, indeed, conceive of it as separate from their dogmas. If moral education is left to them, it will be practically left out of education altogether, and a generation or two hence society may wake up to find that it has been all along giving an education that has unchained the most potent energies within itself, and has been providing nothing to control them; it has been kindling a fire and evolving a huge volume of mighty steam in the social boiler, and has placed no safety valve to regulate its escape, and it is in danger of being exploded to atoms. The State must put the department of social morals under the secular teacher, as much as the departments of arithmetic and grammar—must see to the education of the conscience, as well as the education of the intellect.

MANCHESTER: WHITEFIELD-STREET BAZAAR.—The bazaar for the purchase of the premises in Whitefield-street, Ardwick, was brought to a close on Saturday evening last—the sum of £200 having been realised during the three days. Mr. Hays, on behalf of the congregation, made a few remarks by way of closing the bazaar, thanking all who had kindly rendered them any assistance.

MANCHESTER SUNDAY-SCHOOL UNION.—On Tuesday evening, the annual meeting of this union was held in the Memorial Hall. There were about fifty present, and the Rev. James Drummond, B.A., presided. The report was read by the secretary, Mr. B. Rigby Davis, and officers for the ensuing year were elected, after which Mr. George Smith introduced the subject—"The objects of the Sunday-school Union, and the best means of attaining them." A discussion followed, in which the chairman, the Revs. Brooke Herford and J. Harrop, and Messrs. J. E. Benson, Jesse Pilcher, J. Reynolds, and F. Ashton took part. A healthy and kindly tone characterised the discussion, and a desire that the union should be made the most of as an auxiliary to Sunday-school teachers.

FIRESIDE READINGS.

LITTLE PAT AND THE PARSON.

He stands at the door of the church peeping in,
No troublesome beadle is near him;
The preacher is talking of sinners and sin,
And little Pat trembles to hear him;

A poor little fellow, alone and forlorn,
Who never knew parent or duty,
His head is uncover'd, his jacket is torn,
And hunger has wither'd his beauty.

The white-headed gentleman shut in the box
Seems growing more angry each minute;
He doubles his fist and the cushion he knocks,
As if anxious to know what is in it.

He scolds at the people who sit in the pews—
Pat takes them for kings and princesses;
(With his little bare feet—he delights in their shoes:
In his rags he feels proud of their dresses!)

The parson exhorts them to think of their need,
To turn from the world's dissipation,
The naked to clothe, and the hungry to feed,—
Pat listens with strong approbation!

And when the old clergyman walks down the aisle,
Pat runs up to meet him right gladly,
"Shure, give me my dinner!" says he with a smile,
"And a jacket, I want them quite badly."

The kings and princesses indignantly stare,
The beadle gets word of the danger,
And, shaking his silver-tipp'd stick in the air,
Looks knives at the poor little stranger.

But Pat's not afraid, he is sparkling with joy,
And cries—who so willing to cry it?
"You'll give me my dinner—I'm such a poor boy:
You said so—now don't you deny it."

The pompous old beadle may grumble and glare,
And growl about robbers and arson;
But the boy who has faith in the sermon stands there,
And smiles at the white-headed parson!

The kings and princesses may wonder and frown,
And whisper he wants better teaching;
But the white-headed parson looks tenderly down
On the boy who has faith in his preaching.

He takes him away without question or blame,
As eager as Patsy to press on,
For he thinks a good dinner (and Pat thinks the same)
Is the moral that lies in the lesson.

And after long years, when Pat, handsomely drest—
A smart footman—is asked to determine
Of all earthly things what's the thing he liked best?
He says, "Och! shure, the master's ould sermin!"

Poems for a Child, by Two Friends.

THE WINDOW THAT MADE FACES UGLY.

PART I.

"O, DEAR mother, I am so weary, so weary. I cannot help but keep looking up to that window with bull's eyes in the middle of the squares, and watching the people go by, trying to make out who they are. And I cannot make them out at all. The bull's eyes make them look so queer and so ugly. Sometimes they make three or four faces out of one, and oh, so many eyes and noses, and mouths as big as elephants' mouths. And then sometimes there seem a dozen hands and arms. And then there are faces for a moment as big as cart wheels, with eyes on the forehead, and mouth at the bottom of the chin. O, mother, it does so bother and tire me. That window seems to haunt me."

Little Harry, who said this, was the son of a clergyman in the little village of Sutton, and about twelve years old. He was a thoughtful boy, and had made good progress in his studies, under his father's care. But lately he had been growing very poorly. He complained of being always tired. At last he was obliged to give up his studies, and lie on his couch almost all day long. His father brought him down in his arms in the morning, and laid him in a little sitting-room, away from the noise of the nursery, and where his mother often came to sit with him and sew. This room had one of those old-fashioned windows made, to prevent people from looking in from without, of squares with knobs or great bull's eyes in their centres, and which were very wrinkled and imperfect besides.

The parsonage was a very old-fashioned house, with old-fashioned windows and gables, and had been built many hundreds of years ago, and looked as old as the little lichen-covered church that stood near it. There was a lawn with borders and shrubs before the house, and the winding road up to the front door went under the window of the sitting-room where Harry used to be. So every one who passed to or from the door could have been seen by him if it had not been for the knobbed and wrinkled squares.

"O, mother, I am so weary; that window does so bother and tire me," said he, turning to his mother, who had come to see him after an absence of an hour or two from the house.

Mrs. Warner was a graceful, lady-like little woman, with an air of refinement in her face. She had evidently been very pretty, but was worn with the burden of a family of six children, whom she had to provide for, along with herself and husband, out of £150 a year. Still she was dressed with scrupulous neatness, in a grey merino dress, with clean white collar and cuffs. She tried to smile on Harry as she came in, but she was very sad and fearful about him in her motherly heart.

"Well, my darling," she replied to him, soothingly, as she smoothed his pillow and printed a kiss on his fair forehead. "I have often thought of asking your father to have those ugly squares taken out and plain ones put in instead, and I am sure he will do so now, and to-morrow you shall have the clear light let in, and be able to look through and see people as they really are. Now let me draw down the blind and hide the ugly bull's eyes. There, turn your face the other way, and try to forget them, and go to sleep."

"O dear, I am afraid I cannot sleep, that confusion of eyes, and noses, and arms, and mouths does so bother me, but I will try if you will hold my hand."

Mrs. Warner took the little hand and tears came into her eyes and her heart swelled, as she felt how thin it was.

After a time his mother's presence seemed to have banished the shadows from the boy's mind, and he fell asleep.

The glazier had been and had taken out the old squares and put in new ones of plain glass before Harry came down the next day, and now it was so pleasant for him to lie on his couch those fine sunny October days, and look up to the blue sky and watch the silvery clouds pass over it and wonder where they were come from and where they were going:—pleasant to see the yellow leaves on the trees, and day by day watch now one and then another flutter to the ground and wonder when the rest would go. Then little birds would come and hop about and sing on the branches of the trees, and he would lie and watch them and wonder where their nests were, and where they would go when winter came. And then he thought half sadly and yet half gladly that he might soon be like them, and might spread his wings to fly away as they did to a more sunny and beautiful land. Harry could also see people passing up and down the walk to the front door, and they were no longer distorted, but just their natural selves. So for many days Harry was neither fretful or fidgety, but lay so peaceful on his little couch that nurse thought he was getting better.

Nurse was a woman of about fifty, but very quick and active. You would have thought she was a Quaker from her prim dress, but she belonged to the Wesleyan body. She had lived with Mr. and Mrs. Warner ever since their marriage, and had been Mrs. Warner's nurse when she was young. She was a motherly, conscientious woman, and Mrs. Warner could safely trust the children to her during the several hours a day that she had often to be absent visiting the cottages and schools of her husband's parish. But nurse Allen, though genuinely unselfish, good, and kind, had one defect, which occasioned Mr. and Mrs. Warner a good deal of trouble—she was bigoted; that is, she had got to believe very firmly in certain doctrines, and she thought that no one could be really good in this life, or be safe of heaven in the life to come, unless they had a saving faith—that is, held the same opinions as herself. She thought it her duty to take every opportunity she could to instil her own religious notions into the minds of the children, for she felt that their souls were in danger of eternal ruin as long as they had only the religious teachings of their parents, which she called nothing but "carnal wisdom."

Mr. and Mrs. Warner often remonstrated with nurse about trying to fill the children's minds with doctrines with which they disagreed. But nurse made it a matter of conscience, and said it was her duty to bear witness to the truth in season and out of season. And even though her master and mistress forbade her, she must obey God rather than man.

Mr. and Mrs. Warner were obliged at last to let her have her own way, for she was too valuable, and her influence with the children was too good in other ways for them to part with her. So they contented themselves with watching and counter-acting any mischievous notions that from time to time they found nurse had dropped into the children's minds.

One day, about a week after the removal of the window panes, his mother found Harry restless and feverish as he had been before. He put his hand to his head, and sighed, as if he were puzzled, as if there were something which he could not quite make out, and which made his head confused and hot. "What is the matter with my Harry this afternoon," said his mother, "he looks restless and weary?" "Yes, mother, I am so weary. The window seems come back to bother me again. Oh, it is so puzzling; it does so torment me, and make my head ache."

"But, my dear, you must be dreaming. The window has been altered, you know." "Yes, mother, I don't mean the bulls-eyed panes really, you know, but it is something just like them. It bothers me just as much."

"But what is it that is so puzzling, my child?" "Why it is what nurse has been telling me; you know she says there are three Gods that are but one God, and one God that is three Gods."

"O dear," said Mrs. Warner, "whatever has nurse been talking to you for on such a deep and mysterious subject as this, puzzling your poor little brains?"

"Well, you see, mother, it was not altogether nurse's fault. She was reading to me out of the Testament. It was the last chapter in Matthew, and she came to the verse where Jesus tells his disciples to teach all nations, baptising them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost; and I asked her what that meant, and she said that verse taught the doctrine of the Trinity. And then I asked her what she meant by the Trinity; she said she could not explain herself rightly, but the prayer-book could, so she got the prayer-book and read something about three persons and one God, and how the Father was God, and the Son was God, and the Holy Ghost was God, and yet there were not three Gods, but one God; and she said it was all true."

Mrs. Warner listened in dismay to hear that the mind of her little son had been set to puzzle out this awful riddle.

CHURCH CURIOSITIES.—VIII.

PUNISHING JUDAS.

A CURIOUS scene was enacted at Cork, last Saturday but one, by a number of Portuguese and other foreign sailors, who were lying there with their vessels. In the afternoon, about twenty men, some in white blouses—the appropriate costume, according to peasant etiquette, in the countries where this singular rite is performed—others, whose means did not enable them to provide this sort of garment, appearing in their shirt sleeves, with gaudy ribbons and other emblems of mock mourning attached to their dress, traversed Patrick-street in solemn procession, at a funeral pace. Three or four headed the cortège, sounding a lugubrious strain, with trumpets apparently battered into ignominious ruin for the occasion. One of the sailors bore a sort of wreathed horn, which emitted a most profound groan, at once startling and laughable. After these unique musicians marched the coffin-bearers, carrying on their shoulders a bier, upon which was laid an effigy of the traitor Judas Iscariot; a dummy got up to resemble the human form, and with that independence of fitness of costume which might be expected from the sons of the ocean. Judas, on his back, a gigantic figure of stuffed straw, appeared in a blue shirt and the long boots of a stevedore. The head, an extraordinary repulsive affair, was painted and tattooed in frightful and fantastic lines. No little pains had been taken in the manufacture of the effigy, which, however, with its incongruous costume and nautical surroundings, looked like a dead-drunk mariner whom his comrades were bearing home. Behind the bier came two mourners, one bearing a rope, intended to stand for that with which the traitor hung himself, the other a number of coins representing the bribe of his treachery. The former shook his rope with marked demonstrations of pleasure, while the latter jingled his money with no less show of satisfaction. Several sailors formed the rear of the procession, which passed through Patrick-street with solemn gravity, surrounded by a large and wondering crowd. The funeral promenade having been completed, the party returned to their ship, where the dummy was with due execrations hung on the yard, and while in that position fired into with pistols by his executioners.

A somewhat similar ceremony was performed the day before on board a Portuguese schooner, lying at Havre. After being soundly whipped in the presence of a considerable crowd, the effigy was ducked repeatedly in the river, and then thrown to the boys looking on, who soon tore it to pieces.

AN HONEST PRAYER.

A Paris correspondent of the Guardian says he heard this prayer a few days since at the Notre Dame. "Oh, beloved Saint Joseph," murmured a rosy little grisette on her knees before the flaming taper she had just lighted in his honour, "grant me a good husband, plenty of ironing to do, short collars without starch, and charcoal without smoke; and to my dear old aunt an easy death. All these blessings as speedily as may be!"

FLOWERS FROM PERSIAN GARDENS.—IV.]

I HAVE heard that men who walk in the ways of God would not grieve the hearts even of their enemies. How can such eminence be reached by thee—these, who art ever in strife and opposition with thy friends?

The love of the sincere is the same to your face and to your back; not such as of those who at your back find out your faults, but to your face would die for you; who in your presence are mild as the lamb, but in your absence are man-devouring wolves.

Whoever brings to your notice and counts up the defects of others, he, be sure, will display to others those which he sees in you.

Who knows what manner of man the cloak disguises? the writer only knows the contents of the letter.

O Arab! I fear thou wilt never reach the holy place, for the road which thou art travelling leadeth towards Tartary.

Thou who displayest thy virtues in the palm of thine hand, but hidest thy vices under thine arm-pits, what, O vain man, dost thou expect to purchase in the day of anguish with thy counterfeit silver?

I remember that in the season of childhood I was religiously minded, and inclined to the practice of abstemiousness and austerities. One night I was sitting in attendance on my father, and never closed my eyes the whole night. I held the precious Volume to my bosom, but the company around us were all asleep. I said to my father, "Of all these, not one lifts up the head to repeat the prayers." He replied, "Soul of thy father! better were it for thee that thou also wert asleep than thus to be remarking on the faults of others."

The vain pretender sees nothing but himself, for the veil of self-conceit is before his eyes. Would any one bestow upon his eye the power of discerning God, no one would be behold so weak as himself.

In the eyes of men of the world I am of a goodly aspect, but from my inward impurity I bow down my head in shame. Men will praise the peacock for his elegance and beauty, but he is himself ashamed of his ugly feet.

YOUTH.

Nor childhood, surely, but early youth, "the youth of youth," is the golden age of life. Childhood is the twilight, youth is the beautiful dawn; childhood is the dream, and the struggling out of it; youth is the conscious, joyful waking. . . Or, if childhood is the golden age, youth is the heroic age, when the heart beats high with the first consciousness of power, and the first stir of half-conscious hopes; when the earth lies before us as a field of glorious adventure, and the heaven spreads above us as a space for boundless flight. Before we have learned how mixed earth's armies are, how slow the conquests of truth! how seldom we can fight any battle here without wounding some we would fain succour, or win any victory in which some precious things are not trailed in the dust behind us, dishonoured and lost. Not that the most vivid and golden hopes of youth are delusions. God forbid that I should blaspheme His writing on the heart by thinking so for an instant! It is but that the Omniscient, who knows the glorious end that is to be, sets us in youth on the mountain tops to breathe the pure air of heaven, foreshortening the intervening distance from these heights of hope, and by its sunny haze, as eternity foreshortens it to Him; that, forgetting the things that are behind, and overspanning the things that are between, every brave and trusting heart may go down into the battle-field strong in the promise of the end, of the triumph of truth that shall yet surely be, and of the kingdom of righteousness that shall one day surely come.—The Draytons and the Davenants.

NORTH MIDLAND SUNDAY-SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

THE twenty-first annual meeting was held at Friar Gate Chapel, Derby, on Tuesday, the 14th April, 1868, when there was a very fair gathering of the teachers and friends belonging to the schools in the district.

After the usual devotional exercise, conducted by the Rev. W. OATES, the chair was taken by OFFLEY SHORB, Esq., who introduced the business by remarking upon the importance of the Sunday school as a means of giving sound views of scriptural truth, and leading the scholars to an intelligent appreciation of the contents of the Bible; and contrasting the ignorance he had found to prevail in this respect in some of the countries on the continent, with the more intelligent and enlightened views spreading amongst us. He then called on

The SECRETARY to read the report, from which the following is an extract:—

The returns show a small amount of fluctuation with regard to the number of scholars, seven of the schools returning a less number, four the same number, and three a larger number than last year, and one new school, begun within the year, has been added to the list.

The aggregate returns show the total number of scholars to be 1,804, against 1,821 last year, but the daily average attendance has improved, being 71½ per cent. against 68½ per cent. last year.

The usual resolutions were moved or seconded by the following gentlemen, viz.:—The Revs. W. OATES, P. W. CLAYDEN, W. SHAKESPEAR, C. C. COB, J. J. BISHOP, A. W. WORTHINGTON, and F. BISHOP; and Messrs. MORLEY, COOPER, and RILEY, of Leicester, and W. GILL and G. SWANWICK, of Nottingham. Mr. I. M. WADE, of London, and the Rev. J. FREESTON, of Rochdale, who attended as deputation, also addressed the meeting—the former advocating a more close connection between the school and the congregation, maintaining that the school ought to be regarded as a younger branch of the church; and the latter giving a speech eminently practical in its character.

After tea, at which there was a large attendance, the Rev. W. OATES took the chair, and called on the Rev. F. BISHOP to read his paper on "The Aim and Object of the Sunday School." (We shall next week give Mr. Bishop's excellent paper in full.)

A very animated discussion followed, the Revs. J. J. BISHOP, A. W. WORTHINGTON, P. W. CLAYDEN, J. FREESTON, and the CHAIRMAN, with Messrs. WADE, MORLEY, GILL, and RILEY taking part, the result being that, though all the speakers agreed that the great object at which the Sunday school should aim is the giving a sound moral and religious education to the scholars, the prevailing opinion was that, owing to the lack of day-school education, the time has not yet come when what is called secular instruction can be banished entirely from our Sunday schools.

The next annual meeting is to be held at Nottingham.

INTELLIGENCE.

MINISTERIAL APPOINTMENT.—The Rev. Robert H. Cotton, of Liverpool, educated at Rawdon College (Baptist), but in consequence of a change in his views unable to remain in the ministry of the Baptist Church, has received and accepted an invitation to become missionary agent to the Midland Christian Union, and will enter on his duties at the beginning of next month.

BARNARD CASTLE.—The annual tea meeting was held on the 17th instant, and was numerously attended. After tea Mr. Stephen Kirtley presided, and in the course of his remarks he referred in kindly terms to the departure of Mr. J. H. Redman, who has for some time identified himself with the congregation, and taken a great interest in its welfare. Mr. Redman, in reply, expressed the pleasure he had derived from his connection with them, and the interest he should always cherish for the success of their efforts in keeping alive the cause of truth. The meeting was afterwards addressed by Dr. Chalmers, and Messrs. John Carter, Joseph Lee, and other friends. The addresses breathed a spirit of encouragement and hope that the cause in Barnard Castle would survive the great loss it had sustained in the death of Mr. George Brown.

BELFAST: DOMESTIC MISSION.—On Tuesday, 14th April, the fifteenth annual meeting was held in the Mission-rooms, Stanhope-street, Belfast. Among those present were the Revs. J. Scott Porter, C. J. McAlester, Thos. Bowring, and Messrs. J. Cunningham, A. O'D. Taylor, Thos. McClelland, Wm. Spackman, John Bruce, T. M'Tear, William Campbell, William Hartley, Herbert Darbishire, and James M. Darbishire. The Rev. John Scott Porter presided. Mr. J. M. Darbishire read the committee's report, which stated that during the term of their office the various agencies in connection with the charity had been in full and active operation. In the discharge of his arduous labours Mr. Bowring, their missionary, had proved himself equal to the task, and the committee tendered him their hearty thanks for the zeal and earnestness with which he had executed it, as well as for the deep interest he had manifested in the welfare and prosperity of the mission, since his connection with it. The report further entered into various details respecting the financial affairs and benevolent operations of the mission, of a highly satisfactory nature.—The report of the Ladies' Committee was also read by Mr. Darbishire, and the treasurer's account by Mr. Campbell.—The Rev. T. Bowring, missionary of the society, read a report which detailed his extensive labours during the past year.—Mr. McClelland moved the adoption of the report and statement of accounts.—The Rev. C. J. McAlester (Holywood), in moving the second resolution, called on the friends and subscribers to the mission to exert themselves to maintain, and, if possible, extend its usefulness. There was not any institution in connection with their denomination which he looked on with such great interest as this. He felt that it was essentially Christian, and their efforts were immediately and exclusively devoted to that which was practical in Christianity.—The meeting was also addressed by Messrs. Thomas M'Tear, W. Spackman, A. O'D. Taylor, W. Campbell, and Herbert Darbishire.

BLTYHE, NORTHUMBERLAND.—It will be in the recollection of our readers that some time ago efforts were made to obtain Unitarian preaching at this populous and thriving port, but that through a singular trust deed of the Central Hall, and bigotry in other places, no room could be secured for worship. But the publicity of the facts of the case led to our obtaining the lecture room of the Mechanics' Institute, and on Sunday, April 12th, the Rev. J. C. Street, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, went thither to preach. In the morning the room was more than half filled, and in the afternoon it was crowded to overflowing. The audiences were deeply attentive, and great excitement was created. Voluntary offerings were made, which more than paid the expenses, and a strong general hope was expressed that an effort should be made to continue the services. We understand that arrangements for this purpose will speedily be made.

BURY.—The annual Sunday-school sermons were preached on April 19 h by the Rev. William James, when above £84 was collected. In the afternoon of the same day a meeting of teachers was held, when friends were present from Bolton, Stand, Ainsworth, &c. Mr. John Chadwick, the visitor of the Sunday-school Association, read a paper entitled, "Suggestions for increasing the efficiency of Sunday schools." On Monday, April 20th, Rev. W. James delivered a lecture in the school: "The Holy Land as seen in the spring of 1864." It was illustrated by some beautiful pictures, and by various objects of interest collected by Mr. James in Palestine. The attendance was good, and a very hearty vote of thanks was passed to Mr. James, alike for the lecture and for the sermons of the previous day.

CHOPPINGTON.—On Good Friday, the foundation stone of the new chapel was laid by the Rev. J. C. Street. Notwithstanding the unfavourable state of the weather during the early part of the day, a large concourse of spectators assembled to witness the ceremony, upwards of a hundred of the congregation worshipping in the Newcastle Chapel having arrived at Choppington by special train during the afternoon. The chapel will be built in the Old English style, and will accommodate about 300 people, and the entire cost of the erection will not exceed the sum of £600, the greater portion of which has already been subscribed. After hymn and prayer, the Rev. J. C. Street proceeded to lay the stone, giving an interesting account, with which our readers are already familiar, of the origin of the movement. Dr. Beard subsequently gave an address, after which another hymn and prayer concluded the service. After the stone had been laid, the assemblage adjourned to the Assembly Room, Scotland Gate, where a substantial tea was provided. The hall had been tastefully decorated with evergreens and festoons in honour of the occasion, and over the platform was worked in ivy leaves on a white ground the words "Welcome to the Rev. E. W. Hopkinson," and "Success to the Church and Prosperity to the Sunday school." The attendance at tea was so large as to fill the large hall twice, and then the hall was cleared for a public meeting, which was presided over by the Rev. J. C. Street, who, with the Rev. J. R. Beard, D.D., Manchester, and other friends, addressed the audience. Mr. Robert Elliott, the secretary, read an address of welcome, in which he adverted to the objects they had in view. He said that their object was to found a church broad enough to admit within its pale all earnest Christian thinkers, and those who desired a more liberal and catholic form of Christianity. He assured Mr. Hopkinson that in his labours he might rely on the cordial co-operation and assistance of the congregation. They would have to work hard, and to encounter many difficulties before they could exercise any powerful or salutary influence in the district. Mr. Hopkinson gave a long address in reply to the welcome. Addresses were also delivered by the Rev. Dr. Beard, the Rev. Mr. Whitworth (of Sunderland), Mr. Geo. Lucas, Mr. Bowron (of Stockton), Mr. W. Southern, and several other gentlemen. The proceedings terminated with singing and prayer; the large party from Newcastle returning home by special train, and the miners of the district rejoicing at the bright prospects now fairly opening out before them.

EXETER: GEORGE'S MEETING.—This handsome building was metamorphosed on Good Friday by fair hands, and hands artistic, says the Devon Weekly Times, for a social meeting which the congregation had resolved upon. The decorations were composed of evergreens, choice flowers, and flags, and the tables were adorned with exquisite bouquets of flowers. There were about two hundred persons present. After tea a meeting was held over which Sir John Bowring presided. The Chairman opened the meeting by an interesting address, which was delivered with his accustomed vigour and ability. Afterwards the Rev. T. W. Chignell being called upon, said he was much delighted to meet them in that metamorphosed building. He observed that there had been a little difficulty in arranging the meeting, as some friends doubted the reasonableness of it. It had been suggested that they were throwing away money in the metamorphosing of their chapel. "Waste not" was a very good warning in the present day. But surely to keep up the light of friendship for one evening, the little money necessary for the wick and oil for the lamp was not thrown away. (Hear, hear.) Then again, they were warned that probably Good Friday was hardly the day for such a meeting. Why not? Did they suppose that Jesus of Nazareth wished that through all the coming centuries one bright summer day should have all the sunshine quenched out of it for ever from man, because on one day in a given year he suffered extremely? Far from it. Suffering was a dream when it was over, and rather a beautiful dream than not—however bitter it might be in passing through it. Besides, they would remember one who said "Not in Gerizim, nor in Jerusalem merely, but wherever the spirit is, it can find its Maker;" and, though Calvary was more sacred than Gerizim or Jerusalem, they saw the Maker not only in Calvary, but in every holy spot of earth, and in every holy star. They had done well, then, in gathering that evening. They were met to light the lamp of friendship for a few hours, and to make it burn with unusual brightness, and that they might stimulate each other in the cause they had at heart—that of propagating a free and pure religion. The speaker then gave an address on "The changing and the permanent in religion." The other speakers were Rev. Jas. Taplin, Messrs. Norrington, Mortimer, E. Tozer, and Chalk.

HUN-LIT UNITARIAN CHURCH.—On Wednesday evening, April 15th, the members of the Rev. T. R. Elliott's instruction class met to present him with a copy of "Mill's Logic," as a token of their esteem for him as their pastor and instructor. The presentation was made by Mr. Roberts.

KIDDERMINSTER.—We understand that the pulpit of the new Meeting House will be vacant at Michaelmas next.

LIVERPOOL: TOXTETH PARK.—A soirée of the members and friends of this congregation was held on Wednesday last in Ebenezer Hall, Park Road. About 300 persons were present, most of these being members of the other congregations in the town. After tea Rev. Charles Beard, B.A., took the chair, and in the course of an interesting address, pointed out the nature of the work which he thought the minister and congregation should strive to do among the artisans and tradespeople of the neighbourhood. Rev. C. B. Upton gave a sketch of the origin and history of the Park Chapel. Speeches were also made by Mr. Downie and Lieut.-Colonel Trimble, the latter gentleman urging the establishment of day and Sunday schools.

MIDDLESBORO'.—The annual festival of the West-street Chapel Unitarian congregation, Middlesboro', came off in the Town Hall, on Monday evening, April 13. After tea Mr. W. Fallows presided; and in opening the meeting remarked upon the satisfaction that every one connected with the congregation had felt in the ministry of the Rev. John Bevan during his twelvemonths' residence in Middlesboro'; and likewise stated that the position of the church in Middlesboro' was most gratifying. The Rev. W. Elliot, of Stockton, and the Rev. John Bevan, of Middlesboro', afterwards addressed the meeting.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.—The annual soirée of the Church of the Divine Unity was held on Easter Monday, in the schoolroom. During the day a bazaar was held in the schoolroom, comprising plain and fancy needlework, and all the usual articles of ladies' handiwork to be seen on such occasions. A good round sum was realised, which will go towards increasing the organ and choir fund. The meetings were attended by 500 or 600 persons. After tea a meeting was held in the church under the presidency of the Rev. J. C. Street, the minister of the church. The Chairman said they were that day holding the fourteenth anniversary of the congregation assembling within the walls of that church, and they were also celebrating the 196th anniversary of the church which assembled there. Their church had a long and rich history, and a grand and glorious ancestry. It was also the fourth anniversary of his ministry among them. He could not but remember, with feelings of considerable emotion, the occasion of his entrance upon the work in connection with the church; and, therefore, it was with peculiar satisfaction that he could look around upon that large meeting. After alluding to the deaths of Mr. Roger Barrow, Mr. Samuel Cooper, Mr. William Southern, junr., and Mr. Geo. Brown of Barnard Castle, he went on to speak of the work which had been done in connection with the church. Referring to missionary work, he said that within the past ten days they had had the pleasure of welcoming the Rev. E. W. Hopkinson, who was come to be a worker in this district. He had now secured the settlement of three missionaries in this district, and he hoped, before another four years had passed, to have the number doubled. He was sure that if there were a necessity in Newcastle a hundred years ago for the existence of their Free Church, there was far more necessity for it to-day.—Mr. Joseph Clephan moved a vote of thanks to the Rev. Dr. Beard, for preaching in the church on Sunday.—Mr. George Lucas seconded the motion, which was carried with acclamation; after which Dr. Beard addressed the meeting.—A petition in favour of Mr. Coleridge's bill for removing the tests at Oxford and Cambridge was adopted, on the motion of Mr. James Clephan and Rev. E. W. Hopkinson.

SAFFRON WALDEN.—The annual tea meeting at the General Baptist Chapel was held on Good Friday, about 130 friends being present. After tea the Rev. L. T. Badcock, pastor, presided, and addresses were delivered by the chairman, the Rev. J. Macdougall (of High Garrett and Halstead), and Messrs. W. Shelford and J. Kittredge.

SOUTHAMPTON.—The annual social meeting of the congregation of the Church of the Saviour took place on Good Friday. In the morning the Rev. E. Higginson preached on "The Cross and the Crucifix; or the Christian symbol and the Catholic one." The committee rooms were crowded on the occasion; and after tea the assembly adjourned to the body of the church. The Rev. E. Kell, the chairman, took a review of congregational proceedings since their last meeting on a similar occasion, congratulating the congregation on the decoration and improvement of their chapel during the past year, and on the legacy of £100 left them by the late Jas. Silver, Esq. He proposed "Prosperity to the congregation, in connection with thanks to their treasurer, Edward Dixon, Esq., J.P., for his valuable services." Mr. Dixon, after expressing his thanks to the congregation for their sentiments towards him, and his desire to promote at all times the best interests of their church, proposed "The cordial thanks of the meeting to the Rev. E. Higginson for his eloquent and appropriate discourse, and for his presence at their anniversary." Mr. Higginson, in a powerful and impressive speech, urged that the importance of Unitarian openness and zeal is undiminished, or rather is increased, by the so-called liberality of these Broad-Church times, when the world is at length actually adopting our principles, and will naturally avow them also, if we do not perform the mystical Irish feat of "turning our backs upon ourselves." Mr. Higginson, in the absence of Dr. Longstaff (from indisposition), who had been expected to speak to the subject of "Civil and religious liberty all the world over," made some excellent observations on it, more especially on the desirableness of the disestablishment of the Irish Church. Various votes of thanks to the choir, the Rev. E. Kell and Mrs. E. Kell, &c., were then passed, proposed by Messrs. Richard Smith, Pouch, and Spencer, and the meeting was closed with prayer.

TESTIMONIAL TO THE REV. SAMUEL BACHE.—The usual monthly meeting of Dissenting ministers was held at Netherend Chapel, Cradley, on Tuesday, April 14th. The sermon was preached by the Rev. S. Bache, of Birmingham, who took for his subject the resurrection of Christ. After the service, a testimonial was presented to Mr. Bache from the ministers composing the society, on occasion of his resignation of the secretaryship of the meeting, which he had held for a number of years. The Rev. J. Gordon, of Evesham, was deputed to make the presentation. In doing so he referred to the high reputation, both as a man and a minister, which Mr. Bache had sustained, and the admirable manner in which he had discharged the duties of the office he was about to relinquish. He spoke of the personal kindness which the members of the meeting had invariably received from Mr. Bache, and the fidelity with which, while strenuously maintaining his own views, he had adhered to the principle of liberty by which their union was distinguished. He especially pointed to the future success which the labours of men like Mr. Bache were destined to have, as judged by the effect of similar labours in past times.—Mr. Bache, in his reply, spoke in terms of great gratification of the affectionate regard which had been shown toward him, and expressed his unabated interest in the ministerial work to which he had devoted his life. The testimonial consisted of a handsome silver salver, on which the following inscription was engraved:—"Presented to the Rev. Samuel Bache by the members of the monthly meeting of Protestant Dissenting ministers of Warwickshire and the neighbouring counties, in testimony of their high respect for his character and in grateful acknowledgment of his services as their secretary."—Mr. Gordon was afterwards appointed as Mr. Bache's successor in the secretaryship.—Birmingham Daily Post.

WORCESTER.—A course of six Sunday evening lectures, expository of liberal Christianity, has just been delivered in the Corn Exchange, in this city, under the auspices of the Midland Christian Union. The lecturers and subjects were as follows:—Rev. J. Gordon, of Evesham, "Christ and Christianity;" Rev. D. Maginnis, of Stourbridge, "The Unity and Fatherhood of God;" Rev. W. Cochrane, of Cradley, "Human Nature;" Rev. D. Maginnis, "Salvation;" Rev. B. Wright, of Birmingham, "Future Punishment;" and the Rev. John Gordon, "The Common Faith." The services were attended by an audience of from sixty to seventy adults, who gave a most attentive hearing to the several lectures. It was also observed with satisfaction that the congregation generally joined heartily in the psalmody. After each service there was a liberal distribution of tracts, given for the purpose by the committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. At the close of the last lecture, a meeting of interested attendants was held; Herbert New, Esq., of Evesham, president of the Midland Christian Union, in the chair, and a resolution affirming the desirability of continuing the lectures occasionally during the summer was unanimously adopted, and a subscription list was opened to meet the necessary local expenses. The committee of the Midland Christian Union have undertaken to furnish the occasional lecture.

YEOVIL.—On Monday evening, the quarterly social meeting was held in the above chapel. After tea the Rev. John Ellis took the chair, and gave the meeting an account of Miss Carpenter's visit to India, the proceedings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association relative to Indian missions, the proceedings of the London Ladies' Visiting Society, which contains 80 ladies connected with 19 Unitarian congregations in the metropolis. He also gave an account of the Unitarian Home Missionary Board, and spoke of the general Baptist congregations with whom they were united in Christian fellowship.

THE GOOD FRIDAY MEETING.

To the Editors.—On Good Friday, I listened with much pleasure to the remarks of the Rev. B. Herford, at Dukinfield, on "Some Improvements possible in our Sunday schools as at present constituted," and was only prevented from attesting to their practicalness at the meeting by the time being expired for any more speakers. Allow me to say now, then, that the defects he pointed out of lax discipline, too long hours, great want of thoroughness in our Sunday schools, can be remedied in the mode he suggested. In the Todmorden school his remedies are in force, and with results, according to the Association Visitor, of a decided character. The order, according to Mr. Chadwick, is vigorous and penetrating, and, amid the expressions of dissent to rigidity as regards order expressed by some at the meeting, it is instructive to remark that the scholars do not complain, and the teachers acknowledge its virtue in harmonising school work. It has been obtained by the superintendent insisting upon and observing the order he required when he has rung the bell for stillness; he himself has been the model to be followed in that particular; and by persistently, at opportune moments, inculcating the lesson that stillness can only be obtained by being still. Mr. Chadwick also discovered that we were successful in retaining our elder scholars; the cause is a similar one to the other; as order begets order, so interest begets interest. The teacher instructs from an acceptable book (which, of course, must differ and change according to locality and character of those composing the class), and prepares his lessons. The afternoon lesson is so short, too, that the young men are not debarred from their afternoon walk, the afternoon school being from a quarter to two to a quarter to three, when the bell rings for dismissal hymn. The school thus attempts, in almost every particular, to fulfil the conditions Mr. Herford requires for improving our Sunday schools. The teacher's axiom, "That what is not received is not given," is a sufficient guide to all school managers as to length of lessons and school hours. Wherever a minister or superintendent sees the teachers or scholars jaded and interested in the time rather than the work, be sure interest has fled, and benefit with it. In that case, the only remedy is shortening the hours, or changing the lesson—a difficulty in a Sunday school where there are usually so many untrained teachers. Our school has no change of lessons either morning or afternoon; duration of lesson in the morning an hour, in the afternoon three-quarters. I am sure the association, and those who heard Mr. Herford, owe him much for the vigour and point with which he attempted to bring our Sunday-school managers back to first principles, by affirming that order produces order; that vigorous tone in a school can only be based upon vigorous management; and that common sense teaches that as in other work half-hearted labour is little worth, so whatever in Sunday schools—too long hours, for example—encourages dawdling and time-serving, is an enemy to the vigour and virtue of the teaching.—Yours truly,

W. E. THORNLEY.

STOKE NEWINGTON GREEN.

Dear Sir—When your late minister, the Rev. William S. Barringer, left the orthodox community in which, with great acceptance, he had long served, and, moved by conscientious convictions, came amongst us, taking the charge of the church at Stoke Newington, we naturally hoped that he would be spared for a longer period of usefulness. In the few years that have since elapsed, he had but few opportunities of becoming widely known in our body. I am, therefore, only discharging what devolves upon me as a neighbourly duty in recommending, as I earnestly do, to the sympathy of our friends, not in Islington alone, but generally, the effort which you are making on behalf of his widow and children.

The hearty kindness which was so universally manifested throughout the Unitarian body in response to a similar, though more urgent, appeal, last year, encourages me to believe that the widow of my late ministerial friend and neighbour, herself the daughter of a Unitarian minister, left so early with two very young children, and altogether without means, will not want for the help which charitable friends are now asked to give. Your own congregation having already so well opened the list of contributors, I think that you would be doing a wrong towards the humane and Christian feelings of the people who believe, as we do, that "pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is, to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction," if you neglected to afford them this opportunity of doing manifest good.—Very sincerely yours,

HENRY IERSON, Unity Church, Islington.

MANCHESTER DOMESTIC MISSIONS—ROCHDALE ROAD CHAPEL.

In the late severe storms the wall of an adjoining manufactory, which had been left standing after a fire, was blown down, and in its fall destroyed the outbuildings, heating apparatus, &c., of the Rochdale Road Chapel.

The Committee are obliged to ask for help towards rebuilding the premises destroyed; and as the Schools have for some time past been in Want of Proper Class Rooms, avail themselves of this opportunity of erecting them on the ground where the former offices stood, and where the useful accommodation can be obtained for about £100. The street which runs behind the Chapel has to be paved, and this will require an outlay of £30. Nearly £150, therefore, is needed, towards which it is intended to devote the £40 which was given so generously by the Strangeways Sewing School, and also £10 contributed by Mr. B. D. DARBISHIRE, the owner of the adjoining manufactory. £100 will, therefore, have to be raised by voluntary gifts, and the Committee trust that the liberal donations of the supporters of the truly Christian work of the Missions will speedily provide the Funds required.

Subscriptions will be thankfully received by the treasurer, Mr. R. D. DARBISHIRE, A. 25, Gough-street; Rev. W. GASKELL, Rev. S. ROBINSON, St. Oswald's Grove, Rochdale Road; or Rev. S. ALFRED STEINTHAL, 107, Upper Brook-street.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

It is stated that Brigham Young is "slightly a widower," five of his wives having died of pneumonia during the past winter.

The Bohemians are organising for the 6th of July next a pilgrimage to Constance, where they propose to celebrate the 353rd anniversary of the martyrdom of John Huss, who was burnt alive in 1415, enduring his dreadful punishment with unparalleled magnanimity and resignation.

The illumination at Rome on the 16th, though it excited no enthusiasm in the people, seems to have been got up on a magnificent scale. Of course, the victory at Mentana figured largely in the transparencies. A colossal one in the piazza of the Pantheon, represented the Pope in the symbolical boat of St. Peter, along with Cardinals Patrizi and Antonelli, the latter, who was kneeling by the Holy Father's side, having over his head the words, "Petri jura sancta sunt." The Pope bore in one hand the rod of Aaron, and with the other was putting to flight a band of Garibaldians, while Garibaldi himself was being plunged in an abyss, to the manifest delight of the Apostles Peter and Paul, and to the accompaniment of the hymn of Mentana, sung by 300 choristers.

The Pall Mall thinks that Mr. Disraeli will not derive any comfort from the meeting of the Fellows of Sion College, which was held last week. Although a resolution in favour of the maintenance of the Irish Church was carried, yet several clergymen, whose fidelity to their own Church is not suspected, and who do not seem likely to have entered into a secret compact with the Pope for the subversion of the Crown, intimated their assent to the course proposed by Mr. Gladstone. English Churchmen will not, it is evident, be aroused by Mr. Disraeli's dismal warnings to a sense of their own danger. Several of the speakers admitted the impolicy of keeping the Irish Church in existence a day longer than is absolutely essential, and one declared that its disendowment would prove a great blessing for real Protestantism.

The first of the Boyle Lectures for this year was delivered on Sunday afternoon, at the Chapel Royal, Whitehall, by the Rev. Stanley Leathes, Professor of Hebrew in King's College, London, His subject, "The Witness of the Old Testament to Christ."

In the case of Shepherd and the Vicar of Frome, the rule nisi, granted on the 17th, has been made absolute; the result of which is that the Bishop of London is to read and examine the works published by Mr. Bennett, and then exercise his discretion whether he will issue a commission to try him for his High Church doctrine of the Real Presence.

From a statement made at the last monthly meeting of the English Church Union, it appeared that up to the end of 1867 a sum of £2,800 had been received. The "Case and Opinion" had cost £400; the St. Alban's and East Teignmouth cases, £1,000; other cases, £200; and various other matters, £100; total, £2,300; leaving a balance of £500; but there was still owing £2,000 for the St. Alban's and East Teignmouth cases, exclusive of the cost of the appeal. The lawyers profit by the present disputes, whether any one else does or not.

At a meeting of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, Bishop Gray, after denouncing the Colenso heresy, expressed a hope that he should take out with him, when he returned to Africa, the clergyman who had been selected to be Bishop of Natal, and, as the Metropolitan Bishop of Cape-town, consecrate him for the work.

As we mentioned last week would probably be the case, the bill for abolishing compulsory Church-rates has been referred by the Lords to a Select Committee, and it looks as if the Government were disposed to make such alterations in it as the Commons will hardly accept, and so the settlement of this long-contested question again be postponed. Lord Derby is evidently for "no surrender." He, and the Bishop of London with him, regards Mr. Gladstone's measure as a step, and a large one in the course of legislation, which is fast reducing the Established Church to a level with the other denominations around it, and he considers that nothing can relieve it from the fundamental vice of violating the principle on which that Church is based. Though we wish the matter settled, and on that ground have favoured Mr. Gladstone's measure, we confess we shall not be much grieved if it is rejected, as this will be almost sure to lead next year to abolition pure and simple, in place of the present compromise.

The foundation stone of the Keble College, at Oxford, was laid on Saturday last, by the Archbishop of Canterbury. Subscriptions to the amount of between £40,000 and £50,000 have already been received, but probably at least £20,000 more will be required to complete the scheme. According to one of the resolutions moved at a public meeting which followed the laying of the stone, the aims of the new college are to be "to impart a Christian training" (in accordance, no doubt, with the High Church views of the author of the "Christian Year"); "to encourage industry, and to discourage habits of expense;" but the great object evidently is to furnish a larger number of graduate candidates for the ministry of the Established Church.

A "private and confidential" circular, gently urgent in its tone, has been addressed, by the honorary secretary of the United Protestant Defence Committee, to the clergy of the English Church, who are requested to look upon the crisis in a religious rather than a political light, and to "resist by all means in their power the attempt to destroy the Established Church in Ireland, as the first step towards abolishing the connection between Church and State in Great Britain." Enclosed in the circular is a printed copy of a petition to the Queen, which, after the expression of much "astonishment and alarm" at the resolutions "suddenly introduced into the Honourable the House of Commons, for the purpose of disestablishing and overthrowing the Established Church in Ireland," prays that her Majesty, "bearing in mind the principles which placed her family on the throne, will be graciously pleased to refuse her sanction to any such measures."

The Manchester Examiner and Times states that at Buckhurst Hill, Essex, the other day, the Church minister refused to read the funeral service over an infant six months old because it had not been baptised, whereupon a Christian gentleman, feeling indignant at such conduct, volunteered to read the service over the remains on the adjoining highway.

From a report of the secretary, at the meeting of the Baptist Union, held in London on Monday, it appears that there has been an increase to the denomination during the past year of 7,756, which is greater than in any former year. The total number of churches reported from in the United Kingdom is 4,411; of chapels, 2,642; of members in fellowship, 221,524. Eighty ministers have been added during the year, three-fourths of whom have had a collegiate training. Twenty-five new places of worship have been built at a cost of £33,623, and 31 enlarged or improved at an expense of £11,230.

In the list of subscriptions to the Liberation Society is an item which the Liberator commends to the attentive consideration of the clerical readers of that journal:

"Balance of Anti-Easter Due Fund, per Rev. W. C. Squier, £21. 7s. 6d."

"Four or five years since the Vicar of Preston, bent on showing that Easter Offerings were also Dues, which he could legally exact, distrained upon two persons, one a Roman Catholic, the other a Unitarian, who had refused to pay, and took from one two hams, and from the other a barometer, and had them sold by public auction. A storm speedily raged throughout the town. The articles were bought in, and returned to their owners, at a great public meeting, and, and at the same time, a league was formed, and its members pledged themselves that they would never again pay the obnoxious impost. The vicar again summoned some of the defaulters, but the case was taken to the Court of Queen's Bench, where a decision was obtained which indirectly, but not the less certainly, has knocked Easter Dues on the head, and that not merely in Preston, but throughout the country. The friends at Preston have waited to be assured of the result of their success, and, now that the vicar has practically admitted the hopelessness of his case, they hand over to the "Liberation Society," through the gentleman who has been their leader in the contest, the balance of their fund, to help to put an end to the system of which Easter Dues have formed a miserable portion."

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

Infallibility is by no means always consistent. Last week, at one of his general audiences, the Pope, after referring to the evils inflicted on the Church by the Herods and Pilates of the day, declared that the tendency of events was to expand and magnify the Holy See; but two or three days later he spoke in quite a different tone, and compared himself to David, who, though attended by a band of devoted friends, could not be saved from exile and the life of a fugitive; and so the affection borne to himself by a few faithful Catholics could not shield him from the trials that were still in store for him.

The Daily News shows that the unendowed Protestant bodies are joining in practical union on the question of the Irish Church. If there is one of those bodies which might have been expected to regard the Irish Establishment with some tenderness it is the Wesleyans, so consistent in their abhorrence of Popery, so friendly to the Anglican communion. But no sooner did the real character of the crisis reveal itself than the principal organ of the Wesleyan Methodists declared sorrowfully but plainly that the Irish Establishment had become a danger to Protestantism. The Free Church of Scotland—which, like the Wesleyan body, has no objection to the union of Church and State—appears to be taking the same ground. The Protestantism of the country has already made its voice heard, and it demands nothing less than the disestablishment and disendowment of the Irish Church. The question at the hustings, as Sir Edward Dering said at Canterbury, will soon be, "Are you in favour of Mr. Disraeli's scheme for raising the Roman Catholic Establishment in Ireland and perpetuating Maynooth at the expense of the British taxpayer? or do you agree with Mr. Gladstone, that in Ireland every creed and every religion should stand or fall by its own merits?" And the answer of a Protestant people is certain.

The Pall Mall says:

"The agitation now fairly begun over the Irish Church seems likely to be fully as profitable to surgeons as to political philosophers. There have already been many scattered fights in the country, and at Wolverhampton the citizens lent additional force to the discussion by using life preservers and truncheons. At Dover, and again at Deptford, the convincing argument of a blow was employed with great effect. The determination to settle a controversy relating to Ireland in traditional Irish fashion must be a great encouragement to Mr. Disraeli. He has not, after all, raised the cry of 'No Popery' without stirring up discord, and the more his supporters or opponents break each other's heads, the better satisfied will he be with the working of his spell. We hope, however, that Lord Russell will not venture to any more public meetings, no matter who may offer to take care of him. As things are now going, he might be kidnapped. Knowing with whom he has to do, it is probable that Mr. Gladstone does not go out after dark oftener than he can help. Mr. Disraeli's myrmidons are evidently on the alert, and all persons in secret alliance with the Pope of Rome will do well to avoid showing themselves in the public streets."

Referring to the article in the British Quarterly on the causes of irritation on the part of Dissenters, whom Anglicans always assume to be "inaccurate, vulgar, and presumptuous," and whose ministers in country districts are subject to a kind of social ostracism, the same paper asks:

"Could not the presiding spirits of Sion College and the Tabernacle settle all this over a friendly dinner? With the Bishop of Oxford as chairman, supported by Mr. Spurgeon at the other end of the table, some new code of social observances might be constructed, and Nonconformists in country towns relieved from their present disabilities."

Mr. Disraeli seems not to be giving satisfaction to either of the two great Church parties. The Church Times says:

"That he is prepared to go all lengths to secure the support of the ultra-Protestant faction, is shown by the bestowal of the Worcester canonry—his first exercise of ecclesiastical patronage—upon a person like Dr. Wynter, a violent Puritan, and the malignant persecutor of Dr. Pusey. It is the very worst appointment with which the Church has been afflicted since the elevation of a platform Protestant to the See of Cork, and it binds the Premier to a line of Church policy which none can know better than himself to be intellectually contemptible."

Perhaps, however, the Premier may set himself right with the High Church party, by appointing one of their number to the see of Hereford, which the death of Dr. Hampden leaves at his disposal.

The Saturday Review, animadverting on the Sion College address, says:

"There is 'an extreme faction' among the Broad Church party, of whom Dean Stanley has lately made himself the Coryphæus, whose views of the relative importance of the spiritual and secular attributes of religious establishments might be not unfairly summed up, if we may venture so to paraphrase it, in the following version of Pope's famous couplet:—

"For forms and creeds let graceless zealots prate;
He can't go wrong whose Church is with the State."

On the same subject, the John Bull observes:

It is a manifesto of the views of the Erastianising party, now basking in the sunshine of Court favour. These views have at least the merit of simplicity, and that notwithstanding the principles of the paper in which they are embodied are strangely blended of ultra-Liberalism and of ultra-Conservatism. Dean Stanley tells us that a Church is best with as little definite Christianity as may be. He is very liberal in dispensing with revealed truths. His polar stars—for he scorns the unity of aim of those who are striving at one goal—are Galileo, who cared for no such trifling matters as whether Christ were indeed the Messiah or no, and Erastus, whose idea of the Church rose no higher than that of a moral police force. But if Liberal in sweeping away the truths which he holds so lightly—if, indeed, he holds them at all—he is the most ultra-Conservative of Tories as to the goods which he happens to possess. Amidst the derisive laughter of his auditors, he urged, with an earnestness which was sadly lacking from other parts of his paper, that Deaneries should be preserved, and that all would go well providing only the Bishops held firm possession of their seats in the House of Lords. As to spirituality, as to nobility of thought, or of charity towards those who differ from the writer, we detect scarce a trace in the paper, as not a trace was to be marked when he delivered it. When it was read, the contrast between the cold, worldly, pecuniary tone of the Dean's paper, and the at least devout and religious criticism of Mr. Miall, was painfully felt by many of the Dean's hearers."

The Record, which has often sympathised with Mr. Spurgeon, and whose Evangelical friends, many of them, contributed towards the building of his Tabernacle, laments over its desecration by the meeting which was held in it to support Mr. Gladstone's resolutions. It thus utters its feelings:

"It has been painful enough to see his Tabernacle profaned for the purpose of 'hinder[ing] the truth' by attacks on our Evangelical clergy, but it is now to be lent as a place of political agitation, where he may revile at pleasure the compact ratified by two Parliaments at the Union of 1801. Thus he may stir up the passions of the multitude, but it will be against one of the bulwarks of Protestantism in a country where Popery is more rampant than in any other country in Europe, Spain itself hardly excepted. We think that Mr. Spurgeon, in his fall, descends to a lower depth than the ex-Premier, inasmuch as an Evangelist of Christ's everlasting Gospel is bound to discharge his hallowed mission under higher sanctions than the man of mere worldly ambition, whose aim it appears to be to court popularity at any cost of official dignity or personal consistency."

In a very able and interesting lecture, delivered last week, in the Hyde Mechanics' Institution, by the Rev. H. E. Dowson, in which he spoke in favour of the Prussian system of compulsory education, he showed the worthlessness of what passes for religious instruction in elementary schools, and among other samples of its results gave the following:

"As to Bible reading, Mr. Foster tells us, 'I met with very few day schools indeed in which it seemed that the words read or repeated, even with apparent ease, conveyed any idea to the mind of the pupil. For instance, a smart little boy read the first verse of the 9th of Matthew: 'And he entered into a ship, and passed over, and came into his own city.' I asked, 'What did he enter into?' 'Don't know, thank you, sir,' replied the boy politely. 'Read it again; now what did he come into?' 'Don't know, thank you, sir.' Of the unintelligible gibberish which is often read, he gives the following instance:—I remember hearing the head girl in the first class read Luke iv. 14, thus: 'And there went a flame of him through all the religion round about,' with perfect self-satisfaction, and in utter unconsciousness of the absurd blunders she was perpetrating. As to catechetical teaching the following answers to questions in the catechism were written on their slates by children of average intelligence:—Q. 'What is your duty towards God?' A. 'My dooty toads God is to bleed in him, to fering, and to loaf withold your arts, withold my mine, withold my sold, and with my sernth, to whirehip and to give thanks, to onner his old name and his world, and to save him truly all the days of my life's end.'—Q. 'What did your godfathers and godmothers then for you?'—A. 'They did promis and vowl three things in my name, first, that I should pernounce of devel and all his walks, pumps and valities of this wicked wold, and all the sinful larsts of the flesh, &c.'—Q. 'What is thy duty towards thy neighbour?'—A. 'My dooty tords my nabers to love him as thyself, and to do to all men as I wed thou shall do and to me, to love, onner, and suke my farther and mother, to onner and to bay to Queen, and all that are pet in a forty under her, to smit myself to all my gonness, teaches, and sportal pastures, and marsters, to oughen myself lerdly and every to all my betters, &c.' And Mr. Hopps tells us that the following passed between an examiner, who was thinking of geography, and a little boy, who was thinking of divinity.—Q. 'Where were you born?'—A. 'Please, sir, in sin.'"

The Rock, the Record's shadow, animadverting on Rationalism, says:

"Since Christianity was established, the Church has verily seen no sadder spectacle than that of a mitred infidel, and (heu nefas) a consecrated band of supplanted sceptics, abusing the Word of God, which they have sworn to believe and to teach, as a 'series of manifest, absolute, palpable self-contradictory inconsistencies.' (See Dr. Colenso on the Pentateuch.)"

In a charge delivered last week, Archdeacon Denison thus described the present aspect of public opinion in regard to religion:

"First, there is the growing tendency to regard religion as a thing to be settled by every man for himself, according to his own private judgment. It is not a little alarming to see to what extent this tendency has made its way within the Church itself. Outside the Church it takes its course without check or stay. Next there is the disposition to throw to the winds as so much waste paper solemn contracts, engagements, and obligations, directly or indirectly connected with religion, however they may have been ratified by law and pledges of national faith, so soon as they are taken to obstruct the course of political or social expedience, or to interfere with that worship of material prosperity which divides with the pride of intellect the idolatry of our time. There is another feature hardly less evil. Indeed, as it savours of hypocrisy, it may probably be the worst of all. I mean the practice of giving fine names to wrong deeds, so that the people at large are not only made parties directly or indirectly to what is wrong, but are deluded all the time into thinking that it is right. Lastly, there is the spirit of compromise of Divine trusts. It has been imported into religion from politics, and the child, as is commonly the case with vicious parentage, is worse than the parent."

On the question of "Established Church," or "no Established Church," the Archdeacon says:—

"It is henceforth to be decided solely by an appeal to numbers. Up to the year of our Lord 1868—and, as Mr. Gladstone held earlier in his erratic life—the truth of the Reformed Church, and not the number of its members, has been the rule. Mr. Gladstone has now cut up by the roots his own religious position. He has cut it up by the roots, not for Ireland only, but for England too; and the wildest ultra-Protestantism, which claims for every man not only the right to make his own religion, but to have it accounted as of equal value in the eyes of the State with the Catholic faith, goes in effect no farther than he has done. The result of his act is to throw all the weight of the State into the scale either of the Roman Catholic Church or of the infidel as against the Church of England. The history of man furnishes no sadder example of the power of a great intellect to lead astray than the public career of Mr. Gladstone."

Writing to the Star in defence of Mr. Mill's argument on the subject of capital punishment, Mr. F. W. Newman says:

"You complain that Mr. Mill leaves out of view 'the religious element of the question.' You think that the public will shrink most of all 'from putting to sudden death the criminals of whose salvation it is most difficult to entertain a doubt.' I submit that this can have no other meaning than that the public believes itself wiser, tenderer, and more discriminating than the Supreme Judge. The public wishes to save the man's soul, but thinks that God will be very hard upon him; will make no such allowances for his guilt as man makes, and will inflict upon him a punishment (if he be executed) far beyond what we think he deserves. I solemnly protest from the bottom of my heart against dignifying with the name of religion such irreligious superstition, or giving it weight in legislation. You wish for separation of Church and State; so does Mr. Gilpin. What right have you, then, in wishing what probably Mr. Mill, with me, think vile superstition, to be made a basis of public law? You further say that Mr. Mill would consign great criminals to 'extinction'; but I do not find in his speech anything to indicate his opinion for or against future existence. Is this consistent with your profession of being 'the last to raise any theological odium'? To me it seems clear that belief in a future existence is only one more reason in favour of capital punishment in certain cases. A man who cannot have a new career in this world, who can only become more depraved under long, hopeless punishment, which crushes out his moral existence, has in a future world an entirely new career, and, under an All-merciful God, whose punishments can only be for the benefit of the criminal, he will have a prospect of moral improvement after it has become impossible in this world. Any other belief in a future state is as impious as it is irrational."

AN IMPOSTOR.—One of our friends requests us to caution our readers against an impostor, who is going among our ministers, with a wonderful story of his having been in the army, and of his being known to the Revs. R. B. Drummond and J. Pantom Han.

OLD TESTAMENT CHAPTERS FOR THE SUNDAY SCHOOL.—II.

SUBJECT: "The belief of the Hebrews that God will one day punish the wicked upon earth, and will put away oppression and violence."

Read Habakkuk chap. i.—ii., 4, pointing out that it is in the shape of a dialogue between Jehovah and the prophet. The prophet cries out for help against the iniquity around him; and Jehovah answers that he will raise up an enemy, the Chaldeans, to scourge the land. Again, the prophet complains of the undisturbed prosperity of the wicked; and Jehovah declares that at the appointed time he will surely come.

Read also Psalm x., as the same subject put into a different form of poetry. The Psalmist bewails that Jehovah hides himself in these times of trouble. He describes the pride and the evil course of the wicked. But at the 14th verse he breaks out into a different strain, and exclaims, "Thou hast seen it. Thou beholdest mischief and spite to requite it with thy hand; the poor committeth himself to thee."

REVIEWS.

A Sermon Preached at Stoke Newington Green Free Christian Church. By the late Rev. W. S. Barringer.

ALTHOUGH we were personally unacquainted with Mr. Barringer, who was formerly a minister among the Baptists, and joined our denomination two or three years ago, it was with sincere regret that we heard of his sudden removal, leaving a family to be provided for by the kindness of sympathising friends; and that regret has been renewed by the perusal of this sermon, delivered by him only two days before his death, and, out of regard to his memory, now printed by an old and respected member of his congregation. Though it was preached extempore, it is clear in thought and forcible in expression, and shows that, had his life been spared, he was one well fitted to have rendered good service to the cause which, from conscientious conviction, he had been led to embrace. In this discourse, from the words, "Am I my brother's keeper?" he points out, in an interesting manner, how we are all made dependent on each other and mutually influence each other, and how much there is, in consequence, for each one of us to do, and which we ought to do. As he says:

"Right is not mere absence of wrong. You, and I, and others, never perhaps injured anybody. But to do right is to act. It is a doing something to remove evil, and alleviate suffering,—something to remedy crime; to feel, to think, to do only what is right. This must be the work of all who are in the service of God. By this must we test our religion."

As we have intimated, he leaves a widow and several children to our care, and we trust that many who have not yet shown their sympathy with them in their sad loss will be induced to do so at once, and help to relieve them from anxiety as to their means of future support.

The Edinburgh Review. April, 1868.

AN article on the Monks of the West, while admiring the interesting and picturesque writings of M. de Montalembert, characterises his point of view, in doubtful and disputed questions, as being from the orthodox Roman Catholic side. The legendary history of Columba is abstracted at considerable length, while issue is taken with M. de Montalembert's exaggerated dependence upon the authenticity of the account. It has been differently treated by Mr. Burton in his "History of Scotland," and his negative results, though they would be unacceptable to M. de Montalembert, are more trustworthy. The article concludes with the opinion, that the self-sacrifice which monarchism requires, though perhaps attended with beneficial results in earlier ages, is not genuine sacrifice. "Too often the recluse abandons duties of family life to indulge in pious contemplation. 'The highest forms of self-surrender are those of which the world knows nothing, and whose beauty is derived, not from the halo of sacerdotal sentiment, but from the quiet discharge of unromantic, and it may be, irksome duties.'"

The Quarterly Review. April, 1868.

AN article on the Irish Church questions whether the Protestant Establishment is to any extent the cause of Fenianism, and points out that the Roman Catholic Church is rapidly accumulating property by charitable bequests, while its clergy are probably better paid than those of the Establishment. Even if the voluntary system were likely to be equally successful with Protestants, it is uncertain whether we have the right to disturb the settlement of property made at the Reformation, with its subsequent Protestant additions. If the Irish Church is dis-endowed, can the English one maintain its ground? or what could be rightly done with the confiscated funds? and would not religious bitterness be increased? The article dwells on those well-worn arguments of danger to the English Church; injustice to the Irish Church, and the superior advantages of levelling upwards, by endowing all the sects in Ireland. It concludes with an attack on Mr. Gladstone's policy: "The plain truth is that Mr. Gladstone is willing to destroy the Irish Church in order to unite the disorganised and broken ranks of his party." And appeals to Englishmen not to legislate in a panic for the benefit of party and the detriment of the Church.

An article on University Reform dwells on the advantages of the existing systems, and asks, "Would it not be well to apply Lord Melbourne's advice to this case at least, and 'let it alone?'"

THE AIM AND OBJECT OF THE SUNDAY SCHOOL.

[A paper read at the annual meeting of the North Midland Unitarian Sunday-school Association, held at the Friar Gate Chapel, Derby, April 14th, 1868, by the Rev. FRANCIS BISHOP, Chesterfield.]

WHAT is the end—what the object of the Sunday school? This is a question which it is incumbent upon us, as teachers, to settle in our minds. It is important that no confused thoughts, no random impulses should distract and weaken us in our labours. In any project, it is essential to success that the end sought should be distinctly apprehended and constantly kept in view. If there be vagueness and uncertainty as to our purpose, there will be feebleness and fickleness, inconsistency and indecision in our endeavours. Without distinctness of aim there can be no efficiency of action. It becomes, therefore, a matter of primary importance to us, as Sunday school teachers, to decide what is the great and distinctive object of the Sunday school, that we may bend all our plans, energies, and efforts to its accomplishment.

One of the very first facts that presses itself upon us in this connection is, that the Sunday school is an institution directly and closely connected with the Christian Church, that it is held on the Christian's day of rest, and is almost invariably attached to the Christian's place of worship. A church or chapel is considered incomplete till some provision is made for the Sunday school. If, through poverty or other causes, it is found impossible to build a separate room specially for the school, it is commonly arranged to conduct it in the place of worship itself, and to assemble the classes in the aisles and pews. In all this it seems to be clearly implied that the purpose of the school is kindred to that of the church, that it aims to do specially for the young, what in our church services, we aim to do for young and old alike,—namely, to enforce upon them the claims of religion, to lead them to enlist themselves under the banners of Christ, and give their hearts unto God. As our churches are not colleges, or atheneums, or mechanics' institutions, so our Sunday schools are not day schools, and never were intended to do the work or come in the place of our National or our British schools, our public or our private academies. Their object is not varied and miscellaneous, extending over the whole range of general education, and aiming to do all sorts of good, but it is a simple, specific, and definite object,—namely, to bring the young to Christ, and as "nurseries of the Christian Church," as they are often called, to train them up as his true and faithful disciples.

The Bishop of Oxford, in his very interesting and valuable paper in "Good Words" of this month, concisely and correctly defines the object of the Sunday school to be—"to teach religious truth and to form religious character." But we should be careful to come to our work in no narrow sectarian spirit, and so to enlarge our conceptions of religion as to take in many subjects not directly and expressly taught in the records of Christianity. The Bible, I conceive, should be a leading class-book in every Sunday school for the classes that are old enough and advanced enough to use it intelligently. With such classes the Scripture lesson should form a part of the course of instruction every Sunday. "The great work of the Sunday school teacher," says Dr. Channing, "is to teach Christ." . . . "The gospels, the gospels should be the text-book of the Sunday school. They are more adapted to the child than any other part of Scripture. They are full of life, reality, beauty, power, and in skilful hands are fitted above all writing to awaken spiritual life in old and young." The spirit of these emphatic declarations, I think, we should ever bear in mind; but literally and with a feeling of superstition to confine ourselves to the use of the Gospels, to the exclusion of all other writings, would be to defeat our object and to contravene the animating principle of the expressions I have cited. It would crush the very life out of our teaching.

My own practice—and I make no apology for speaking of this, as the value of these meetings must largely depend on our honestly and frankly comparing notes with each other for the common good—my own practice with a large class of boys is to give a Scripture lesson at least once, generally twice (one in the morning and one in the afternoon) every Sunday. This plan I have pursued for more than thirty years. How wearisome! some may be ready to exclaim. But no; I find the subjects ever new and fresh myself, and I have good reason to believe that the scholars also feel them to be deeply interesting. But to secure this end, it is necessary to adopt some system and to make preparation. For my own part, I feel it to be a duty to prepare for the Sunday school class, just as I feel it to be a duty to prepare for the pulpit. A larger preparation may be needful in the one case than in the other, but in both it is alike necessary if we would keep up our own interest in our work, and effect the amount of good within our reach. Generally, though not invariably, I take some Scripture book, in regular order, chapter by chapter. The same plan I find it best to pursue with all the class books I use. Thus, as a rule, I know what lessons I am to give before going to the school. I very much fear that if I left the choice to the period of meeting, much time would be lost in making the selection, and that when made, the exercise thus left to hap-hazard would often be mere drudgery to myself, which I should be anxious to get over at the earliest possible moment, and that to my scholars it would be, as a consequence of my own state of feeling, flat, tedious, and dull.

Concurrently with the Scriptures, during nearly the whole of last year, I used with much interest and pleasure Robertson's "Life and Ministry of Paul," and a general reading book compiled by the same able and faithful minister, both published by our London Association. The former of the above books opened up a wide field for illustrations—geographical, historical, and bearing on the customs and manners of the East, their contrasts and their analogies with the customs of modern times and in our own country. It also led us to read through the Epistle to the Galatians, and make frequent references to other parts of the Epistles and to the Book of Acts. Though we used this book of Mr. Robertson's twice every Sunday for about half an hour each time, it lasted us nearly a year, and so interesting was it that I feel assured the class shared in the sorrow which I felt myself when we had to put it by.

I am using now Mr. Higginson's admirable Catechism without questions, on natural and revealed religion. I had some fear that the abstruse and difficult topics dealt with in the early part of this book might be dry and tedious to boys, young and but little educated, and therefore used it at first only on Sunday mornings, and then for a very short period. But I soon saw that the springs of moral interest were reached and opened up in their minds, and a few Sundays ago I was gratified to find a wish expressed by one of the youngest of the scholars that we should use the book also in the afternoon. As we cautiously advanced at first in what to most of the lads was an unknown land, the interest of the class steadily grew, and the boys' minds, stimulated by what they fed upon, widened to a ready comprehension and a keen enjoyment of the subjects presented. And now all turn to the book with zest every time we meet. Concurrently with Mr. Higginson's book we are using Mr. Corkran's well-known "Sunday-school Reader," and the Bible. Last Sunday and Sunday week—the Sunday before Good Friday and Easter Sunday—the chapters we read were on the last days of Christ before his Crucifixion, on that event itself, and on the Resurrection. If time permits, I generally read something of a lighter character to the class before we separate, and lately I have found Mrs. Gatty's exquisitely beautiful "Parables from Nature," well adapted for this purpose. If a fear has been excited that we are about to break up without this reading, more than once I have lately received, in Derbyshire dialect, the request: "Please read us one of those noice parables." Time always passes very rapidly with us, and we invariably have the feeling, when the hour and quarter has elapsed, and we are summoned to join the whole school in the closing hymn and prayer, that we should like to continue our occupations longer.

Experience has taught me the importance of adapting my questions, as far as possible, to the capacity of the several boys. Some are very regular and attentive, but are comparatively deficient in mental grasp and power. To such scholars it is painful and discouraging to have frequent questions proposed to them which, notwithstanding their praiseworthy efforts, they are unable to answer. And at the same time there is some danger of cleverer boys having an unhealthy complacency, not to say a feeling of vanity, excited, by a too frequent and obvious manifestation of their intellectual superiority. It seems to me very desirable, therefore, in a moral point of view, to be watchful in this respect, and, without letting the class know your aim, to propose easier questions to boys of inferior capacity, and more difficult ones to those who are, by natural endowment or by educational training, better prepared for them.

The foregoing methods and plans apply especially to elder scholars. With younger classes it is more difficult to keep the directly religious aims of the institution so constantly in view; but with the help of such books as the "Flock at the Fountain" (the edition with Mr. Robertson's illustrative reading lessons), and kindred manuals published by our Sunday-school Association, the difficulty may be got over. The very nature of the child invites us to this blessed work. We do not believe that children are wholly depraved and radically corrupt; but receiving fully the Saviour's declaration that, "Of such is the kingdom of heaven," we believe that God has made the young mind capable of knowing something of himself, and willing to respond with glad and ready interest to the voice of loving instruction addressed to its moral nature. We may begin, therefore, a course of direct religious teaching—if our own hearts be moved with religious feeling and faith—even with our youngest classes, and so far from being a dry, cold, unmeaning and unsatisfying occupation, it will be full of life, and interest, and happiness to both teachers and scholars. I recollect entering a class-room in the Bulfinch-street Sunday School, Boston, America, one Sunday afternoon, where upwards of twenty little children, varying in age, I should think, from about five to nine, were being instructed by a lady. The utmost order prevailed, and the little faces were brightly lighted up with eager interest as the teacher talked (not read) to them, with the help of a few pictures about the Life of Christ. This was the way to benefit such little ones, both as regards the matter and manner of the lesson, and also the arrangement by which it was given in a separate room.

In all the classes it is important that the teacher should draw much upon his own experience, and talk with his class simply and naturally, not only from the printed text book before him, but from the living book within him. In fact, the spirit with which a teacher enters upon his work is of far more importance than the book he uses. In the hands of a careless mechanical teacher, who puts no soul into his work, the Bible itself may become a most irreligious book; whilst in the hands of a devout, earnest, and affectionate teacher, a flower from the wayside, or an anecdote from the life of last week, may be made the medium of a most quickening and truly spiritual lesson. There are sad mistakes prevalent on this point. "I knew a boy of twelve," says Rev. Edward White, in his recently published "Mystery of Growth," "who, having discovered one of Field's microscopes on a Sunday afternoon, regaled himself for several hours by examining, with infinite delight, insects and flowers in the sunshine. His cousin finding him thus occupied in 'Sabbath breaking,' remonstrated with him on the impropriety of his occupation. 'Then I suppose,' was the answer, 'it is wrong to look at insects, or to see anything quite clearly on Sunday! and if so, why does your mother wear her spectacles when she is reading her Bible at church?'"

This story, for the truth of which Mr. White vouches, well brings out the mistake often made as to things sacred and secular. When we say in the words of Channing that, "the great work of the Sunday-school teacher is to teach Christ," we do not mean that he is to be constantly using that name, or that he is to teach only from the pages of Scripture. He may teach a great variety of subjects according to ability and opportunity. History, biography, travels, &c., will afford fitting topics, that in right hands may and will be made tributary to the great end. The life and teachings of Christ should be the central subject, the sun of the system, which should give light and warmth to all that is taught beside. But it is the spirit of the teacher, let me repeat, that makes the book he uses a truly religious book; it is the spirit of the teacher that makes the lesson he gives a really religious lesson. Immediately that he ceases to read and use a book with a sincere and true aim, and in the exercise of his own moral faculties, it ceases to be a religious lesson-book, at least in his hands, and to his class, even though every page may be full of the latent influence of truth and piety. Whilst in the hands of a religious teacher thoroughly in earnest every subject, even the commonest and lowliest, is naturally made promotive of religion.

Let me give an example in the words of one in whose experience the incident occurred. The teacher of a class was absent, and another stepped forward and took charge of it for the time. The boys had no books, but on looking round the pew (for the school was held in a chapel) the temporary teacher saw a small piece of wrought iron, which he took up, and something like the following conversation occurred:—"How came this here?" "H. T. left it here; he sits in this pew." "What is it?" "A piece of iron." "Where does iron come from?" "Out of the earth." "Does it come out of the earth in this form, and looking as this does?" "Oh, no; it is mixed with earth." "What is it called when it is dug out of the earth?" "Ore." "Is iron of any use?" "Oh yes." "How did people ever get on without it?" "I don't know; I don't see how they ever could do without it." "It seems to you absolutely necessary then, does it?" "Yes." "Look round this chapel; how much of the usefulness of iron can you see here?" The boys named nails, screws, stove, &c. "Are these all the things made of iron of which you can think?" "Oh no." "Does man make iron?" "No." "Who does?" "God." "We could not do without it, you think?" "No." "What, now, may this bit of old iron teach you?" "The goodness of God." "Suppose a religious and an irreligious man should happen to come to a mine of iron ore, would they probably have the same thoughts?" "No." "What would the irreligious man be likely to think of?" "Of how many things the iron would make; of how much money it was worth." "What would the religious man be likely to think of?" "The goodness of God." "Could man live without doing something for himself?" "No." "Suppose man did everything he could, unless something was done for him could he live? He may plough the ground and plant the seed, but can he make the seed grow?" "No." "Who helps man?" "God." "Can you move your hands, your feet? Can you talk and run?" "Yes." "Can you do these things or not as you please?" "Yes." "Will your hands, feet, tongue, &c., move of themselves?" "No." "Must you will, must you think to move them?" "Yes." "Could you live without breathing?" "No." "Do you think always before you breathe?" "No." "Must you keep breathing all the time?" "Yes." "Suppose you were obliged to think to breathe, just as you are obliged to think to move your hands, &c.?" "We couldn't do anything else." "Could you sleep?" "No." "Suppose you should, if that were possible, forget to breathe?" "We should die?" "Then, if you had to keep stopping to think to breathe, you could do nothing else, could you?" "No." "What, then, does the contrivance of your lungs, &c., so that breathing goes on regularly, without your being obliged to will or to think about it, teach?" "The goodness of God." "When you see a piece of iron, or when you consider that you keep breathing without thinking about it, what ought you to remember?" "The goodness of God." Here the regular teacher entered, and released the teacher who had temporarily supplied his place.*

Thus, if the heart of a teacher be animated by a right spirit, all his lessons will partake of a religious character. The Gospels will be his chief text-book, and the influence of the Gospels will pervade all his instructions, all his readings, and all his conversations with his scholars.

What, then, is the great need of Sunday schools? Not a large supply of expensive books. Not the presence and patronage of the wealthy and the great. Books are needful, and we are fortunate in having so good a choice among the many excellent publications of our London Sunday-school Association; and the co-operation in our schools of the highly-educated and influential is much to be desired on their own account, as well as for the sake of the schools. But the great, the indispensable need is zeal, faith, love, and above all, personal religion on the part of the teachers. These are the primary requisites of the good and successful teacher. If religion be not a reality to ourselves, the words of religious instruction will freeze upon our lips and fall like ice on those who listen to us, but if in our own experience we know its worth and blessedness when we speak of it to our scholars, we shall speak with a genuine warmth, and truth, and naturalness, and they will respond to our appeals. Do any say they are not fitted for this work? Let them then without delay seek to become qualified by entering at once the great normal school of Jesus Christ, and carrying on their preparation there. He is the best teacher who has come most completely under the influence of "the Master," and the Sunday school, beyond all other schools, must depend for its best and highest influence upon the strength and activity of the religious spirit in the hearts and lives of its teachers.

THE APPROACHING CONFERENCE OF THE LIBERATION SOCIETY.

EVERY three years the Liberation Society holds a great National Conference of its supporters, and our readers will have seen by the advertisement which has appeared in our columns that the next of these Triennial Conferences is to be held on Tuesday and Wednesday next. We are well aware that a considerable number of our readers, ministerial and otherwise, are already thoroughly interested in this society, but there are still many who oppose it, in the vain dream that they may yet see the so-called Church of England widened into a really comprehensive national Church, while a still larger number, though holding, so far as they think upon the subject at all, substantially the views on which the Liberation Society takes its stand, have hitherto kept aloof from it through a vague feeling of there being something narrow and bigoted in its methods of operation, or in dislike of the imputation of "political dissent." We wish, therefore, to draw attention to these meetings, in the hope that the whole subject may receive more consideration, and that more of our readers may endeavour to attend.

We Unitarians used to be the leaders in movements on behalf of religious freedom and equality, but of late years a paralysis of timid Broad Church proclivities seems to have come over many of our congregations. Accustomed in the past to find comparatively little sympathy or co-operation amongst Orthodox Dissenters, they have been half suspicious of a movement in favour of religious equality originating among Baptists and Independents who have yet to learn some of the first principles of religious liberty. They have been afraid lest the church-freedom which the Liberation Society has advocated, might turn out to be only a means of more effective sectarian discipline—a liberty for churches the more effectually to carry out the slave-owner's notion, of liberty to wallop his own niggers—the niggers in this case being all such heretics as Dr. COLenso and the Essayists and Reviewers. In fact, however, as such of our friends as have had anything to do with this society can testify—those among the orthodox bodies who approve of it, and work it, are those who do most truly understand religious liberty, and who take the broadest ground as to the constitution of Christian churches. Moreover, this society itself has been a liberal education to its orthodox members. Obligated by its constitution to make no distinction of sects, and to admit to their fullest co-operation such Unitarians as were willing to join, the distrust with which the co-operation of these was at first received in many quarters has been gradually giving way before a closer acquaintance; and we believe that wherever our ministers or our people are willing to give a helping hand, they find a cordial welcome. With one or two trifling exceptions, the catholic understanding of the society's original constitution has been faithfully observed, and it is impossible but that great good should result from such frank association as it has caused between the various sections of Nonconformity.

As to the real principle for the advancement of which the Liberation Society exists, we feel that argument for it is almost growing out of date. As Mr. GLADSTONE said on a kindred subject, "Time is on our side." The present movement against the Irish Church is opening people's eyes to what must be the ultimate basis of all ecclesiastical life. Mr. GLADSTONE and his fellow Church-of-England politicians may carefully draw their nice distinction between disestablishment in Ireland and disestablishment in England—undoubtedly the two do stand on different grounds—but the difference is one of quantity and not of principle. All, except Church-of-England politicians, must see this. Even our contemporary, the Inquirer, admitted a few weeks ago that the spirit of the time seemed more and more to be tending in the direction of free churches. The downfall of the Establishment in Ireland will reveal the hollowness of the principle on which the political supremacy of the Anglican Church is still maintained, and will moreover teach the significant lesson that even the difficulty of dealing with vast ecclesiastical properties is one which it is not impossible to overcome.

The real obstacle to this movement being taken up heartily in our churches is a kind of shrinking dislike of being twitted as "political dissenters," coupled with an hereditary disposition to take our stand rather with liberal Churchmen than with fellow Nonconformists. We hope, however, that such lingering prejudices as these will not be allowed to stand in the way of the plain duty of the time. So long as the Church of England keeps its ground as a political institution, it is impossible for those who dissent from it, or who think its ascendancy to be mischievous and wrong, to be otherwise than political dissenters, if they are to use the only means by which a political institution is to be modified. The Liberation Society is not more of a political organisation than the necessities of the case require. Certainly it is not more of a political organisation than the Church itself. It is an organisation against a huge injustice which was created by the State, and is maintained by the State, not merely to the injury of our smaller churches, but to the injury of religion itself. Instead of being based upon a narrow idea, it takes its stand upon the broadest of all. The advocate of even the widest comprehension, the most sanguine dreamer about some future broadest of broad churches, only hopes for the comprehension of agood many Dissenters, and still leaves the ultimate problem untouched. The Liberation Society proposes for that ultimate problem the simplest and the only practical solution—to do away with all establishments of religion in England, as they will be shortly done away with in Ireland, and to place all churches upon an absolute equality in the State.

THE ANNUAL MEETING OF THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

THE meeting will be held this year in Little Port. land-street Chapel, London; and it affords us great pleasure to announce that our distinguished and eloquent minister of New York, America, the Rev. Dr. Bellows, has kindly agreed to the wish of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association Committee to preach the sermon on this occasion. We believe there is every prospect that this meeting will be one of hearty reunion and earnest desires for usefulness among all the members of the Association. As our readers are aware, Dr. Bellows has been, during the past twelve months, on a tour among the cities of the continent and the East, having visited Egypt and Palestine, and is now in Rome. This leads us to expect an interesting address from him at the annual meeting.

THE NEW POPISH PLOT.

THOUGH all our readers by this time, no doubt, have formed their own estimate of the Premier's last fiction, the following analysis of it by the Pall Mall is deserving the notice of those who have not already seen it:—

Mr. Disraeli's last appearance in the character of Titus Oates, minus the perjury, is the oddest of all the surprising transformation scenes for which we have had to thank him of late years. When towards the close of the great Irish debate he first informed the world of his appalling discovery, it was natural to attribute something to the lateness of the hour and the excitement of the occasion. Even a Prime Minister may begin to see visions and dream dreams toward the small hours, after about five nights of incessant badgering. The worst of such utterances is that when cool reflection has come, the dignity of a Prime Minister's position cuts him off from that resource to which common mortals could so readily and gracefully betake themselves. If a military gentleman were to wait upon you, on the morning after the Derby, with a request for an explanation of the strange imputations which you had cast upon your most intimate friend of being a sanguinary Fenian, not to say an unprincipled head-centre with a general tendency towards felonious practices, you would probably find no difficulty in getting credit for the assertion that the language complained of was made use of in a fit of temporary excitement, and was not intended to convey any serious imputation on your friend's loyalty and general respectability. Such explanations, however, are not open to a Prime Minister when waited upon by a jealous constituent. Though it is human to err, so great a man must not admit that in the heat of debate he has talked nonsense. Vivian Grey at home must allow of no appeal from Vivian Grey in the House, but must justify in cold blood the language which he used after his exciting rounds with Mr. Lowe, Lord Cranborne, and other distinguished antagonists. It is amusing to see how he sets about it. His catechist is the Rev. Arthur Baker, rector of Addington, Bucks, who asks for an "explanation of" Mr. Disraeli's "alleged assertion that the High Church Ritualists had been long in secret combination, and were now in open confederacy with Irish Romanists for the destruction of the union between Church and State." With a fine sense of the proprieties of the occasion, Mr. Disraeli dates his reply "Hugghenden Manor, Maundy Thursday, 1868." The "Maundy Thursday" is an inestimable bit of local colour. Nothing could suit more admirably with the penitential tone or with the general subject of the letter. It calls up a lively image of the manner in which the Premier employs the sacred season of Lent. Let us go on, however, to the body of the letter. He admits Mr. Baker's right to question him, and he proceeds to answer, "You are under a misapprehension if you suppose that I intended to cast any slur upon the High Church party. I believe there is no body of men in this country to whom we have been more indebted, from the days of Queen Anne to the days of Queen Victoria, for the maintenance of the orthodox faith, the rights of the crown, and the liberties of the people." So far all is not only well, but natural. It would indeed be inconceivable that Mr. Disraeli should, have meant to turn his back upon the very strength of his own party. How could he ever be supposed to have meant to be disrespectful to the whole of the noble army of bishops, deans, canons, rectors, vicars, and curates, who are his warmest, his most natural allies, on account both of the consistency of his conservatism, and of the unsuspected orthodoxy with which he has always clung to the true old Church of England "orthodox faith," to use his own expression, to the confusion of all creed fanciers, epigrammists, Young Englanders, and other unstable persons? So far Mr. Baker's correspondent was of course on velvet. At this point, however, a different set of thoughts presented themselves. The High Church party were indeed respectable, but how about the Low Church party? Was there not a blessing for the younger brother as well as the elder, for the Recordite who was in the first transports of admiration over his newly discovered Protestant champion as well as for the High Churchman who had known and loved him from his youth up? Of course there was. "In saying this I have no wish to intimate that the obligations of the country to the other great party in the Church are not equally significant." The Record has its embrace as well as the Guardian. Without being tired of Leah with whom he has lived so long, the great Caucasian can appreciate the charms of Rachel. There is, however, a third party which has to some extent been left out in the cold. As Leah and Rachel had each her handmaid, so the composite Broad Church has been recruited in not very unequal proportions from the High and the Low. Equal recognition it cannot of course expect, as it is not, amongst the clergy at least, a great party; but still, Zilpah and Bilhah get a sort of wink of recognition. "I have never looked upon the existence of parties in our Church as a calamity. I look upon them as a necessity, and a beneficent necessity. They are the natural and inevitable consequences of the mild and liberal principles of our ecclesiastical polity, and of the varying and opposite elements of the human mind and character." The Liberal party is not expressly named or even directly indicated, but a principle is laid down large enough to comprehend, not only it, but every other party large enough to be noticeable.

If, then, no offence to anybody, that is to anybody who counts, was intended, the question naturally occurs, To whom, then, was Mr. Disraeli's language meant to apply? "When I spoke I referred to an extreme faction in the Church of very modern date, and that does not conceal its ambition to destroy the connection between Church and State, and which I have reason to believe has been for some time in secret combination, and is now in open confederacy, with the Irish Romanists for the purpose." Mr. Disraeli was obliged, unless he would condescend to eat his words, to find some sort of meaning for them, and he accordingly restricts his allusion to the very narrowest limits. He refers all to those extreme High Churchmen who go (unless we are mistaken) with Mr. Liddon to the extent of thinking that the connection between Church and State is irreconcilable with the spiritual character of the Church, and who would accordingly wish to see the Church disestablished; but what evidence there is that the party in question are "in open confederacy with the Irish Romanists" in any other sense than that in which we are all in open confederacy with those with whom we happen to agree upon particular points, though we may differ widely upon others, Mr. Disraeli carefully avoids explaining. He clearly, however, asserts its existence, for he artfully observes that "the Liberation Society, with its shallow and short-sighted fanaticism, is a mere instrument in the hand of this confederacy." The Liberation Society, of course, is far too vulgar and contemptible to be flattered, nor is there much chance that flattery would be of use with it. It is therefore trampled upon without mercy. It "will probably be the first victim of the spiritual despotism the Liberation Society is now blindly working to establish." Mr. Miall was much astonished, the other day by Dean Stanley. He will learn with even more astonishment that as soon as the Church of England has ceased to exist as an establishment he will be burnt in Smithfield by Dr. Manning and Dr. Pusey, according to the practice which, as we all know, is commonly pursued on similar occasions in New York and Boston. How else the Liberation Society can be made a victim to a spiritual despotism we cannot imagine. However, this may be, Mr. Disraeli backs his opinions like a man. He sees how, where, and why ruin and destruction unutterable lie on the fatal path in which we are travelling, and he is the man for the crisis. "As I hold that the dissolution of the union between Church and State will cause permanently a greater revolution in this country than foreign conquest, I shall use my utmost energies to defeat their fatal machinations." See what it is to have secret intelligence, and to sit at the centre of things. The only machinations of which the world at large is aware, are ordinary party combinations, which bring together upon particular subjects persons who differ upon others. The only things to which they seem likely to be fatal are Mr. Disraeli's Government and the Irish Established Church, but Mr. Disraeli himself knows better. No man can play better the part of Buckingham in "Richard III." when he and Gloster enter "in rotten armour, marvellous ill-favoured," on the walls of the Tower:

"Tut, I can counterfeit the deep tragedian;
Speak and look back, and pry on every side;
Tremble and start at wagging of a straw,
Intending deep suspicion."

John Harland, Esq., F.S.A., of Manchester.

MR. HARLAND, the announcement of whose death appears in another column, was widely known both as one of the oldest members of the press and as an antiquary of wide and varied research. Born in Hull 62 years ago, he learned the trade of a printer. Even in his apprenticeship, however, he gave all his energies to self-improvement, and, teaching himself shorthand, rose from printing to reporting. With indomitable industry, he made himself the most expert shorthand writer in the kingdom. There was no great field for the exercise of such a talent in Hull, but a curious incident brought him into wider notice. A member of the Bowalley Lane Unitarian congregation, he was in the habit, whenever a strange minister preached, of taking down his sermon, and presenting him with a copy of it fairly written out. On one occasion, in 1830, when Dr. Beard had given a special address, Mr. Harland called on him the next day with his speech thus reported verbatim, and Dr. Beard was so struck with the perfect accuracy of it that he mentioned the circumstance to the late Mr. John Edward Taylor, who was then conducting the Manchester Guardian with that energy and ability which placed it at the head of the provincial press. The consequence was that Mr. Harland removed to Manchester, where for thirty years he continued the connection thus pleasantly begun.

"With the rapidity," says the Guardian, "with which this manufacturing capital of the north advanced during the second quarter of this century, the demands upon the local newspaper press were increased. Mr. Harland responded to those demands, and created, for the first time, an appetite for newspaper reading of local matters, which he was also the first to supply. As the Manchester Guardian increased the frequency of its publications, from weekly to bi-weekly in 1836, and to daily in 1855, Mr. Harland surrounded himself by able men, some of whom have since become eminent in their profession in still wider spheres. He directed their labours with a rare skill, while he communicated to them some of his own untiring energy and high sense of duty. His love of verbal accuracy amounted almost to a passion. This, and the severe discipline which he considered necessary for the efficient performance of the duties of his department, created an admiration for Mr. Harland's character, in the minds of some who benefited by his business counsels, which deepened into affection; while upon those less soldierly in disposition it produced the impression, still met with among the traditions of the profession, of an austere and iron rule."

But, even while thus busied with his own professional work, he made time for the culture of literary tastes in other and higher directions. Possessing a keen sense of humour, endowed with considerable poetical powers, a good Latinist, and a loving student of early English history, he speedily made himself a reputation among local literary men, and, as his pursuits took more decidedly the direction of archaeology, he became far more widely known as an antiquarian. He was elected a fellow of the Society of Antiquaries, and has been one of the most prominent members of the Chetham Society, for which he edited no less than 14 curious volumes, mostly relating to Manchester and Lancashire in olden times. For skill in deciphering old manuscripts and supplying the clue to the understanding of brief fragmentary records, to which, no doubt, his thorough habituation to shorthand contributed, he was probably without an equal. Yet all this was done not only with very scanty leisure, but in face of bodily infirmity, his health having been greatly affected for many years past by a disease of the knee-bone, which compelled the use of crutches, and obliged him a few years ago to retire from the Manchester Guardian.

His greatest work was his last. "Baines's Lancashire" had been long out of print, and an enterprising publisher resolved to bring out a fresh edition of it, which should at once correct the many errors of the older edition, prune it of matter now obsolete, and carry on its histories to the present time. Mr. Harland's reputation pointed him out as the man fittest to undertake such a work, and it was accordingly placed in his hands. A less conscientious man would have contented himself with some slight modification of the rich materials afforded by the original work, but with Mr. Harland nothing would suffice but the most careful examination, verification of authorities, and revision almost amounting to the re-writing of the whole. As if Baines was not enough, he took up, for intervals of light labour, the editing of a new edition of "Gregson's Fragments;" and it is to be feared that the intense application which these two works involved, contributed to the illness which has carried him off just as his task was approaching completion.

A sincere and earnest Unitarian, Mr. Harland was one of the founders of the chapel in New Bridge-street, and having a few years ago returned to the same neighbourhood, after living for a number of years in distant parts of the suburbs, he again joined the congregation, feeling a very deep interest and sympathy in the experiment of its conversion into an "open church." One of the last questions he asked during his illness was, whether there was any way in which he could serve the church before he passed away, and among the many hundreds of people, including the best intellect of the neighbourhood, that gathered at the Rusholme Cemetery on Tuesday last to pay honour to his memory, were not a few of his sorrowing fellow-worshippers.

FIRESIDE READINGS.

THE STREET SINGERS.

A THREADBARE workman, with a wife and row
Of shivering children, singing in the street—
Discord that sadly fills the heart, although
The thing may be a cheat.

Better be cheated, and let no doubt start
About the man's mock-miserable condition;
Better believe his plaint than have your heart
Contracted by suspicion.

Give him your penny, and believe him true;
The ways of Providence are wisely dim;
Your alms may purchase the reward for you,
The punishment for him.

'Tis well to keep your charity awake,
To run a thousand risks of being cozen'd,
And hold your heart still open for the sake
Of one among the thousand.

THE WINDOW THAT MADE FACES UGLY.

PART II.

"My darling," said the mother to the sick child,
"this doctrine of the Trinity is not a subject for you to think about now, you must wait until you are older before you can understand it."

"But, mother, I cannot help thinking about it, for if it is true, I shall never like to think about God any more."

"Hush, my child, you must not speak like this."

"Yes, but it is quite true, mother, what nurse has told me makes God seem all confused, just as the bull's eye in the window, you know, made you or father look confused when I looked at you through it; and it makes me so weary to look at Him, you know—I mean to think about Him. I look and look and look and can make nothing out."

Oh, it is just like looking through the knotted glass which made me so tired."

"Turn away your mind for a time, and try to forget all about it."

"Oh, mother," cried Harry rather impatiently, "I have told you I can't. I must make it out. Why, you know nurse went on to read to me that every one who did not believe that doctrine about the Trinity, without doubt he should perish everlastingly. Now, if that is true, I ought to think about it. And oh, mother, I am afraid I don't believe it; for, try as I wish, I cannot believe it—I cannot make three into one, and one into three."

"My darling, listen then to me: I do not believe the doctrine which nurse has put into your mind."

"But, mother, does not the Bible say it is true?"

"I do not think it does. In the passage which nurse read to you, Jesus, I think, meant to say: Go and teach all nations, baptising them, and telling them that God is a loving Father, telling them that He sent Jesus, and made him His beloved son, to show men that they might all be sons of God, telling them that God was with them all—a holy spirit, seeking to guide them into all goodness."

"But are there not other passages, mother, which people think teach this doctrine?"

"There is one, the last verse in the 2nd Epistle of Paul to the Corinthians.—'The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost be with you all.' I think the Apostle meant here to wish that the influence of Jesus Christ might draw them to be like him, and that they might love God and have the guidance of His Holy Spirit. This verse, then, means nearly the same as the other."

"But is there no other verse, mother, that seems to teach the Trinity?"

"There is a verse in our common version of the New Testament in 1st John v. 7, 'And there are three that bear record in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost, and these three are one.' But all really learned scholars have decided that this verse was not in the New Testament at first for at least five hundred years. It is not found now in any Latin manuscripts earlier than the ninth century after Christ, nor in any Greek manuscript earlier than the 15th century."

"How did it come into the New Testament, then?"

"You know, my dear, that for more than a thousand years, copies of the New Testament, as well as of other books, had to be made in writing with pens. Well, probably at some time or other some one who had a copy of the New Testament made a note in the margin of what he thought about the heavenly witnesses. By and by, years after, a copyist was making a New Testament from this copy, and mistook what was in the margin for a part of the text, and copied it in where he thought it ought to be."

"Then, really, it ought to be struck out of the New Testament."

"I think so; but, my darling, let me bring this lesson to an end by saying that though, as I believe, the doctrine of the Trinity is not in the Scriptures, still I must say that if it were there I could not believe it, I should think the writer mistaken."

"How would you know, mother?"

"Let me ask you a question, Harry. Do you think I want you to love me?"

"O, mother, I am sure you do, and I am sure I love you," throwing his arms round her neck.

"Well, now, suppose I were obliged to go away from you for a long time, do you think if these bulls-eye-windows still remained in your room that I should come and just show myself to you through the tormenting knobs and wrinkles?"

"O, I am sure you would not tease me so."

"Do you think if you never saw me but through such knobs you would like to think about me?"

"No, I am sure I should not. I should hate the very thought of you, because it would be so wearisome to me."

"Well, Harry, the Heavenly Father, who is more tender than the tenderest mother, desires to have us love Him—love Him with all our heart and mind, and soul, and strength; and therefore, you know, would not ask us to think of Him in such a way as would make Him seem wearisome and disagreeable. That would be the way to make us hate Him rather than love Him."

"O, I think I see it now, mother. But how came people ever to think that the Heavenly Father wanted us to think of him in such a queer way?"

"Well, ages and ages ago, I suppose people's minds were not as educated as they are now. There were knobs and wrinkles of ignorance and mistake in them. People looked through these and saw God all distorted and confused, and thought he was as the window of their minds made him seem."

"Ah, I see I was right then: the knobs did come back, only they were in my own mind, but they are gone now, dear mother."

"Don't let them come again, my child. Whenever nurse or any one else gives you a view of God which makes him seem unlovely or repulsive to you, and tells you that God wishes you to have that view of Him, do not believe it. Say to yourself—'God wishes me to love Him, and therefore he cannot wish me to think of Him in such a way as will make me not love Him.'"

"I think I can remember that, mother."

"Well, now, try to go to sleep: I will sit by you and sew." Harry turned his head to the wall, but his little brain had been so excited and troubled by the difficult thoughts which nurse had put into it, that it was a long time before he could rest. However, at last his mother heard the long-drawn breath which showed that quiet sleep had delivered him from his perplexities, and then she quietly stole from the room.

GOOD FRIDAY AT SEVILLE.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Morning Post gives an interesting account of the ceremonies in Seville during the Holy Week, from which we extract the following description of what was to be seen in one of the principal squares, which was crowded to its furthest corners, and the balconies of the houses in which, from bottom to top, were alive with black mantillas and fans:

Everybody is gay and smiling. A flourish of trumpets and the first notes of the stirring Spanish national air announce the arrival of the Infantes. They, like everybody else to-day, have walked aloft from their palace outside the walls, and are dressed in the deep mourning which is proper to the occasion. They are very popular, and the two daughters are very handsome, but there is no cheering on Good Friday, only a general uncovering and rising as they take their places. And now a line of gendarmes, who have been waiting at the end of the Calle de las Sierpes, advance to clear the way, followed immediately by the procession itself, all moving at a very slow pace. First come the penitents, strange-looking creatures, clad in long gowns, and tall canonical hats covering the face and shoulders, with two holes for the eyes, and each holding a candle nearly as long as themselves. They are well-to-do people all these, as you may see by their dandy varnished shoes and silk stockings, and they will think themselves well repaid for their trouble by an indulgence or a dispensation, both of which are carried to an extreme point here. Some of them are barefoot, all are silent, and, in spite of the bright colours of which their dresses are made, they look very lugubrious as they pass with a slow and solemn step at long intervals. Mixed with them are a number of Lancers, and further on an infantry regiment, all with reversed arms—a spectacle which shocks my French friend—who thinks that it is disgraceful for soldiers to be mixed up with what he calls "Une telle mascarade." For half an hour these penitents pass in two long lines, relieved every now and then by a group in the middle bearing a banner or a casket. And now there come priests in stiff gold copes, followed by close-shaven, mouse-headed boys swinging censers which fill the air with gray smoke. After them, in the midst of a group of gentlemen in simple dress suits, there walks a handsome young lady, attired magnificently in white and gold, blindfolded, bearing the handkerchief which shows that she represents St. Veronica, and with a blush on her cheek, which you set down to the novelty of the position, until you are told that it is nothing more nor less than paint. Then follow more penitents, and a number of children, four or five years old, dressed as angels, of red and orange with much gold lace, and wings of gauze which droop and draggle disconsolately behind them. Soon after you hear the music of a military band play a solemn air very much out of tune (not because the musicians cannot play in tune, but because they are not allowed to do so in Holy Week), and you see an enormous structure advancing slowly into the square, and towering almost to the roofs of the low houses. It is a great platform, carried by some forty or fifty men, concealed by hangings, and upon it is a representation of the descent from the cross, in wooden figures the size of life, which nod and tremble with the motion as though they would come down upon you in a heap. Two Roman soldiers, in correct costume, are mounted on ladders at the top of the cross, while at its foot kneel Mary Magdalen and the Virgin, in long velvet robes, literally covered with gold embroidery and crowned with jewelled tiaras. At its approach all the spectators rise and uncover, though you will conclude from the remarks you may understand, that there is much more admiration felt for the richness of the Virgin's robe than reverence for the subject represented. After being set down before the Infantes for a few minutes the platform is again advanced, and now comes the band, followed by a body of young men dressed as Roman soldiers, in short blue and white tunics, velvet boots and helmets, crowned with nodding plumes of an extravagant length. They have their vizors down, and carry spears and shields, walking three abreast at long intervals, but their dresses are not expensive enough to save them from some ridicule, and, as if to show that they are mere shams after all, they are followed by a compact body of modern troops in close order, after whom come the rabble, marking the end of the procession. There are five more such displays to follow this afternoon, but they are all more or less of the same character, though the subjects represented vary, the most favoured being perhaps Maria Santissima en los Misteriosos Dolores, whose robe, trailing to the ground, is more richly embroidered than any of the others. Formerly these various scenes of the Passion were represented by living people, but the carved groups were substituted some time ago in consequence of scandals having arisen, and at present the same platforms are brought out every year, with the exception of one or two, which are only produced once every eight or ten years. These processions are organised, and all the expenses are borne by the penitents, who form several confradías, or brotherhoods, each distinguished by its peculiar colour of dress, and each possessing from one to three of the carved groups. They have certainly a hard time of it those penitents, for on Friday the processions began at two o'clock in the afternoon, and at ten o'clock at night I met them still winding their slow length through the streets. Indeed, the night is, perhaps, the best time to see them, for when each man has lit his huge candle, and when the thousand tapers (literally a thousand) with which, to the imminent danger of the fine dresses, the platforms are surrounded, are also lit, the effect is something very striking indeed.

EAST CHESHIRE CHRISTIAN UNION.

THE annual meeting of this missionary association was held in the Unitarian Church, Stockport, on Saturday the 18th inst.; Major COPPOCK in the chair. There were present most of the ministers given below, and also delegates from several of the mission stations and other friends. Reports were read by the secretary (Rev. A. Payne), and by Revs. R. C. Dendy and F. Revitt, missionaries. From these it appeared that eight stations are aided by the funds of the Union; those at Flowery Field, Mottram, and Stalybridge having the services of the above-named missionaries, the others depending principally upon the assistance of lay friends. The income for last year was £324. 13s. 8d., leaving a balance of £47. 5s. in the treasurer's hands. This favourable state of the funds, however, was the result of special efforts which had been made by some of the congregations, and a donation of £20 from the committee of the Provincial Assembly. Had it not been for the extraordinary aid thus obtained, the accounts would have shown a considerable deficit. To maintain present operations in an efficient state, it will be necessary that the ordinary collections should be permanently increased by one third. The office-bearers for the ensuing year were then elected, and the meeting closed with a vote of thanks to the chairman.

At the close of the business meeting a social meeting was held in the schoolroom, at which Major COPPOCK again presided. He was supported by Rev. A. Payne, Wilmslow, secretary; Rev. H. Green, M.A., Knutsford; Rev. H. E. Dowson, B.A., Gee Cross; Rev. J. Page Hopps, Dukinfield; Rev. J. Worthington, Bolton; Rev. R. C. Dendy, Flowery Field; Rev. F. Revitt, Mottram; Rev. D. Berry, Mossley; Rev. J. Black, M.A., Stockport; Mr. Samuel Greg, Macclesfield; Mr. R. Carling, Bolton, &c.

After tea the CHAIRMAN opened the proceedings with a brief address, thanking the members of the union for their visit to the town; and said that the reports read at the business meeting showed that real good was being done by this missionary enterprise. He regretted that the suggestions put forth by himself and others, that Lancashire and Cheshire should unite in forming one large missionary establishment, whereby one expense would have sufficed, had not been adopted. This was the eighth anniversary of the missionary enterprise in Cheshire in connection with Unitarianism, and he was glad so much had been done by their separate efforts. Seven congregations were mainly or entirely supported by the union.

The Rev. D. BERRY (Mossley) read a paper on "The encouragements to and defects of our Unitarian missionary operations."

After remarking that all genuine Christians must be possessed of the missionary spirit, the paper went on to notice the busy activity with which Catholics and the orthodox churches were prosecuting their missionary labours, and asked "what have Unitarian churches been doing?" Until within a few years little missionary spirit was amongst them. Now, however, believing their views to be more pure than those of any other sect, the missionary spirit was taking firmer root, and there had been established in the United Kingdom twenty-six district societies for the dissemination of their opinions. Many churches had been erected throughout the kingdom as a result of their missionary enterprise, many churches that seemed to be dying away had become full of life, and active and earnest ministers had been placed in charge of others whose zeal had almost become extinct. But there were certain defects which had rendered the fruits of their labours less satisfactory. One was that of assigning several mission stations to one missionary. The association would better perform its work by adopting—first, that in places where it was thought there was hope, a minister should be stationed, not as a missionary, where he would be able to look after his people, and by repeatedly bringing before them the desirability of ceasing as soon as possible to be dependent upon the missionary association, would be a means of adding many new and self-supporting churches. In the case of flourishing missions, the association to make an annual grant gradually diminishing each year, until the whole amount was realised by the congregation, whereby a spirit of independence would be developed. Another defect was the want of a building fund. It was a shame that some of their congregations should be compelled to worship in such miserable rooms. They knew it was impossible for a new mission to erect a suitable place, and the expenses might be greatly curtailed by the establishment of a mission building fund. Another defect in their branch missionary operations was the ab-sonce of attention to the work of visiting and want of interest in the Sunday schools; because to know their people and to feel an interest in them they must be visited at home, and the school must not fail to be considered the nursery of the church.

After some discussion, in which Rev. Henry Green, Mr. S. Greg, and Rev. J. Page Hopps took part, Mr. R. CARLING (Bolton) introduced the question of "The formation of missionary churches and their organisation."

He said that for more than thirty years he had been accustomed to work of that description, and he had come to the conclusion that Unitarians had failed because they began at the broad instead of the narrow end. He had more faith in a man beginning with a £20 note and working himself up to a £40,000 mill, than one beginning with a mill of that amount without the character to maintain his position. He could see no reason why the Lancashire and East Cheshire Unions should not be united. He then alluded to endeavours made to establish churches at Blackburn and Wigan, but which failed for lack of zeal on the part of their promoters, and referred to the opening of the new church at Accrington, some days ago, at a cost of £1,000. He also reported favourably of Mossley and Mottram, where the Unitarians, by joining a number of secessionists from a Methodist New Connexion, who had drifted into Unitarianism, an encouraging church was formed. He then suggested visitation to the small villages near Stockport to hold converse with the inhabitants, and when the nucleus of a church was formed he had no doubt of the liberality of Unitarians for assistance. When such churches were formed the organisation would be a matter to be carried out as the materials presented themselves, adopting such plans as were best suited to the circumstances. He urged a thorough appreciation of their own principles, and advised them to make as much of their Christian life as their common business.

The Rev. J. WORTHINGTON (Bolton) next addressed the meeting. He was not in favour of a distinction between the minister and the missionary, and advocated earnest individual effort.

POOLE.

ON Monday week, the ceremony of laying the foundation stone of the New Unitarian Chapel, took place on the site of the old edifice, which is now pulled down. The stone was laid by THOMAS NAISH, Esq., of Poole, in the presence of a large number of spectators. The building will be in the Gothic style, of white brick with Bath stone dressings. The church, independently of the vestibule, will be 50 feet long by 34 feet wide. It will be open seated, and all the wood work will consist of stained deal. The church will be arranged so as to accommodate 200 worshippers. There will be no gallery, but one may be added if it is found necessary to provide accommodation for a larger number of persons. The contract price is £820, exclusively of the schools, which are included in the design. They are to be built on the western side of the church, but it is not decided whether they shall be proceeded with at the present time.

The Rev. L. LEWIS, of London, having offered prayer, Mr. J. DABY delivered an address, after which the stone was duly laid by Mr. Naish. It simply had cut on it the figures "1868." Mr. NAISH, in laying the stone, pronounced the following words:—"My Christian friends, now is laid the corner-stone of a church dedicated to the worship and service of the one true and living God, our Heavenly Father, and to the preaching of the Gospel of His Son, our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ."

The Rev. E. KELL, M.A., then briefly described the contents of the bottle which had been deposited under the stone, stating that as they were depositing themselves by the experience of those who had gone before them, they should deposit memorials which would be valuable to those who would come after them when future generations would be in their graves, and the church now about to be erected would be demolished. After another hymn and prayer, the proceedings terminated.

At half-past five a tea meeting was held at the Temperance Hall. The chair was occupied by Mr. Darby, and addresses were delivered by Revs. E. Kell, M.A., J. Cropper, M.A., R. Yelland, and J. B. Lloyd; Messrs. Welch, Balston, W. J. Pike, and W. N. Western.

INTELLIGENCE.

BLACKLEY.—As will be seen from our obituary, the congregation here has lost one of its oldest members, by the death of the late respected Nathan Broadhurst, who died at Manchester on the 9th ult., and was interred in the burial ground of Blackley Unitarian Chapel, on Sunday, the 12th. He was the last male survivor of an old and respected family, that has been from the first connected with that chapel, the foundation stone of which was laid by one of his ancestors in the year 1676.

BURY DISTRICT SUNDAY-SCHOOL UNION.—On Sunday, April 26th, the first gathering of the Union for the present season took place at Heywood. About 150 were present. After tea the Rev. John Fox took the chair, and welcomed all who had come from the other schools, viz., Bury, Ainsworth, Heap Bridge, and Stand.—Mr. John Spencer, of Ainsworth, read the report of the visitors to the schools in union during the past six months, which showed that the schools were in good working order, and that the schools at Heywood and Heap Bridge were particularly worthy of praise. The usual Whit-Sunday gathering of scholars and teachers was arranged to take place at Bank-street, Bury, and the Rev. W. C. Squier, of Stand, requested to officiate. A picnic to Simpson Clough was also arranged to take place on the 9th of May. Mr. Spencer then read a paper on "The true work of our Sunday schools." A discussion followed, in which Messrs. Wormald, T. Holt, and J. Reynolds (Bury), Collinson (Heywood), Wm. Freeston (Heap Bridge), and the chairman took part. The next meeting was arranged for Ainsworth, Sunday, June 14th, when Mr. Wm. Freeston, of Heap Bridge, will read a paper on "The preparation of lessons."

HULL: BOWLALEY-LANE CHAPEL.—On Sunday week, the last of a course of Sunday morning discourses was given by the Rev. J. M. Dixon, on "Religion the Poetry of our Nature."

LONDON.—A course of Sunday evening lectures, by the Rev. N. Green, on the leading doctrines of Unitarian Christianity, has just been concluded. They have been well attended, and excited a good deal of interest.

OLDHAM.—On Saturday last, the cricket club of the Sunday school held its annual tea party, when a good number were present, and agreeably entertained by amusements.

SALFORD: FORD-STREET.—On Sunday last two sermons were preached in this place in aid of the Sunday school, that in the morning by the Rev. J. Freeston, and that in the evening by the Rev. Wm. Gaskell, M.A. The collections were upwards of £6.

SHEFFIELD: UPPER CHAPEL SUNDAY SCHOOLS.—The anniversary sermons were preached on Sunday last, by the Rev. Brooke Herford, of Strangeways Unitarian Free Church, Manchester, when the collections amounted to £36 14s. 11d.

WHAT SHOULD UNITARIAN MINISTERS BE ABLE TO DO?

To the Editors.—In the Herald of the 10th inst., you have inserted a semi-editorial, semi-official article, under a heading very similar to the above, and upon that article I ask to be permitted to make a few remarks. I wish your rule allowed this to be done anonymously, as I do not desire publicity, or see that argument gains any strength by the name of the person who uses it. The sum and substance of the article in question is, that unless a person has received a thorough university education he is unfit to be an Unitarian minister. I demur to this proposition altogether. Not because I undervalue high scholarship and solid learning, but because it is made to do duty in most extravagant fashion. If Unitarian ministers were always engaged in controversy, and that controversy mainly rested upon the verbal accuracy of our translation of the Bible, then a more than usual knowledge of Hebrew and Greek, ecclesiastical and doctrinal history, might be essential; but it is not so. Between the plenary inspiration of the orthodox and the inspiration of spirit and purpose as set forth by Unitarians, there is a gulf so deep that no translation, new or old, can bridge it over. To lay down such elaborate conditions of ministerial labour is to have many of our pulpits unoccupied as heretofore, and to discourage men who have acquired facility of expression in the statement and defence of opinion from offering us their aid, and Unitarianism injured thereby. Of all systems of religion Unitarianism is easiest understood; of all systems of religion it contains by far the fewest difficulties; and it is the only religion which contains no doctrines which stand in the way of the universal improvement of mankind. Why, then, has it not made its way in the world? Because it has lacked the zeal of the Wesleyan, the firm adherence of the Calvinist, and the patient, hopeful plodding of the pioneer of progress. In my own opinion, the first qualification of an Unitarian minister is that he be deeply, heartily, and thoroughly convinced of the truth of Unitarianism; next, to state and defend it in all its integrity, and thus effect the deliverance of his own soul; next, that he should have a thorough sympathy with all efforts made for mental, moral, social, and theological progress. I by no means wish to assert or indicate that these conditions are incompatible with solid learning and high scholarship; but I maintain they ought to stand first, not last, in ministerial qualifications. It is true that by thus inverting the order of things our ministers may produce few works of high character (always very few, whatever the University qualifications); but they will do far greater things; they will teach people to form their opinions on a broader basis, and with a freedom hitherto unknown, thus dealing a fatal blow to superstition; bring about a greater assimilation to the person, character, and mission of Christ, and morally vindicate the ways of God to men.—Yours, Burnley, 59, Tulledge-road. J. C. FARN.

[Without criticising our correspondent's argument, with which in the main we agree, it is only fair to say that he has put a construction on the article to which his letter refers, that it will not fairly bear.—EDS. U.H.]

MANCHESTER DOMESTIC MISSIONS.—ROCHDALE ROAD CHAPEL.

In the late severe storm the wall of an adjoining manufactory, which had been left standing after a fire, was blown down, and in its fall destroyed the outbuildings, heating apparatus, &c., of the Rochdale Road Chapel. The Committee are obliged to ask for help towards Rebuilding the premises destroyed; and as the Schools have for some time past been in Want of Proper Class Rooms, avail themselves of this opportunity of erecting them on the ground where the former offices stood, and where the needful accommodation can be obtained for about £100. The street which runs behind the Chapel has to be paved, and this will require an outlay of nearly £150, therefore it is needed, towards which is intended to devote the £40 which was given so generously by the Strangeways Sewing School, and also £10 contributed by Mr. Berry, the owner of the adjoining manufactory. £100 will, therefore, have to be raised by voluntary gifts, and the Committee trust that the liberal donations of the supporters of the truly Christian work of the Missions will speedily provide the Funds required.

Subscriptions will be thankfully received by the treasurer, Mr. R. D. DARBISHIRE, B.A., 26, George-street; Rev. W. GASKELL; Rev. S. ROBINSON, St. Oswald's Grove, Rochdale Road; or Rev. S. ALFRED STEINTHAL, 107, Upper Brook-street.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

At a Baptist meeting, the Rev. W. Bailey, of Berhampore, after showing that Hindooism was not merely the worship of idols, but entwined itself with all the affairs of life, said that the Temple of Juggernaut cost not less than £500,000. It is 210 feet high, and the wall which surrounds it 30 feet high. The whole enclosure is as much as a quarter of a mile, and 100,000 persons are directly or indirectly supported by the shrine.

The present population of Constantinople is said to be about a million, of whom 300,000 are Christians, the rest being Mohammedans of the most bigoted type. The latter mostly occupy the old city—the ancient Byzantium; while the former occupy the greater part of Pera, and are scattered through the other suburbs. There is no law compelling such separation; but upon the principle that “birds of a feather flock together,” the Moslems keep by themselves, and the Christians as far off as circumstances admit.

The story which has been going the round of the papers, that Mr. Peabody “left the Pope £200,000 on quitting Rome,” is contradicted. What he really did was to make a gift of 10,000 dollars to one of the educational institutions there; and the Pope, in return, allowed him to sit in his presence, and presented him with his carte-de-visite, and a Latin quotation in praise of benevolence, written with his own Papal hand.

The eldest son of Mr. George Lane Fox, of Bramham Park, Yorkshire, withdrawing himself from the fashionable life of London, has become a Dominican novice in the monastery of Santa Sabina, at Rome, where St. Dominick was once a recluse. It is stated that Mr. Fox voluntarily inflicts upon himself severer penance even than the rules of the order require; and that he intends to embrace the strictest rules of monastic life, as prescribed by the Carthusians or Trappists.

The Paris correspondent of the Guardian gives a deplorable account of the low, materialistic tone of feeling which prevails there among the members of the Faculty of Medicine. The opinions that man is a “plant,” a “machine,” an “ape” minus the tail, are again in vogue; and at the opening of a lecture, it is by no means unusual for the class to hail the entrance of the professor, and show their sympathy with his known opinions, and his teaching, by cries of “Vive le matérialisme!” Among the things openly taught are that “no such thing as freewill exists,” that “conscience is a mere property of matter,” that “crime is the logical, direct, and inevitable result of the passion which prompts it.” The pupils, of course, strive not to be behind their masters. One of them, in an essay, “approved, admitted, and allowed to be printed,” tells us that “to talk of liberty of action is nonsense,” that “man obeys the laws of his nature, as the stone falls to the ground,” that “responsibility exists for none,” [another denies all idea of a Creator, as “dangerous and useless;” and a third settles the matter by declaring that all belief in a soul or the existence of a God are simply “manifestations of lunacy.”

Appropos of the Keble College, it is stated that the Christian Year, which was first printed in 1827, has reached, exclusive of those published abroad, its 110th edition and its 265th thousand.

The sitting of the Convocation of the Province of Canterbury has been prorogued to Tuesday, the 19th of this month; and it is announced that it will then meet only pro forma.

It is stated that Dean Alford has consented to preside at the anniversary festival of the Chesbunt College (Lady Huntingdon), when the sermon will be preached by the Rev. T. Binney.

The Lancashire Congregationalists, at a meeting held in Manchester a fortnight ago, set a good example to other voluntaries in providing the means for extending religious instruction. Though only a few years since several of those present had subscribed some thousands of pounds for the same object, and notwithstanding the present depressed state of trade in the manufacturing districts, £20,000 were subscribed in the room, and it is expected that this sum will be increased to £30,000.

The Rev. A. H. Charteris, M.A., author of the “Life of Dr. Robertson,” has been appointed by the Crown to the chair of Biblical Criticism in the University of Edinburgh, vacant by the death of Dr. Robert Lee.

From the following divisions which have taken place on the abolition of the Irish Establishment, it appears that the numbers arrayed against it have nearly doubled in thirteen years:

The Ecclesiastical Titles Act Committee report that the repeal of the act will in no way enable the hierarchy of the Roman Catholic Church to assume any civil or temporal precedence or authority within the realm, or cause any detriment or inconvenience to the State, or to any class of Her Majesty's subjects, while it would tend to allay the irritation and remove the sense of wrong which that legislation undoubtedly excited among the Roman Catholics of the United Kingdom.

The Government Education Bill has been read a second time in the Lords, where it originated. The Archbishop of Canterbury accepted it for the clergy, and Lord Granville thought it entitled to a second reading. The good point in it is that it breaks ground on payment for secular education, and it will likewise pay uncertificated teachers for results. The whole question, however, will no doubt have to be referred to the next Parliament.

At the sixty-ninth annual meeting of the Religious Tract Society, it was stated that the number of publications issued from the depository during the past year was 40,991,763, being an increase of 2,271,272 over the previous year; and that the proximate circulation from the formation of the society was 1,238,990,000.

According to the Globe, it is probable that the bishopric of Hereford will be offered either to Archdeacon Bickersteth or to the Dean of York. The Church Times urges that it should be conferred on Archdeacon Denison. It says:

“Putting aside his great claims on the Tories as regards subjects ecclesiastical, we cannot forget that no one rendered Mr. Disraeli more efficient assistance last session than the Archdeacon's father-in-law, Mr. Henley.”

The Rev. John J. Walters, of Ide, near Exeter, signs a petition in favour of the disestablishment of the Irish Church as follows:—“John J. Walters, M.A., vicar of Ide (who signs in the conviction that the death of the Establishment will be the birth of the Irish Protestant Church).”

The Select Committee to whom the Church Rates Bill is referred are:—The Lord Chancellor, the Archbishop of York, the Lord Privy Seal, the Duke of Somerset, the Duke of Richmond, the Duke of Buckingham, the Earl of Shaftesbury, the Earl of Carnarvon, the Earl of Romney, Earl Beauchamp, Earl Russell, the Earl of Kimberley, Viscount Halifax, the Bishop of London, the Bishop of Oxford, the Bishop of Carlisle, Lord Delamere, Lord Stanley of Alderley, and Lord Westbury.

From a statement given at a recent Synod, it appears that in the London district there are nine branches of the Mormon Church, 107 elders of conference, 53 priests, 24 teachers, 30 deacons, in all 1,172 members. It was reported that during the previous six months 132 persons had been baptised, 4 had died, and 16 been cut off. It was stated that Utah is filling so rapidly that it is doubtful whether all the Latter-day Saints in England will be able to get away there this year.

The “grand monde” of Paris, according to the correspondent of the Pall Mall, has been very much ruffled by a sermon of the Bishop of Geneva, preached in the Church of St. Clotilde, in the course of which he trod, figuratively speaking, upon the trains, tore the lace, and disarranged the chignons of the female portion of his audience. The simple Swiss prelate seems to have been unaware of the compact entered into between the fashionable world and the Church, by which the former is privileged to attend mass in evening dress, kneel on velvet cushions, and study the toilettes of surrounding devotees, and reserve its meditations and its ecstasies for the moment when the host is elevated, when it is expected to cast its eyes for awhile to all outward vanities.

The second report of the Ritual Commission, in which some of the High Church members do not concur, deals with lighted candles at the Lord's Supper and the use of incense. The Commissioners are not satisfied that these have been used in the English Church during the last three centuries, except within the last five-and-twenty years. They recommend, therefore, that both practices should be deemed illegal, and that, on complaint by a certain number of aggrieved parishioners of their introduction, the Bishop of the diocese shall have summary power to order their discontinuance; the Bishop's decision to be subject to an appeal to the Archbishop, whose judgment is to be final, except in certain contingencies, when a case may be stated for the opinion of the Judicial Committee of Privy Council.

At the annual meeting of the Wesleyan Missionary Society, it was stated that the total home and foreign receipts for the year amounted to £149,371, 15s. 11d., which covered the expenditure, and left a balance of £4,738. 1s. towards the reduction of the debt incurred in former years.

From the report read at the annual meeting of the Church Missionary Society, it appeared that the receipts from all sources for the year had been £157,288. 6s. 10d., and the expenditure £149,662. 11s. 1d.

The most imposing meeting yet held in support of the Irish Church, assembled in St. James's Hall, on Wednesday, under the presidency of the Primate. Among those present were the Archbishops of York, Armagh, and Dublin; four dukes, three of them members of the Government; several bishops, and the Dean of Westminster. The chairman maintained it was a mere delusion to suppose that the disestablishment of the Irish Church would not “conduce to the injury” of the English; and this view was taken by most of the subsequent speakers—as the Archbishop of York, and the Bishops of Oxford and London. The first of these was especially excited, and declared that he was firmly resolved to fight the Liberal party in the House of Lords on the question. So be it, your grace; but the House of Lords is not the English nation. Three resolutions were adopted. The first affirmed the principle of Church and State; the second declared that the disestablishment of the Irish Church “would be a serious blow to the reformed faith of the United Kingdom, would materially affect the supremacy of the Crown, and would directly tend to promote the ascendancy of a foreign power within Her Majesty's dominions;” the third admitted that it might perchance be found necessary to carry out certain reforms in the threatened Establishment.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

On Mr. Disraeli's remark that he remembered the introduction of the word “Romanist” into the controversy between the two Churches and had read most of the great writers who had taken part in it, a correspondent of the Pall Mall thinks, “unless he is a Wandering Jew, and so recollects the sixteenth century,” he can hardly be correct, since in a treatise of Bellarmine's the term “Romanenses” occurs, which surely comes very near to “Romanist.”

In a pamphlet entitled “The Church Establishment in Ireland, by an Irish Churchman,” which the writer thinks worth the attention of our legislators, speaking of the proposed disestablishment, he makes the following audacious comparison:

“It may be said that it is a necessary measure to content the people of Ireland. But it would be well to remember that the greatest crime man ever committed was done for this end, and it did not receive from it any redeeming character.”

Dr. Christie, in a report on the local asylum for lunatics, having asserted that the Wesleyan Methodists of the North Riding of Yorkshire furnished to that institution a rather large proportion of inmates, which he attributed to too much being brought on the mind of the uneducated by the Methodist system of self-examination, the Recorder has taken up the defence of the body which it represents, and contends that the note of alarm ought rather to be sounded to the friends of the Establishment, since seventy-five of its adherents have entered the asylum as compared with forty-six Methodists.

A correspondent of the Guardian shows that the Vicar of Frome, in his conception of a “visible Presence of our Lord upon the altars of our churches," advances a doctrine which would be inadmissible even in the Church of Rome, and is directly at variance with her formularies, according to which the body of Christ, in the Eucharist, is veiled and lies hid.

Writing to the same paper, on the Irish Church question, the Rev. G. Moody says, "disestablishment does not necessarily include disendowment, and neither the one nor the other, nor both together, are identical with destruction;" and he considers that the main danger to that Church lies in disintegration, to guard against which he thinks, "since disestablishment is as good (or as bad) as an accomplished fact," steps should at once be taken.

In the same paper, the Rev. G. Vaux-Collison, seeing that "among Dissenters Good Friday seems too often regarded as a day for better tea and plum-cake than usual, and professing Churchmen are sadly indifferent to its awful lessons," suggests that it would be well if a service for that day were drawn up, of a very special and solemn kind. It might tend to induce a closer observance of the day; and at any rate it would be a standing protest against the desecration which now prevails.

As a professed supporter of what calls itself a Reformed Church, the Church Times seems to have a strange love of fouling its own nest. Here is one of its recent utterances:

"In sober truth, the English Reformation was an unmitigated disaster. It was simply a hypocritical pretence to veil an insurrection of lust and avarice against religion. It corrected no evil whatever; and though some of the abuses of the Middle Ages may have altered their form—as, for example, the sumpnour may have passed into the pettifoggery attorney, and the relic-monger into the vendor of quack medicines—those abuses are, or until quite lately were, just as rampant as ever. There is not a pin to choose between the lordly abbot and the rosy rector; between the limotour and the sturdy beggar of Exeter Hall—except that of the two the modern seem perhaps to belong to a lower type of worldliness and imposture. The superstition of the past has but given place to the infidelity of the present; and, on the whole, there is no reason whatever to suppose that there is any larger proportion of really God-fearing persons now than there was before the reformation of religion was taken in hand by a conspiracy of adulterers, murderers, and thieves."

Punch has the following:

- A. Those ultra Ritualists are Papists, without doubt.
- B. Say rather, Papists without the P.

"The Rambler," in the Christian World, contrasts the dreary lifelessness of the recent meeting of the "Society for the Propagation of the Gospel" with the spirit and earnestness of that for the "Propagation of the Faith," held on the same day, both in St. James's Hall. At the former, the hall was not half filled; the platform had the appearance of a society in reduced circumstances, and the proceedings were of the dullest and most commonplace character. The High Church element seemed to be strong, for when the Primate requested that the audience would stand up during prayer, one or two of the Bishops on the platform immediately knelt down, and their example was followed by the majority of those present, which made those who obeyed the Archbishop's behest feel somewhat uncomfortable. At the Roman Catholic meeting, which came almost immediately after the Protestant, the hall was crammed, although tickets for the front seats were half-a-crown, and the back seats a shilling; and when Dr. Manning, attended by eight Bishops and several noblemen, appeared on the platform, the cheering was of the most rapturous character, and continued for more than three minutes. From the "Rambler's" report, the speeches of the Bishops, "fine ruddy fellows," were short and to the purpose, and though the meeting lasted till eleven o'clock at night, the enthusiasm of the audience never waned.

How strangely position alters our view of things! When Mr. Disraeli was only a novelist, he wrote thus—

"What can be more anomalous than the present connection between State and Church? Every condition on which it was originally consented to has been cancelled. The original alliance was, in my view, an equal calamity for the nation and the Church; but at least it was an intelligible compact. The only consequences of the present union of Church and State are, that on the side of the State there is perpetual interference in ecclesiastical government, and on the side of the Church a sedulous avoidance of all those principles on which alone Church government can be established, and by which alone can the Church of England again become universal. It (the Church) would do as great things now, if it were divorced from the degrading and tyrannical connection that enchains it. There is, I think, a rising feeling in the community that parliamentary interference in matters ecclesiastical has not tended either to the spiritual or the material elevation of the humbler orders. Divorce the Church from the State, and the spiritual power that struggled against the brute force of the dark ages, against tyrannical monarchs and barbarous barons, will struggle again in opposition to influence of a different form, but of a similar tendency, equally selfish, equally insensible, equally barbarous. Holy Church, transformed into a national Establishment, and therefore grumbled at by all the nation for whom it was not supported! What an inevitable harvest of sedition, radicalism, infidelity! I really think there is no society, however great its resources, that could long resist the united influences of chief magistrate, virtual representation, and Church Establishment."

Respecting the future position of Anglicanism in Ireland, Mr. J. M. Capes, who is a Catholic of a very liberal type, well observes:

"In recognising the existence of religious communities, organised each after its own pattern, we are merely returning to the system of the earlier ages of Christianity. It may be a question whether the Roman organisation, or the Anglican, or the Congregationalist, or the Presbyterian is most in harmony with the system set up under the Apostles and their descendants. But that the first Christians would have scouted this modern idea that the Christian Church, either as a whole, or in its separate portions, is a creation of the State, and not a voluntary organisation of individuals, is one of the most undeniable truths of all history. No one can be more opposed to the domination of ecclesiastics than I am, or more sensible of the checks upon modern English bigotry and fanaticism which result from the lay influence of the State upon the Established Church; but I cannot shut my eyes to the monstrous absurdity involved in the establishment of a religious body by the State for the purpose of teaching theological dogmas. The connection between Church and State in the way of Establishment has been, to my convictions, one of the heaviest curses under which humanity has groaned. There has been scarcely a bloody war, or a social cruelty, which has not been more or less traceable to the influence of the idea that the State is capable of recognising and upholding theological doctrines as true. This idea is at this moment the curse of Buddhism, the curse of Mahometanism, the curse of Spain and Italy, the curse of Russia, and until now it has been the curse of Ireland. When we have learnt by sufficient experience how happily the non-establishment principle will work in Ireland, it will be time to consider how the same principle will work also in Scotland and in England."

"Theophilus," in the Guardian, wishing to offer one or two suggestions to those who feel a difficulty in reconciling the judicial with the paternal attributes of God, writes in the following rather heretical strain:

"Can we divide God into attributes? Is not the Fatherly a more exacting function than the Rectorial? A penalty satisfies a magistrate, nothing but righteousness will satisfy a father. The conception that God had to make an offering to His justice ere He was free to pardon proceeds upon the supposition that justice had not been done. But justice had been done. 'The soul that sinneth it shall die'—that was the sentence. It did die—that was the fulfilment. The question then was, Shall a new life be given to it? Now, putting aside the consideration that the well-being and not the ill-being of creation is the glory of God, we must simply consider that which was done, and look at the facts. God did give a new life to the dead soul. He gives it in Christ. Now, what moved Him? No doubt love, and desire for the well-being of His creation. What, then, induced Him to adopt the mode He chose? The facts (no doubt again) that justice had been done, and that such a condition of things as a dead soul was evil, and that evil can alone be 'overcome with good.' The atonement was not a justification of God for showing mercy, but a mode of rectifying creation when justice had been done. We may say that penalty is never to be regarded as a substitute for justice, or even as a vindication of it. It is the simple and inevitable fruit of transgression, and justice is expanded in its fulfilment, or more strictly the cause has been followed by its due result. Penalty may also be curative or preventive, but it never can be substitutionary. In man's case the penalty had been paid, and the law satisfied, before the Incarnation. If, however, it be said, man's transgression as against an infinite law required an infinite punishment, and could not be satisfied by man's death alone; can a finite being, who can only offend in proportion to his own nature, incur a penalty out of proportion? And an offering made by God in this regard (were it possible to suppose it needed) would still have been inadmissible, as being in lieu of that which should have been; as made to Himself; and in violation of the Scriptural precept that mercy establishes the law beyond sacrifice. It cannot, therefore, be accepted as a just conception."

OLD TESTAMENT CHAPTERS FOR THE SUNDAY SCHOOL.—III.

SUBJECT: "The ancient city of Tyre."

Read Ezekiel chap. xxvii. 1—36, the account of the great trade and wealth of Tyre. Remark upon the rich variety of its merchandise, and point out, by means of the geographical position of the nations that came to trade in its markets, that the chief activity of the ancient world in those days lay on the eastern shores of the Mediterranean Sea.

Go back to read Ezekiel chap. xxvi. 1—14, the account of the approaching siege, when the city shall be taken by Nebuchadnezzar, or, as here written, Nebuchadrezzar, king of Babylon, and all this prosperity shall come to an end. Explain this writer's date of the eleventh year of King Jehoiachin's captivity [or B.C. 590], by comparing it with the date of the fifth year given in chap. i., verse 2; and look for the account of Nebuchadnezzar's taking Jehoiachin prisoner, and carrying him into captivity from Jerusalem to Babylon, at the end of the Second Book of Kings.

AMERICAN NOTES.

The Rev. Z. H. Howe, who holds that inspiration, though differing in degree in different individuals, is the same in kind, in replying to a criticism on his view, says, evidently referring to the Rev. Robt. Collyer, whose volume of sermons we a short time since reviewed:

"Last Sunday I listened to a sermon from a man who was born and reared in poverty and obscurity in the North of England—having spent all the early part of his life in the rugged toil of a blacksmith—with such intellectual opportunities as a man under such circumstances would be likely to have. But the Great God, who gave to Jesus without measure—who gave to the author of Psalms the spirit of poetry—who opened the windows of heaven to Isaiah—was bountiful also to him, and gave him a great, earnest heart, and a religiousness of nature that enables him to look into the heart and mystery of things. For many years he was a preacher among the Wesleyan Methodists—working diligently at his trade during the week, and on Sunday feeding his flock with such words of wisdom as his own experience had enabled him to glean. After migrating to this country, a wider acquaintance with men enlarged his views, and he became a Unitarian—not in any narrow, sectarian sense, for he is a man of the most liberal, far-reaching thought. While I listened to that sermon read by another person—the fruits of a wider and various experience, and a great, loving heart, clothed in the choicest language—my own heart was softened and soothed. From his own checkered experience he talked to mine. Troops of memories from the past came thronging around my mind—full of sadness, yet somehow full of peace—because the good God was brought near to me. That sermon will ever be an epoch in my life. Is the inspiration that attends such men different in kind from that which spake through the mouths of Prophets and Apostles? I think not."

A Positivist Church was opened in New York, on Sunday, April 5th, when there were morning and evening services, at which large audiences assembled, many persons, no doubt, being drawn by curiosity to listen to the new faith.

In a letter to Bishop Potter, the Rev. Stephen Tyng, after "denying the regularity and renouncing the authority" of the court before which his case was tried, says:

"From its unjust presentment, oppressive rulings, pre-determined decision, and insinuating censure, I appeal to the general judgment of the Protestant Episcopal Church, to the impartial review of the other Christian churches of this land, to the Word of the Living God, and to Jesus the Chief Shepherd and Bishop of us all."

With reference to his case, which is to be carried up to the Annual Convention, the Protestant Churchman, the representative of the Evangelical party, says it is for them to consider whether they can afford to lose three or four hundred earnest, able, and devoted ministers; which is likely to be the case if the Convention upholds the high Episcopal claims which have been put forth.

In Boston churchism seems to be less rigid than in other parts of the States. A few Sundays since, Bishop Eastburn preached in the Old South Church, wearing no gown or bands, offering extemporaneous prayer, speaking of the house they were worshipping in as the temple of God, and praying for "all ministers of the Gospel and the congregations committed to their charge." What next?

Some, perhaps, may think this still worse. At the Methodist Conference the following resolution was adopted:

"That we respectfully receive the communication of the Council of Unitarian and other Christian Churches, and that we have listened with pleasure to the kind and complimentary address of its representative, Rev. Dr. James Freeman Clarke. We return our thanks for the expression of earnest interest in our work and congratulations on our success. It is well known how widely we differ from that body in the doctrines which we regard as the essential truths of evangelical Christianity, yet we have noted with pleasure and gratitude the true and noble stand it has taken on the civil and moral reforms of the age, and we invoke the blessing of God upon them in all their efforts to promote His glory and the welfare of humanity."

From a letter addressed to the Southern Churchman by the Bishop of Tennessee, it appears that while he is lecturing us here on the sad shortcomings of American education, his diocese is becoming fearfully demoralised. Not only has a ball been got up for the benefit of one of its churches, but the ballroom was actually decorated with a full-length portrait of the Bishop in full canonicals! He says:

"How any body of professed Christians who claim to have put off concerning the former conversation the old man which is corrupt according to the deceitful lusts and to have put on the new man, which, after God, is created in righteousness and true holiness, could have been educated down to such a scandal, is what I cannot understand. With God's Word open, with a house set apart for His worship, where we cannot but believe Him to be especially present—with sacraments and ordinances which are channels of grace and overflowing with heavenly food—with all these blessed instrumentalities for growth in grace and in Christ-likeness—I cannot understand how a congregation could so outrage the principles of Christianity and of that Church which our dear Saviour bought with his most precious blood. Fairs, suppers, raffles, lotteries, balls, and such abominations, at once destroy all true principles of making an offering to God—an act of holy worship."

Isn't it time for the worthy prelate to go and look a little after his erring flock?

"CONCERNING A CONVERSATION."

A WESLEYAN friend said to me the other night, "Mr. Smith, do you believe God will send me to hell if, committing a heinous sin once in a virtuous life, I die in the act?" The poor fellow was seriously troubled in his mind upon this matter, for, said he, "I could not turn my little fellow in the street to-night because he stole a jam tart this morning; yet my parson tells me God would send me to hell if I died whilst I was stealing one. Is God a less loving being than I am?" Of course, I hastened to discourse with my friend about God, and did my best to show Him as the Father, who sought to give life, and desired nothing so little as the death of His meanest creature. I was surprised to find how readily the heart of my friend responded to the truths I attempted to set before him. It was as rain upon a dry and thirsty ground. Never before, in his religious experience, had he "met with one to whom he durst speak what he thought. I cannot tell Mr. — these things in class; I can only dwell upon them in secret and pray over them. Sometimes I wonder whether they are thoughts of the devil or of God."

More often than not, he regarded them as thoughts suggested by the father of lies, as whisperings of some syren bent on his destruction. Thus he tried to silence the voice which, warring ever with that other voice of creed, threatened his peace and rest. But, as he said, the voice would not be silenced: "These questions will rise; what am I to do?" What is he to do? What could I say to him? In a small country town, the very name of heretic is by no means a thing to be despised. Shall I tell him to think on and work on toward the light? Doing thus, I shall assuredly be leading him towards persecution—almost to martyrdom.

What I did do was this: I told him to seek earnestly after the truth; to learn what God was, to love Him and trust Him, and be honest, leaving the issue to Him. "But what of the duty devolving upon him with regard to other people?" Deny not the truth; live it; preach it by your life. Let people see that you live the Christian life, and then it may be that your inner life shall be loveable in their sight. Be no propagandist; seek not to make disciples for the sake of numbers; seek only the cause of the truth, and live so that that cause may be promoted. This advice may not be sound; it is the only advice I dare give to a man in a dependent position in a small town. I dare not tell him to come out as a public teacher of doctrines repulsive to all. The truth could not gain thereby; no good end could be forwarded; the only result would be a great amount of suffering on the part of the unfortunate and ill-advised propagandist.

I have been much gratified lately with several instances of freedom of thought and advanced views amongst Wesleyans. Can it be that there is a "shaking of the dry bones?" If in an out-of-the-world place there be this spirit, what shall be said of our large towns? Is the spirit of inquiry abroad there also? If so, let us be up and doing; let us work in the early daylight, sow our seed in the spring time, the better to earn the reward of the faithful ones. X. D.

DISSENT AND DISESTABLISHMENT.

[COMMUNICATED: NO. IV. BY THE MINISTERS' SALARIES COMMITTEE.]

Now that the public mind is so forcibly directed to the question of disestablishment; now that the Irish Church seems already taken from its proud pinnacle and about to be placed on a level with other Christian societies in that country, and when not a few of the more thoughtful lay members in the Church of England seem more than doubtful whether the same treatment might not be very beneficial to her, it is not unnatural that we, who have been the practical and theoretical advocates of disestablished churches for so long a period, should ask ourselves how we have fared in the past, and what are our prospects in the future? Looking back on the two hundred years which represent the period of our existence without the pale of the National Church, we find many an instructive lesson. Unaided by any of the tremendous powers, spiritual and material, which the elder church possessed, we have been enabled to educate and to maintain a succession of ministers who, whether for piety or learning, are admitted to have been inferior to none. We have founded and kept alive religious societies whose members, however doctrinally in the wrong, are admitted to have led Christian lives, at least equal to the average of the age in which they lived, and to have been intelligent and active workers in the district in which they resided. Notwithstanding, also, the almost overwhelming attractions of a fashionable church by which, through the ambition or the weakness of a single individual, we have from time to time lost many of our natural adherents, our churches are still neither few nor ill-attended in all the more active centres of English life. To use the language of the day, our converts have, at least, replaced our perverts; and we are still able to look back without dismay after our long conflict, and forward, full of hope for the future. Backed as our theological opponents have been by wealth, by the sole possession of the national seats of learning, by the prestige of a long dominant and aristocratic priesthood, and still more by the spiritual fears in which an ignorant multitude naturally stood towards the only State-recognised instructors in religion, we have not only not been worsted in the fight, but we have thoroughly indoctrinated many of the worthier of our opponents with some of our most cherished ideas, and have done much to liberalise the religious character of the whole country. Compare the position of the disestablished churches now and at the time of the passing of the Ten Mile Act, and the change is very apparent. Polite society may still sneer at dissent, with the calm disdain of thoughtless ignorance, but the law acknowledges our spiritual and political equality. In these two hundred years we have exchanged privileges for rights, and so far may well be content with our retrospect.

All this, be it remarked, has been done by voluntary effort, by the free gifts in intellect, in wealth, and in labour, called into action by the love of religion, and fostered by the comfort and support we have derived from its moral and spiritual guidance. The question for us, however, is not what has been done, but what are we about to do in the stirring future which awaits us? There is no longer a doubt as to what a free church can do—our own and the other greater dissenting bodies of this country have conclusively shown that. Alas, that there should be a shadow of doubt as to what we shall do, that now, when the harvest seems almost ripe, there should be no more reapers going out than there are to gather the good corn into our barns; nay, worse, that that which our fathers have sowed we will not reap, as if we cared only for the labour of the Spring, and despised the rich fruits of Autumn.

Must this always be so, or are we not ourselves, perhaps ignorantly, to a large degree, blameworthy? See what good husbandmen those were who sowed the seed! Have we been careful to replace them with men as good, or is it that such men are no longer to be found? The position of a pastor in one of our churches is in many ways peculiar and trying in the present day; he has not the authority and position of a parish priest; he has not the merely personal respect which attaches to the ministerial calling as such. What he is, and what he does, that, and that only, fixes his position, and it is right and healthy that it should be so; but let us recollect how much it is we are asking, how very rare and valuable are the qualifications we require. Is it wonderful that young men, and the parents of young men, tremble at the prospect of their entering the ministry, and that they are not attracted by the thought even of perfect success?

We do not suppose, for one moment, that mere money payment will ever create a devoted ministry. Priests it might tempt, but not apostles; not the men whom we have had, and whom we hope still to have—leaders and counsellors in all good things, and yet of ourselves, and co-workers with ourselves in all Christian fellowship. Still, money and money's worth have a greater and more powerful influence than is often admitted. Money is but time, labour, power concentrated for our own convenience. If we could manage to pay our ministers by barter, instead of in hard cash, for one year only, we should see how heavy was the weight in their scale, how light in ours. What is it we ask of them?—a youth of laborious study, and void of moral reproach, a life of learning, of thoughtfulness, and active usefulness, at least blameless before the world—an old age of poverty, dependent upon the charity of a few friends who remember their earlier career—and all this for the sum we would give any day for a man who can write a tolerably good hand, and make out an invoice correctly. Even the self-denying Paul thought that the labourer was worthy of his hire; and we, if we mean to reap the harvest which seems to be ripening so gloriously for us, must see that we are not unjust to those of our brethren whom we wish to take up this most important calling. Let laymen throughout the country only be alive to the true state of the case; let them act as justly to their ministers as they, under similar circumstances, would wish to be dealt with, and we believe the difficulty would be at an end. Then, as formerly, the disestablished Churches will show that they can produce ministers as learned, patient, and zealous in well-doing as any Established Church in the world's history. The spirit has not died out of the body, but the sense of injustice rankles in many a heart, paralyses many a brain, and makes callous many a loving soul.

THE PRESENT DUTY OF PROTESTANTISM.

BY DR. SCHENCKEL.

SOME will say: Has the Protestant Church, has the Church in general a present task to perform? In their eyes the Church seems involved in a great crisis, the result of which will be her downfall; the flames of criticism have seized upon one storey after another of the edifice of ecclesiastical formulas and dogmas, they continue their ravages, and happy shall we be if from amongst the general destruction there arise unharmed and brilliant the religion of Positivism—the general love of mankind. Such an idea is based on two errors: firstly, it ignores the deep desire for a religion which the human heart has always shown, and forgets that piety is not a weakness but a source of strength in a man; secondly, it ignores the historical vigour of Christianity which has arisen with victory and glory from every one of its past struggles, and which, believe me, will survive all that may menace it in the future. Nor are they in the right who, on the other hand, hold that there is now no task for Protestantism to do, that her work was completed at the Reformation, and that her only duty is to preserve herself intact in her then state. Here again are two errors: firstly, in ignoring the essence of Protestantism, that spirit of inquiry which gave her birth, and the memorable 19th April, 1529, when at the Diet of Spire a minority of the States of the Empire, in the name of the rights of conscience, refused in matters of religion to obey the will of a majority; secondly, in misunderstanding the history of Protestantism. She was not perfected but paralysed by the dogmatic decisions of the Reformation period which check her natural development; she did not complete her task then, and she will never complete it until she carries out her original principles to all their consequences.

The present era combines all the conditions necessary for her making a great step towards this end. There are in the history of churches, as of States, not only periods of rest or recoil, but also of revolution—of important decisions, which change the current of the future. There is great cause for regarding the present period as one of these latter. How many analogies has it to the times immediately preceding the Reformation. Now, as then, new and surprising inventions have affected our whole civilisation: then it was the invention of printing and the discovery of the New World; now it is the railway and the steam-engine, the gold-fields of California and Australia. Now, as then, an immense extension of all the means of communication between man and man—nation and nation. No one now dares to oppose our progress, however he may dislike it. Can the Church remain behind by herself, when all others are going forward? In an age like ours, to stop is to go back—to go back is to perish.

The general task of Protestantism must be distinguished from its special task. Its general task is that of Christianity itself. To restore to human hearts the peace which sin and error have destroyed, renew our religious and moral union with God, free the soul from earthly bonds, hallow the temporal by the eternal, and thus save ourselves and our race. This is the task of Christianity and Protestantism.

But, besides this, Protestantism has a special task. In its origin Protestantism was an opposition to Catholicism, and all its value has lain in this opposition. Let us not be unjust to Catholicism. It was suited to the culture which Europe possessed in the middle ages; it was a schoolmaster for those who were morally and intellectually children. Its force lay in law, and it ruled with the rod of Moses. Hence its authority was based on tradition and dogma. Against the savage explosions of unrestrained natures and the tyranny of strength, it defended order and morals. But little by little it outlived itself, becoming more and more worldly, and at last more worldly than the State. Instead of the salvation of souls, it sought power and wealth. Faith in the loftier mission of Catholicism was gone before the Reformation. The voice of outraged conscience rose ever louder—How may sinful man find true salvation?

To answer her, the source of the knowledge of salvation must be determined. Christianity has existed for centuries—it has its historic source—it has gone through well-defined historic phases. Whence can we draw the best knowledge of its essence?

Mediæval Catholicism did indeed recognise the earliest documents of Christian history; but its doctrines and institutions were far different from those which they taught. Ecclesiastical tradition had been more prolific than Scripture, and had substituted many dangerous errors for the simple teachings of primitive Christianity. It was against the authority of these errors, and against the authority of non-Biblical tradition in general, that the Reformers arose. Protestantism rejected as a source of salvation human doctrines—it desired to have Christian truth as pure as could be, to have it only, and to have it in its fulness: hence it went to that source of knowledge which seemed to be the most authentic—the authority of Scripture. No error in matters of salvation—Christianity true and unmixed—this was its first principle: the search for absolute truth seemed its supreme duty. Has the Protestantism of our days accomplished this, its essential task?

The Reformers, in recognising Scripture as the only source of the knowledge of Christian truth, had made a decisive step towards the solution of the question. They had put an end to a mass of errors, of Jewish and Pagan origin, current in the Church, and had pledged themselves to the utter destruction of falsehood and the separation from the chaff of the pure wheat of the Word. But they made two mistakes. Firstly, in attributing authority exclusively to the Bible, forgetting that God also reveals himself in conscience and in creation; secondly, in making the Bible too strictly identical with revelation and giving it an absolutely divine authority. Yet it was not, at first, Luther's intention to surround Scripture with this miraculous halo. He spoke of many parts of it with boldness and even injustice. The Old Testament writers, he says, built not only with gold and silver and precious stones, but also sometimes with hay and stubble and wood. He distinguishes between what Moses and the prophets said and what God said. He regards Kings as more trustworthy than Chronicles, and expresses a wish that Esther had never been written. He treats the New Testament with like boldness, calls the Epistle of James "an epistle of straw," regards it as unapostolical, and the work of some pious man who misunderstood the apostolical writings. He holds also that the Apocalypse has not apostolical and prophetic authority. These criticisms were not scientific, nor founded on a thorough study of the external and internal evidence of the books, but sprang from doctrinal likes and dislikes. His freedom of thought shows, nevertheless, that he did not regard the Bible as being throughout the infallible work of the Spirit.

THE LIBERATION SOCIETY.

It is always pleasanter to argue with an actual antagonist than to beat the air in combating views which have to be set up as well as to be thrown down, and we thank Dr. VANCE SMITH for responding to our leader of last week by the candid statement, which we print in another column, of the reasons which cause him and others to hold aloof from the Liberation Society.

Our friend's first argument is one which we imagined we had answered by anticipation. He distrusts the society because a large proportion of its members have no real hold of the principles of religious liberty; and, quoting one or two of the very narrowest minds that Independency has to show as representative of its spirit, he declares his preference for such leaders as Mr. GLADSTONE, Earl RUSSELL, and Mr. BRIGHT. It is unfortunate for the argument that the last of these three leaders whom it is proposed to follow is one whose position and principles are absolutely, and have always been, those of the Liberation Society, while those who have watched even Mr. GLADSTONE's course can hardly help doubting whether, as a far-seeing statesman, he has any faith in the Church of England long continuing to hold its present position of ecclesiastical ascendancy. We must submit, however, that the whole question is one of principles, and not of leaders. If we are to wait to join with Independents and Baptists in great movements for religious liberty and equality, until they have learned to have faith in these principles even in their deepest application, we shall not only paralyse ourselves for useful public action, but we shall also neglect the very best means of influencing them to broader views. Dr. SMITH does not seem to think worthy of notice our statement that those among the orthodox bodies who have taken the lead in this movement are those who do most truly understand religious liberty, and that this very society has been a liberal education to its members. Yet it is true. Mr. DISRAELI's party is not the only one which has been "educating" of late years towards surprisingly liberal ideas. Mr. GLADSTONE was not always so broad in his Churchmanship as he appears to be at present, and the same heaven has been silently working among the ablest of the orthodox Dissenters. That very book of Mr. JAMES's, to which Dr. SMITH refers, was, if we remember rightly, strongly condemned in several of the Independent organs; and our own columns have reprinted leaders from the Christian World (whose circulation is treble that of all the other Independent papers together) laying down the principle of free and open trusts with a breadth and vigour that would have gratified the shade of BAXTER.

But all such questions as these are subordinate to that of the principle upon which the Liberation Society is based and the object which it seeks to obtain. That principle is that the State should not in any way interfere with the institutions and organisations of the religious life. That this principle is sound seems to us evident from the whole history of Christendom. A thousand futile attempts which have left proscribed heresy only stronger than before, show the absolute impossibility of Governments controlling the religious life of peoples. That life is best left to take its natural course, choose its congenial associations, support itself by its own self-sacrificing spirit, and embody itself in institutions of its own choice. For the State to support any religious institution implies some amount of control; but control is precisely that which the religious life of man inevitably resists. We understand our friend to look forward to some future development of the Anglican Establishment, broad enough to admit everybody. Where he finds any such idea in the utterances of Mr. GLADSTONE or Earl RUSSELL we do not learn, nor, indeed, does it much matter. We characterize the idea as a "vain dream;" to which it is replied that it would have been just as vain a dream a few years ago to anticipate that the unreformed House of Commons would vote by a majority of sixty for the disestablishment of the Irish Church. It is precisely because such a majority has voted for so momentous and suggestive a change that we venture to assert that this comprehensive theory of Establishment is, more utterly than ever, out of the question. Society has gone too fast for it. Mr. GLADSTONE also, like his great rival, has "educated his party," but it is not in the direction of a comprehensive Establishment but towards a much simpler solution of the problem. We, also, wish to see a comprehensive national church, but we want to see it universally comprehensive, and no Establishment could become so. The Liberation Society puts forward the only plan by which it can be possibly attained. Let the present Establishment be stretched this way and that till it shall become a very Noah's Ark, the only result would be, not that the free churches would be absorbed into it, but that every element of discord already existing in it would be indefinitely aggravated. Even with the present modicum of comprehension, we have three great parties reviling and opposing one another with a virulence utterly unparalleled among Dissenters, and which we may therefore fairly take to be the result of their forced inclusion within one ecclesiasticism. The Liberation Society proposes the only plan by which the varied elements of religious life can ever co-exist in peace, and come gradually into some true religious fellowship. Let all churches be left free to follow their own leadings and sympathies, and they will then constitute together the true national church—the English branch of the church universal. It will, of course, possess only so much unity and coherence as can naturally exist among such diverse elements. In this respect, however, it would but share the inevitable condition of religious life in England, under all circumstances, aye, even were the Establishment widened to its utmost; while we maintain that, it would be in a far better condition for the gradual development of unity among its parts. The question of temporalities is one on which we cannot now enter. Suffice it to say that the experiment which is shortly to be made with Irish churches, cathedrals, and livings, may perhaps demonstrate that the practical difficulty is not so insuperable as it is represented.

THE TRIENNIAL CONFERENCE OF THE LIBERATION SOCIETY.

THE Liberation Society has attained the age of twenty-four years, and is in a state of wonderful health and activity. I write in the presence of some who rocked its cradle, and now felicitate themselves on beholding the mighty power to which it has attained. In view of the recent rapid development of public opinion in the direction of the principles of the society, it was well that one of the veterans in the good cause should preside at the opening of the eighth triennial conference. The appropriateness of the selection of the Rev. J. P. Mursell, of Leicester, as chairman of the first sitting, was universally recognised. In a few suitable words of thankfulness for the success that has been gained, he opened the business of the day. Mr. Carvell Williams then followed, with a carefully-prepared, most interesting, and thoroughly exhaustive report. The position now was contrasted with the position three years ago; all hope now, all discouragement then; all success now, all defeat then. The speakers to the different resolutions belonged to the different religious bodies by which the Liberation Society is supported. Our own denomination was represented by Sir John Bowring. The Rev. P. W. Clayden is down to speak at the soirée to-morrow night. I had the honour of being put on an important business committee; and among influential laymen present were Mr. S. Courtald and Mr. Robert Heywood. Sir John Bowring's speech was a very telling one; his remarks were admirably to the point, and they were delivered with the vivacity and vigour of a young man. The members of Parliament who spoke were Messrs. E. Baines, D. McLaren, and Whitworth, and Sir John Gray and Frank Crossley. Of them Mr. McLaren produced the deepest impression by his quiet argumentation and his happy illustrations. Among the speakers, however, the Baptists bore away the palm. The venerable Rev. Howard Hinton, now 75 years old, referred, with a voice broken with emotion, to the labourers for religious equality who have fallen asleep; expressed his belief that that would be the last conference he would be able to attend; and declared his hope that from another world his spirit would be permitted to sympathise with the workers it had left behind. The Rev. Wm. Brock was full of humour and argument; he spoke to a resolution in favour of Mr. Gladstone's church-rate compromise, but expressed his own decided preference for Mr. Hardcastle's Abolition Bill; indeed, he went so far as to say that he trusted that the Select Committee of the House of Lords would condemn the measure of which Earl Russell has charge. But the principal speech, for power, humour, and effect, was that delivered by Mr. Spurgeon. In manner and matter it was admirable. Now tears, and now roars of laughter were produced by it. One lapsus lingue caused much amusement. Mr. Spurgeon had been urging that at the next general election the Irish Church question should be made the prominent one; he asked his friends who were anxious to push forward other matters, to wait awhile; teetotalers, workers for Sabbath observance, &c., were desired to postpone the agitation of their particular questions—"Let water be left for a time!" a remark which, coming from the leading minister of the Baptist body, was received with roars of laughter. I may mention here that the committee I was on was entrusted with the duty of recommending the officers of the society for the ensuing year, and great anxiety was displayed to have a full representation of different religious bodies. The Rev. R. Spears and the Rev. John Wright were added to the executive committee, and other Unitarians in different parts of the kingdom were put upon the council.

At the evening meeting, Mr. Barnes, M.P., was the chairman, and the Rev. L. Bevan, "as a young recruit," proposed a resolution, recommending the enlistment of young Nonconformists in the ranks of the society. Mr. Bevan is the colleague of Mr. Binney, and for the sake of his connections, as well as for his own sake, he was eagerly listened to; he made some good remarks on the necessity which exists for causing the principles of Nonconformity to be better known. It would be well if all Nonconformists understood why they stand outside the Established Church; and such remarks as were made by Mr. Bevan and other speakers are much needed by some parties among ourselves. Dr. Landels followed with an eloquent speech, which added another to the laurels which the Baptists had won during the day. Mr. Charles Gilpin, M.P., told some good stories about the House of Commons. A resolution on education was then spoken to by Dr. Gotch, Rev. A. Reed, Mr. Edward Miall; after which the Rev. E. White read a paper on the Broad Church theory of a religious establishment.

I must not forget to say that Mr. Spurgeon led off three cheers for Mr. Gladstone, and that, while Dr. Landels was speaking, the same compliment was paid to John Bright and Edward Miall. When one remembers how the objects of the society were ridiculed or condemned only a few years ago, the change of feeling that has taken place is seen to be remarkable. They who stood aloof from the Liberation Society are now profiting by its labours, and enjoying the benefits it has won. How long are Unitarians, while professing to be anxious for the universal adoption of the principles of religious equality, going to stand aloof from the society which has done most of what has been done in this sacred cause? UNITARIANISM IN SCOTLAND.

A FRIEND, lately travelling in Scotland, sends us some notes on the state of our Churches there, from which we take the following extracts:—

I visited first the Glasgow Church, in St. Vincent-street, where I found our "cause" steadily improving under the able ministrations of the Rev. H. W. Crosskey; the chilling array of empty seats of former years being now occupied by earnest listeners to the eloquent discourse of their much respected minister, who is also boldly confronting bitter party feelings, as evidenced by a placard that lately appeared on the walls of the city, of which the following is a copy:—

"Scotchmen to the Rescue!—A combination of Infidels, Unitarians, and Romanists, aliens of the soil, are to endeavour this evening (Friday), at the National Education Meeting, in the City Hall, to force their nostrums down our throats, under the plea, forsooth, of 'complete liberty of conscience.' They want to unnationalise our nation, to introduce their own idiotic crazes, and to lower our own high standard of education to the level of their own weak intellects. Come in your strength to the City Hall this evening, and show such men as the Cross Keys, Nicholls, and all their motley tribe, that their infidel spoutings are not to be held as representing the sentiments of the people of Glasgow. Show them that in Scotch affairs imported Englishmen or Irishmen shall not intermeddle nor misrepresent us; that their infidel, Unitarian, nothingarian tomfooleries won't go down here; that Scotch working men don't want their children governmental paupers for their education, and that we shall still see to it that no Godless secular system shall be planted here. We have fought the same kidney time after time before, and beat them; let us fight and beat them again. They want to enlighten us poor deluded Scotchmen! They prate about advanced liberalism and all that sort of humbug, and talk magniloquently of 'unsectarianism in the broadest sense of the term.' Certainly they would like all religions done away with; but let us show them to-night that their sinister schemings are seen through. Be forward early, lest they pack the hall, for no dodge is low enough."

The Glasgow Unitarian Sunday school and connected classes are doing good work; but if some of the teachers could visit the large schools of England, I think they would agree that much could be done in Scotland in secular instruction on the Sabbath. There are plenty of children idling about the streets and closes of Glasgow, growing up in ignorance, who would be none the worse for being collected together in a school on Sunday. At present the classes meet immediately after the morning service, but why not an hour or so before it, and again in the afternoon? I cannot understand, unless it be the difficulty of getting Scotch people to rise early.

My next visit was to Dundee, where the cause of free thought has recently been revived, and is struggling amidst great opposition and persecution; but under the zealous ministrations of the Rev. H. Williamson, Unitarianism is doing a good work. The congregation meet in a large room, known as the Thistle Hall, and at the evening lectures it is sometimes filled with strangers, attracted by a desire to know something of Unitarianism. Scotch people like to hear something new, but the Puritanical spirit binds them with a firm gripe, and it is curious to note the ways in which the spirit of bigotry is displayed by those adverse to our liberal views, such as darting out of the room in the middle of the discourse, and slamming to the door. The regular congregation mainly consists of the thoughtful working class, and they appear to be united and zealous in the cause. The rent of the hall, with other expenses, is heavy for them to bear, and any help from fellowship funds, or friends in England, would be of great service, and could not be sent to a more deserving object.

I was not at Aberdeen on a Sunday, but learnt that our friends there are increasing slowly. They have recently engaged a minister, and have a neat little chapel, and a Sunday school connected with it.

At Edinburgh I went to the service at St. Mark's, a beautiful church, where I heard an intelligent discourse by the Rev. R. B. Drummond, but the small number of worshippers is enough to freeze the heart of any minister, and there seemed to be a want of zeal and spiritual life.

As the summer season is drawing near, an exchange of pulpits for a time might be the means, I think, of doing good to our cause in Scotland, as well as be an agreeable change for the ministers.

SPRING AND SUMMER.

Spring is growing up,
Is not it a pity?
She was such a little thing,
And so very pretty!
Summer is extremely grand,
We must pay her duty;
But it is to little Spring
That she owes her beauty!

All the buds are blown,
Trees are dark and shady,
It was Spring who dressed them, though,
Such a little lady!
And the birds sing loud and sweet
Their enchanting histories;
It was Spring who taught them, though,
Such a singing mistress!

From the glowing sky
Summer shines above us;
Spring was such a little dear,
But will Summer love us?
She is very beautiful,
With her grown-up blisses,
Summer we must bow before;
Spring we coaxed with kisses!

Spring is growing up,
Leaving us so lonely,
In the place of little Spring
We have Summer only!
Summer, with her lofty airs,
And her stately paces,
In the place of little Spring,
With her childish graces!

THE WINDOW THAT MADE FACES UGLY.

PART III.—THE LETTER.

LITTLE Harry Warner did not seem to get better as the winter months went on. When Christmas came he was so weak, and his cough so troublesome that he was not brought downstairs except when the days were very fine. He had looked forward to Christmas Day, and hoped that he might be then well enough to go down, for his mother and father had invited about half-a-dozen children—the friends and companions of himself and brothers and sisters.

Christmas morning broke fine and clear, and Harry was better than usual, and after dinner his father brought him down in his arms, and laid him lovingly and tenderly on the sofa in the drawing-room, where the children were to have their games. The curtains were already drawn, and the red berries of the holly with which the pictures and the chimney piece were adorned, shone like little red gems in the fire light. The children crowded round him, and each brought him some little Christmas gift. Mary Walters had knitted some red woollen slippers for him to wear on the sofa. Jane Wilson brought him a beautiful little pocket-book. George Saunders brought him a pocket knife with an ivory handle. Only "You know," said George, "you must give me a halfpenny for it." And so one brought him one thing and another, and before he had found time to kiss and thank them all and admire his gifts, the games begun, Mr. and Mrs. Warner joined the party and made themselves children for the evening. And so they played hunt the slipper, blind man's buff, puss in the corner, hide and seek, turn the trencher, &c. And then Mrs. Warner played the piano, and the children and Mr. Warner danced. Then there was tea, and after that games and dancing again. And when the servants came to take home the children they said, it surely could not be time to go yet, and begged Mrs. Warner to let them stay a little longer, declaring they had never had such a happy day in their lives.

Harry bore the fatigue of the party very well, and slept till half-past ten the next morning. When his mother came gently to see if he was awake, he wanted to tell her all about yesterday, and how much he enjoyed it, but when he looked into her face he saw that she appeared very grave, and, as he thought, even sad, and so he stopped himself in his childish talk, and said, "Mother, is anything the matter?"

"Well, my darling, I must confess I am troubled in mind this morning. A letter has come to say that your grandmother at Nottingham is very ill, and wants me to come to see her. I must go; and yet, my poor child, I do not know how to leave you." Poor Harry! the thought of having his mother away from him fell like a sudden night upon his heart. But he knew that she must go. "And how long will you be away, mother?"

"I do not quite know. I hope not long, for I trust your grandmamma will soon be better. I shall, of course, stay with her till she is better. You must try to do without me for a little time, darling. Allen (the nurse) will look after you as well in many things as I could do, and I hope to be back soon."

Harry knew in his heart that all Allen's care could not make up for his mother. It was not his mother's waiting upon him so much that he wanted. He wanted to have her near him, to feel that she was there to love him, to speak to him, to comfort him, and sometimes hold his hand. He could always sleep better when she was in the room. And he used to fancy if she was even in the next room, he could feel that she was there, and was more comfortable than when she was out of the house. But now he would have to do without her as he best could. It was, however, a great comfort to look forward to receiving a letter from her every day or two.

Mrs. Warner had been away but two days, when Harry received her first letter to him.

"My dear boy—I hope you are bearing up with patience. I know how you will long for me, my darling, and I shall long for my little boy, but you must try to be patient. Believe that though your earthly mother is away from you, your Heavenly Father is with you. He loves you, my child, more even than I do. Indeed, it is He who has put what love we have for one another into both our minds. You know that I would come to you if I could, but I cannot be in two places at once. Your Heavenly Father can be everywhere at once, and therefore you may be sure he will be with you. I know my little boy will sometimes feel fretful and impatient. He will be apt to think too much of himself, and not enough of those who have to wait on him, and then he will need his mother with him to whisper patience and soothe him, and remind him to be good and like the holy Jesus. But He who is greater than a mother will be with him. He will whisper to him and teach him His will.

"Nurse will sometimes read to you, my child, from the Bible. Always let that blessed book remind you that God is with you. I believe the Bible has been written chiefly to show us that because God was with His children, and taught them in the olden time, He will be with them and teach them now.—Your loving mother,

"MARY WARNER."

This letter was a great comfort to Harry. He read it over to nurse, and wanted to talk about it with her. But he could see by her stiff looks, and hear from her silence, broken now and then by a peculiar sniff, that she did not like it. Harry was curious, and wished to know nurse's thoughts. So he kept on putting questions, until at last nurse broke out, "Well, Master Harry, I don't want to vex you, or to go against what your mother says, but if I must speak what I think, I consider that missis is teaching you a very dangerous error."

"Oh, nurse, what do you mean?" "Well, I may be wrong,"—nurse generally began her speeches thus, "I may be wrong"—"but it seems to me savouring of presumption to say that God will be with His children and teach them now, as He did in the olden times."

"But won't he nurse?" "Of course He won't. He taught the prophets and apostles, and they wrote down His inspirations in the Bible, and we must go to that now."

"But mother, you remember, says, 'I believe the Bible has been written chiefly to show us that because God was with His children and taught them in the olden time, He will be with them and teach them now.'"

"I don't think so. I may be wrong, but I think that God taught the holy men of old once for all to save Himself the trouble of teaching people the same thing generation after generation."

"But, O dear, nurse, that seems to put the Heavenly Father so far, far away from us. I want Him to be close to me, to speak to me, and guide me."

"Well, Master Harry, perhaps our weak nature would like to have it different to what it is, but we must not want to be wise above what is written. There is the Bible for us, and we must not ask for anything better."

"But, nurse, I remember hearing my father say that we are not to suppose every word in the Bible inspired by God. In many parts he says the writers speak their own thoughts, which are sometimes mistaken."

"O dear, I may be wrong, but I think that it is dreadful. I think every word in the Bible comes from Almighty God. If it did not, how should we know what was his, and what was not?" Harry lay thinking for some time; this was clearly a difficulty. At last he looked up as if he had found it out.

"Why you see, nurse, if our Heavenly Father is with all of us, teaching us now, then when we find anything in the Bible the same as he teaches us now, we know that is from him, and if we find anything that contradicts what he teaches us now, we know that cannot be from him."

Nurse shook her head, as if it was a doctrine she did not like. She did not know what to reply, however, for it was a new idea to her, so she took refuge in saying, "But come now, Master Harry, I must not talk to you any more, you know it is not good for your head."

Harry, however, lay quietly thinking on the subject. He thought of his mother's idea that the Bible was written to show us that God was always with us, teaching us now. And then he thought of nurse's idea, that the Bible was written to serve in place of God being with us and teaching us now. And he remembered what his mother had said a little while ago. "God desires us to love Him, and therefore He never will show Himself to us as an unlovable something we could not love." "Now I am sure," he thought, "God would be unlovable if he were as nurse makes him out. Her idea of Him is another window which makes His face unlovely to me."

And then he went on supposing he had a mother who was away, and knew how much he loved her and longed for her, and who could come to him and be with him; to be with him and teach him, and who yet would not, but only sent a servant with an old letter yellow with time, that she had written to their Willy that died before he (Harry) was born. That would not be a mother a thousandth part as sweet and loveable as his own dear mother, who so loved him, that she came to him whenever she could.

"Now God must be more like my own dear sweet mother," he mused, "whom I can love, than like that cold, strange one, whom I could not love. He will, as my mother said, be with me, to guide and teach me." And having come to that conclusion, he put away all the doubts that nurse had suggested, and lay quietly humming himself to sleep, by a hymn of which he was very fond.

Abide with me; fast falls the even-tide!
The darkness deepens; Lord with me abide;
When other helpers fail, and comforts flee,
Help of the helpless, O abide with me.

VESUVIUS.

IN one of his interesting letters to the Liberal Christian, Dr. Bellows thus describes his ascent of the mountain on January the 6th:

The congregation of guides, mule-drivers, horse-leaders, bundle-carriers, and general attendants that welcomed us at Resina, where we stopped our carriage to ascend the mountain, was sufficient to have manned the expedition to Abyssinia. Such clamour, such pulling and hauling, such lying and swearing, such attempts at imposition, such utter confusion and perplexity were almost enough to induce us to abandon our purpose. But at last, by firmness and patience, we got off with not more than twice as many guides as we needed. What advantage to the rider or the mule it was to have a guide hanging to the creature's tail up the mountain was not plain, but this was, at least, the only aid my guide rendered. My beast was not put into good humour by this prolongation of tail, but unhappily directed his animosity against my neighbour's mule instead of his tormentor, who merited a sound tap from his heels in return for the needless thwacks he gave him, which merely endangered my seat, without the least accelerating the ascent. But at last we got up the mountain. Vesuvius is about four thousand feet high. The Hermitage is about two thousand five hundred feet from the base. The lower cone begins about five hundred feet above the Hermitage. The crater (the old one) opens about seven hundred higher up, and within it a new cone has shot up two or three hundred feet. The recent eruption has been active about forty days, and is not to be considered a very serious one. It has been too deliberate and methodical to be alarming. It seems about as active as the one I witnessed in 1848. Indeed, in the few days I have been in Naples there has been no serious flaming from the top, or expulsion of stones. That had all gone by. The outflow of lava, though evidently much less than at many previous periods within recent generations, has been, and continues to be, considerable enough to awaken a very lively interest and to produce a very impressive spectacle. The stream of the descending lava on the Naples side seemed to be about three hundred feet wide, and ran at least one thousand five hundred feet down the mountain. It changed its form from day to day from Y to an O, and then nearly to a solid band. Hanging against the blackness of the mountain, it presented a very imposing if not a threatening appearance. It grew on the imagination with reflection, and was never grander than when it lighted us, with its lurid glare, out of the bay of Naples—a red path of reflected light lay upon the smooth water, binding us to the volcano. The city with its crescent of lights, occupied its amphitheatre, as if spectators of the threat which Vesuvius held over it. Some day, the people are accustomed to say, the mountain will fulfil its warning and bury Naples as it did Pompeii, and what they say as a jest may well become a terrible fact. What a strange catastrophe, should the recovered statues of Herculaneum and Pompeii be doomed to a second entombment in the ashes of Vesuvius!

We approached the burning stream until the heat became intolerable. Where we stood, only four days before the lava had flowed red-hot. It was still too warm for comfort. The usual egg was cooked, and the usual coins embedded and brought away in the cooled lava. I suppose five hundred people must have ascended Vesuvius this day. A hundred sat a few rods in front of the head of the descending stream, as if defying its jaws. The motion forward was indolent and hardly visible from moment to moment, but every now and then accelerated and easily capable of becoming swift and destructive. The mass was not unlike a vast heap of coal covered with its own ashes, but glowing in spots, and curiously crumbling and dissolving at times, with sudden motions from beneath, so that it seemed to advance almost by melting away its own front. The old lava cracked and snapped before it, and made, I think, all the noise that was heard. The beds of the old eruptions were even more interesting than the new one. Thousands of acres are covered with the rock-hardened slime of the volcano, and nothing can be more curious than the forms it has taken. Sometimes it lies in great heaps of gnarled and knotty stumps, as if the roots of its old forests had all been turned into stone, and piled up here in memory of former grandeur. Then, again, enormous piles of rotting cordage appear, and you imagine that the wreck of some pre-Adamite commerce has been accumulated in a Titanic junk-shop. Again, the scene is changed, and you have the skins of a million elephants lying in heaps about you, as if in a great tan-yard of the demi-gods, who could wear no leather of a less expensive and substantial hide. The oak bark to cure these skins lies very near by. What other fancies the lava might have presented the coming on of the darkness forbade me from knowing, and so, not without gratitude to the sure-footed beasts who carried us safely down that frightful path, we bade Vesuvius and the eruption of 1867 good-by.

CHURCH CURIOSITIES.—IX.

A BELL-RINGER'S EPITAPH.

THE following epitaph is given in Notes and Queries, but the churchyard is not mentioned where it is found:

In ringing ever from my youth
I always took delight.
My bell is rung, and I am gone,
My soul has took its flight,
To join a choir of heavenly singing
Which far excel the harmony of ringing.

THE DEVIL FOILED.

At the annual meeting, last week, of the Methodist Free Church Mission, one of the speakers commended to his hearers the example of Mr. James Rigley, of the North of England, who, being called upon to preside at a missionary meeting, addressed it thus:

"Friends, I really have nothing to say to you except about myself. You have asked me to speak, and I must tell you something about myself. I was a poor man once, but though I was poor I used always to give a shilling to the plate at collections. Whatever collection came, I determined I would give to it, and that I would give nothing less than silver, that I would give nothing less than a shilling. But, by-and-bye, God blessed me very much; I began to get on in the world; still I did not remember to whom I owed it, and I continued to give my shilling, until one day when I was at a meeting, there was a gentleman speaking very earnestly, and a voice said to me, 'James Rigley, James Rigley, God has done a great deal for thee; what hast thou done for Him?' I said, 'True, Lord, I will give a sovereign; and I put a sovereign in the plate accordingly, but as soon as ever I got out of the chapel the devil began to tease me, and he cried, 'Oh, James Rigley, James Rigley, what a fool thou art, thou hast gone and given for one time what would have done for twenty times.' I said, 'that will not do. If you are not quiet, I will give two sovereigns.' So the next time I gave the two sovereigns. Still, I was not easy; for I felt that I still had not given as much as I ought; and then the devil began troubling me again, 'Oh, James Rigley, thou art a greater fool than ever;' and in fact I could not get rid of him till I said, 'I am determined to end this;' and the next meeting I went to, I was doubting how much to give, and the devil kept saying, 'Now don't be a fool;' and I determined what I would do, and that I would give five pounds; and I gave the five pounds, and the devil has never troubled me about the matter since."

GOOD FRIDAY REQUESTS.

Our forefathers had some strange notions respecting the best mode of disposing of their surplus means. An inhabitant of a London parish, for instance, who lived about the middle of the fifteenth century, left six or eight shillings to be spent annually in the purchase of faggots with which to burn heretics. Another testator, one Peter Symonds, by will dated 1586, left money for a sermon to be preached every Good Friday in All Hallows Church, Lombard-street, and for a penny and a packet of raisins or plums to be given to each of sixty younger scholars of Christ's Hospital who should attend the service. This custom was observed on last Good Friday, when several other children were made happy, and a number of poor persons had a dole of money and bread. In the parish of St. Bartholomew the Great, another donor left a small sum to be distributed on Good Friday over his tomb. The tomb, however, is gone, and this year the officiating clergyman, after the service, came out into the footpath leading to the church, and threw down 24 sixpences on a flat stone, which were eagerly picked up by the same number of old women who had been previously selected to receive the gift.

INTELLIGENCE.

BIRMINGHAM FREE CHRISTIAN SOCIETY.—On Sunday last, May 3rd, special services were held in celebration of the completion of the school premises. The sermons were preached by the secretary, Mr. G. R. Twinn, and the collections amounted to £4. 11s. 5½d. A tea meeting was held on the following evening, about 150 persons present. After tea Mr. S. Thornton presided. There were also present the Revs. C. Clarke, B. Wright, B. Cotton, and E. Madeley; Messrs. S. B. Whitfield, J. R. Mott, T.

Prime, jun., G. R. Twinn, F. Grew, F. Summers, B. Whitehouse, A. B. Matthews, and others. Mr. Twinn gave a narrative of the operations of the society, and addresses were delivered by Rev. C. Clarke, E. Madeley (Swedenborgian), and several other friends. On the following evening (Tuesday), the pupils in the Sunday and week night schools were treated to a free tea, followed by an entertainment, consisting of a series of magic lantern views, kindly exhibited by Mr. T. Prime, jun., songs, recitations, &c.

BLACKBURN.—The Unitarian Society here being compelled, from a variety of causes, to give up the tenancy of their preaching room, have for some months been without any place to meet in. They have, however, now taken the room known as Cobden Hall, and held their opening services on Sunday last, when sermons were preached, morning and evening, by the Rev. M. C. Frankland, of Chobent. The attendance was very encouraging.

DOB-LANE, FAIRSWORTH.—The annual meeting of this congregation was held on Sunday afternoon last, Mr. Harry Rawson, one of the trustees, presiding. The reports of the chapel and school committees were very satisfactory. All the institutions connected with the place were flourishing, under the active supervision of the Rev. W. G. Cadman. It is intended shortly to adopt chanting as a part of the service, and a committee was appointed to make the necessary preparations. With regard to pecuniary matters, the report stated the following facts: That the income in 1866 from quarterly rents of pews and sittings was £15. 5s. 6d.; that in 1867, during a portion of which the offertory was in use, the sum realised was £32. 8s. 5d.; whilst the first entire year of the latter system had produced the sum of £39. 12s. 5d.

HALIFAX.—On Tuesday last, a tea meeting of a very interesting character took place in the school-room. The members of the choir singing class met together to express their esteem towards Mr. Lonsdale, the organist and leader of the choir, by presenting him with a beautiful copy of Webbe's Anthems. The volume contained an inscription very elaborately illuminated by Mr. Hirst, a member of the class.

HULME DOMESTIC MISSION.—On Sunday last, the ninth anniversary sermons were preached in the above place of worship; in the morning by the Rev. S. A. Steinhil, in the evening by the Rev. Wm. Gaskell, M.A. The attendance on each occasion was very good. On Monday evening, the annual congregational tea meeting was held, the Rev. J. Harrop in the chair. Addresses were given by the chairman, and by Rev. W. H. Herford, B.A., and also by Messrs. John Francis, Samuel Barnes, George Smith, Jesse Pilcher, and Joseph Rowland, interspersed with readings and recitations. The above services are the last of the kind that our Tomlinson-street friends will hold in their present premises, as they expect very shortly to take possession of their new and more commodious schools, which are now rapidly approaching completion.

LEEDS.—On Sunday afternoon last, the second annual service for the scholars in three Unitarian schools of Mill Hill, Holbeck, and Hunslet was held in Mill Hill Chapel. The whole of the body of the chapel was occupied by the scholars and teachers, and the gallery with members of the different congregations, and altogether there were between 600 and 700 present on the occasion. The service, which was beautifully simple in its character, was conducted by the Rev. R. Pilcher, B.A., of Bradford. The address to the young people was upon "education," which the preacher described as the drawing forth of all the powers of body, mind, and soul. Throughout the address the scholars preserved great attention, and seemed truly interested in it. The service concluded by the singing of a hymn, the Lord's prayer repeated by the congregation, and the benediction pronounced by the minister.

MOSSLEY.—The school sermons were preached on Sunday, May 3rd, by the Revs. D. Berry, H. E. Dowson, B.A., and J. Page Hopps, when the collections realised £47. 15s. 12d.

NEWTONARDS.—The first Presbyterian congregation at this place has just lost by death one of its staunchest members, the late John McKittrick, whose remains were interred at Bangor on the 27th ult. Seceding at an early period from orthodoxy, he became a Unitarian from conviction, and for nearly half a century was an example of manly independence, temperance, Christian liberality, and industry. His public career was characterised by an earnest effort to liberalise the institutions of his country, always by moderate means. He took part in the effort to get the system of "national education for Ireland" as the best antidote to ignorance and superstition; and having received a liberal education himself, and profited much by intercourse with men of culture, he privately helped many others disposed to improve themselves to do so, and thereby to independence. A well-deserved tribute to his public usefulness and generosity as a citizen was given by the closing of all the shops during the funeral, at which there was a very large number present of every religious sect and political party.

SEATON DELAVAL.—On Saturday evening last, the Rev. J. C. Street lectured in the schoolroom here, on "Unitarianism adapted to the wants of the people." The large room, which holds about 400 persons, was crowded. After the discourse two Methodist local preachers made some objections, to which Mr. Street replied in a very effective way.

WEST RIDING SUNDAY-SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.—The first printed report of this association, which includes 16 schools, shows on the books 1,870 scholars, with an average attendance of 1,223, or 60.5 per cent. Arithmetic is taught in eight schools, dictation in nine, geography in six, grammar in one, English history in three, Scripture history in twelve, and religious teaching in fourteen. The report gives a list of the books used in the sixteen schools, and the number of schools which use each book. Twelve of them use the Bible published by the British and Foreign Society, and ten use the New Testament.

CORRESPONDENCE.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

T. C.—You are right as to the origin of the mistake, but it hardly calls for correction.

THE LIBERATION SOCIETY.

To the Editors.—Your article on this subject, in your last number, seems to call upon some of us who stand aloof from the Liberation Society to explain for ourselves on what grounds we do so; and, if you will allow me, I shall be glad to state, in the fewest possible words, why I cannot respond to your invitation to look with confidence on the operations of that society.

(1.) Its members and leaders are mostly, it is well known, of the Independent and Baptist denominations; men who have really no just idea of the claims of religious liberty or religious truth. If they do not actually themselves impose model deeds, schedules of orthodox doctrine, subscription to articles on admission to colleges, and the restriction of the Lord's table to a select few, they uphold the systems under which these things are done. And more than this, would not some of them put a congregation into Chancery, if, in the progress of its religious development, it should be found to have deviated from the doctrinal standpoint of its predecessors of two or three generations ago? Such men as Mr. G. Hadfield, M.P., and Mr. T. S. James (see his recently published volume) would unquestionably do so. They disapprove of the Dissenters' Chapels Act, and would repeal it if they could. I should very much like to know what Mr. Miall and other Liberationist leaders say on this point. Until they speak out, and relieve themselves from the suspicion of sympathising in such feelings, they must excuse me if I decline to regard them as true friends of religious liberty. I prefer to look up to such leaders as Mr. Gladstone, Earl Russell, and Mr. Bright.

(2.) The great object which the Liberation Society is aiming at appears to me to be an unwise object, and one which, if attained, would be exceedingly prejudicial to the spiritual interests of the English nation. They want to disestablish the Church of England. To this I should offer no objection, if the evils involved in its present position can be got rid of in no other way. But I cannot follow them in proposing to divert the revenues of the Church from the religious uses to which they are now applied. We must have churches and chapels, colleges and education for ministers, with many other things of the outward material kind, which require a large annual expenditure of money. Why should not the Church revenues be still used for such purposes, as well as to supplement and stimulate voluntary offerings for the maintenance of a national clergy? Why should we not do on the large and comprehensive scale what we all admit must and ought to be done?—only that the Liberationists would do it in sections, instead of unitedly, and would have a number of little sectarian churches instead of one great national church. They would thus, in effect, give our English Christianity into the keeping of a number of sects; and, in the present temper of these bodies, it is easy to anticipate what will become of religious liberty in their hands. In fact, it appears to me that the battle of religious freedom will have to be fought over again, in order to rescue and save the Gospel from a little, narrow sectarian orthodoxy.

And why, again, I would ask, is the idea of a comprehensive national church to be characterised as a "vain dream?" I take the liberty of saying that it is no more of a vain dream than it would have been, three or four years ago, to anticipate that a majority of sixty in the unreformed House of Commons would have voted for the disestablishment of the Irish Church; no more a vain dream than it would have been, within the memory of many who are not yet old men, to speak of the transformation of the borough-mongering system of that day into the household suffrage upon which we are about to enter.

At all events, if the idea of a national church be a vain dream, it is pretty evident who helps to make it so!

Moreover, it is doubtful whether simple disestablishment in England be a practicable thing, even if the nation were ever so resolved about it,—practicable, I mean, on the score of equity. Who is to have the churches, cathedrals, and parsonages? If they were given up to the present possessors without any payment, this would be tantamount to a perpetual endowment of very considerable value. And why should the wealthiest section of the nation receive such an endowment, and all the rest be left to provide for themselves?

The fair course, and the only course, I submit, which is worthy of a great Christian nation, is to redistribute the revenues, on some just principle, among all the religious bodies which the nation contains, treating all alike with perfect impartiality, so far as the State is concerned; leaving to each, indeed, the profession and development of its own doctrines, and form of church government, but providing, nevertheless, that no private or sectarian test of Christianity shall be maintained by any communion in receipt of national funds.

This I believe to be quite a practicable object to pursue, but the subject is too large for a letter, and I will not attempt to dwell further upon it. I have, I believe, said enough to show that there is ample ground both for distrusting the leaders of the Liberationist movement, and for doubting the wisdom and expediency of the principal object at which they are aiming.—I remain, &c.,

G. VANCE SMITH.

A SUGGESTION.

A FRIEND connected with one of the orthodox congregations in a town of the West of England, sends the following suggestion:

"I am very glad that in your reference to Mr. Henn's pamphlet you admit the importance of 'some short work giving plain and popular explanations of leading passages of Scripture,' on those topics where the Orthodox and Unitarians differ. Dissatisfied with the explanations usually offered by those among whom I have usually associated, and with whom I still join in worship, I have often wished that a column were open in the Herald for inquirers, and another devoted to the fair and candid exposition of difficult texts. You need not print letters or correspondence which would grow cumbrous and, perhaps, both discursive and controversial; but use your own discretion in selecting the points where interest lies, and treat them in your own way. I don't think the Herald does the work which, in its relation to inquirers, it ought to do. I have taken it from its first number. I now take three weekly, giving two to my friends, and believe it to be the most interesting pennyworth published; but it can be made more useful to those who are outside of your congregations if you think proper."

There are so many demands upon our space that we cannot promise to give anything like a systematic treatment of the points in controversy, but we shall be glad from time to time to answer inquiries or give any special explanations that may be asked, to the best of our power.—ENDS. U. H.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

The Bishop of Natal has printed a translation into the Zulu language of the first part of the "Pilgrim's Progress," and is proceeding with the remainder, the work being highly appreciated by those for whose use it is designed.

The cupola of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem is nearly finished. The Princess de la Tour d'Auvergne has made a present to France of the spot on the Mount of Olives where, according to Latin tradition, our Lord taught the "Pater-noster" to his disciples, and the Sultan has sanctioned the gift. The Princess intends to make a cloister round the spot, like the Campo Santo at Pisa, and to cover the walls with porcelain tiles, on which the Lord's Prayer will be inscribed in all the languages of the world.

Dr. Norman Macleod has arrived from India, and though his health gave way before his departure from Calcutta, he is now much better, and a short season of rest among his native mountains, it is hoped, will be sufficient to restore him to his former vigour. He reappeared in his pulpit at Glasgow on Sunday afternoon, and preached from the words, "We thanked God, and took courage."

The telegraph has again been entrusted with the Pope's blessing. A few hours before the death of Narvaez, Duke of Valencia, the said blessing, along with a general absolution, was conveyed to him by the wires, as a consolation from His Holiness. According to the Gironde, when the Marshal felt his end was near, he called for a confessor. The priest, among other things, exhorted his penitent to forgive his enemies. "My enemies!" ejaculated Narvaez, "I am not aware that I have any." "Every man must have enemies," explained the priest, "no matter how Christianlike and blameless his life may have been." "I am perfectly aware that I have had many enemies," replied Narvaez, "but, happily, they are all dead. I have always been in the habit of having them shot."

The King of Portugal has conferred upon Sir John Bowring the Cross of a Knight Commander of the Order of Christ.

On the occasion of the Prince Imperial's first communion three thousand poor children also received theirs too, coupled with a gratuity of fifty francs each. A medal has been struck on the occasion, and sold largely in the gardens of the Tuileries, where all the children were seen decorated as chevaliers de l'Eucharistie. The Opposition papers respectfully remark that this munificent act of faith and charity will cost the country exactly 150,000 francs.

The liberal movement among the Manchester Friends, which we lately referred to, and which some of our orthodox contemporaries very unfairly speak of as a "renewed tendency towards Deistical doctrines," has called forth a pamphlet from Mr. Robert Charleton, a leading Quaker of Bristol, condemnatory of the heterodox teachings of "Barclay's Apology," a work which till recently has been regarded as a standard authority by the Friends, but which is now believed to have exercised a powerful influence in producing what are called the "unsound" opinions, and leading to the secession from the Society, in America, of 80,000 Hick-sites, or Unitarian Friends.

From a letter just issued by the Bishop of London to his clergy, it appears that the amount paid to his Fund is £247,300, and the amount promised £72,700, making a total of £320,000.

At the annual meeting of the Bible Society, it was stated that the issues of copies or portions of the Scriptures during the year had been, from the dépôt at home, 1,351,989; from dépôts abroad, 1,048,787; total, 2,400,776; and that the total issues of the society now amounted to 55,069,865 copies. When it commenced, it was supposed that there were not much more than five or six millions of copies of the Scriptures in the world.

Various other religious meetings have been held during the week. Among them were the annual soirée of the Evangelical Alliance, presided over by the Earl of Chichester; the meeting of the Baptist Missionary Society, at which a hopeful account was given of missions in India, it being stated that in Calcutta alone there are now 300 houses of Hindoos to which Christian women may go and teach the Gospel; and that of the London Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews, the income of which for the year was £36,075, and the expenditure £35,976.

The first number of a new paper entitled the Presbyterian, conducted by members of the Free Church of Scotland, has made its appearance this month.

Mr. Bennett, the Vicar of Frome, seems to be taking fright at the prosecution with which he is threatened for what he calls "two questionable phrases" in his pamphlet entitled a "Plea for Toleration." In a letter to the Guardian he states that in a new edition, now in the press, the phrases will be corrected, and requests his friends to insert in their present copies, instead of the word "Visible" at p. 3, these words, "Presence of our Lord under the form of Bread and Wine," and instead of "consecrated elements" at p. 14, to insert after the word "adore," "Christ present in the Sacrament under the form of Bread and Wine."

On the night of the debate upon Mr. Gladstone's first resolution, after he had presented a petition against the Regium Donum, Sir Charles Lanyon, evidently with the wish to bring discredit upon the petition, asked if he was aware that it came from Unitarians. It is instructive to mark, in managing the Irish question, what petty shifts the opponents of disestablishment and disendowment, from the Premier down to the most insignificant of his followers, are obliged to have recourse to. What is right and just seems hardly to enter into their consideration. We rejoice that, while the Irish Presbyterians generally are still showing a hankering after the retention of the Donum, the first petition against it should have proceeded from Unitarians, though by some of our ministers, no doubt, its withdrawal will, for a time, be severely felt.

A petition presented by Mr. Hardcastle from persons worshipping at the Primitive Methodist Chapel at Westhall, in Suffolk, shows the deceptions which even clergymen will practise for the furtherance of their ends. The petition states:

"That on the 29th of March last a form of petition was sent by the hands of a messenger, who brought with it a message from the Rev. Henry Albert Goodwin, the vicar of Westhall, to Mr. Robert Meadows, one of our number, that such petition was against Popery, but without stating that it was against the disendowment of the Irish Church. That such petition was signed by your petitioners and others entirely under the impression that it was intended to prevent the spread of Popery, and after having been so signed, was returned to the said Rev. H. A. Goodwin; but that, far from wishing to assist in keeping up so foul an establishment as the Irish Church, your petitioners earnestly pray your honourable House to at once pass an act for its entire disestablishment."

Dr. Atlay, of Leeds, who is described as a moderate High Churchman, an accomplished scholar, and a hard-working parish priest, has been nominated to the vacant bishopric of Hereford.

Dr. Robert Payne Smith, canon of Christ Church and Regius Professor of Divinity, Oxford, is elected Bampton Lecturer for 1868.

According to the ministerial Globe, the report of the Royal Commission on the Irish Church recommends that one of the archbishoprics and certain of the bishoprics should be abolished, but does not either recommend or point to disestablishment or disendowment.

When Mr. Freeman, the archdeacon of Exeter, was about to make his last visitation, a printed circular was sent round to the churchwardens requiring them to fill up the following paper of questions, which were accompanied by extracts from Dr. F. G. Lee's "Directorium Anglicanum," in the compilation of which the Archdeacon is said to have assisted:

"1. Have you, at the expense of the parish, provided an amice, a chasuble, an alb, a stole, a masuple, a zucchetto, and a beretta? 2. Are these vestments white, according to a recent recommendation of your Archdeacon, or coloured? 3. Is the communion table removed, and an altar of stone substituted for it? 4. Is there an incense-pot? 5. Does your priest know when to join his fingers, when to stick his elbows into his sides, when to bow, when to turn north, east, south, and west? 6. Does he burn incense at the proper time? 7. If so, how does it smell? 8. Does he wash his fingers in the ablutions, as directed, and then swallow them? 9. Does he wash the corporal?"

Several of the gentlemen to whom these questions were forwarded filled them up as well as they could, in perfectly good faith, without suspecting that they were victims of a hoax.

On Wednesday, Mr. Coleridge moved the second reading of the University Tests Bill, and defended it from the arguments recently brought against it, which were addressed to base and gross prejudices, and unsupported by facts and history. Mr. Walpole moved the rejection of the bill, contending that there was nothing in the present constitution of the universities which deprived any class of the liberty which Mr. Coleridge claimed. The debate had to be adjourned, as it was not concluded before six o'clock.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

M. Lemoine, an intelligent and Liberal Catholic, in an article in the Débats, accounts for the difference which there is between the religious condition of England and that of France by the difference of training. After remarking that "Theology is at the bottom of every question," and that the principle of Protestantism is freedom of examination, which with us is regarded as the source of truth and the means of enlightenment, he goes on to say:

"The French people, of whom the great majority receive only a third or fourth rate education in religious matters, are pretty nearly equally divided between infidelity and superstition. They accept their religion as they accept their arrondissement—ready made, that is, without taking the trouble to examine or even feeling the necessity of examining for themselves. In this respect the religious journals are quite right when they assert that out of the hundreds of thousands of readers who devour regularly the infidel press three parts are 'Catholics without knowing it.' They are not aware of the fact, because it is simply engrained in their constitution, their hereditary temperament and historical descent. Paradoxical as it may appear to say so, the France of '89 is also the France of the Syllabus, and the whole together still forms but one and the same France. But, according to the Syllabus, which is the only true interpreter of real 'Catholic' doctrine, liberty is an evil, or rather it is Evil personified. Consequently, all freedom of examination, liberty of discussion, liberty of interpretation, are, a priori, things to be condemned."

The Monde reproduces an article from the Civiltà Cattolica, which fully bears out M. Lemoine's statements, and shows how absolute the opinions of the Papacy are on the question of "liberty." Liberty of conscience, according to this article, is "a modern idea, evidently false," and so, likewise, is any "tolerance" founded on "respect of opinions." Catholicism "alone can deliver man from eternal punishment," and "every other form of religion is to be detested and censored." Liberty of public worship is not only unlawful in itself, but pernicious to the State, and princes are bound to prohibit it by every means in their power.

In one of his letters to the Liberal Christian, Dr. Bellows remarks:

"Mussulman power becomes appalling as we approach the shores where Africa and Asia meet. Europe. Here one begins to realise the vast superiority of numbers under which Christianity staggers. There are, by the best authorities I have been able to consult, about 260 millions of Christians in the world, leaving nearly a thousand millions of heathen, among whom, in Africa and Asia, there may be at least 260 millions of Mussulmans. Of the 260 millions of Christians only 95 millions are Protestant, 175 millions being Roman Catholic, and 90 millions Greek Church. So far as superstition and ignorance are concerned, there is not so much to choose between the peasantry in the Roman and the Greek churches, and the common Mussulmans. Indeed, I should think in point of morality and self-respect, the Bedouins and Algerines superior to Spanish mendicants, Russian beggars, and Italian Jazarons. What a task Protestantism has to balance and overcome the dead weight of ignorance, fanaticism, priestcraft, and servility which now loads more than three-quarters of the globe! Can it afford to allow divisions, antagonisms, sectarian quarrels and antipathies to use up its strength and divide the bundle of faggots, irresistible in its unity, until twig by twig the whole is broken?"

Professor Jowett preached on Sunday morning to a large congregation in St. Luke's, Berwick-street, from the text, "Every one of you saith I am of Paul, and I of Apollos, and I of Cephas, and I of Christ. Is Christ divided?" He spoke at length on the divisions which had at various times prevailed in the Christian Church, adverting particularly to the Sacramental and Evangelical parties, and the later party who professed to seek after truth independent of all religious creeds. He animadverted severely on those who devoted themselves to party, and by their exclusiveness stood in the way of practical work. A man of that sort who had lived during the past half century might say, I have by my obstinacy delayed the education of the people for fifty years; I have in the same way retarded the practical influence of the Church;—I have, by agreeing to that vote of censure passed thirty years ago on a Bishop now gone to his grave, not a single page of whose books I had read, helped to stay the progress of inquiry; I recollect that keen controversy thirty years ago with Bishop so and so, now gone and whom I hope to meet in Heaven; but what was it all about?

At the annual meeting of the Bible Society, the Rev. Dr. Fowler, of America, thus spiritedly referred to Mr. Disraeli's pretended belief that the separation of Church and State would lead first to a great multiplication of Protestant sects, and then to their absorption by Romanism:

"Among the objections to the measure that had been approved of by so decisive a vote of the House on the Thursday preceding, was this, that on the removal of exterior help, Protestantism must be overwhelmed by Romanism. I confess that all the Protestantism—may I not say all the religion—within me revolted at the thought, and the cry of my soul was, No! No, never! I do not, of course, take it upon me to say—this is not the place for any one to say whether the exterior help of the Church is essential or desirable for it or not; nor do I say whether that help is needed for Protestantism; but I do say that if it be withdrawn there is power enough in Protestant truth any time and any where to conquer Romanism. I am sure I cannot mistake the sentiment of every true Briton, as I know I do not mistake the sentiment of any true American, when I say, an open field, a fair fight, and God help the right."

In a letter to the Manchester Examiner, Mr. Goldwin Smith writes:

"The fact that a powerful section of the Established clergy are not passively unprogressive, but active enemies of progress, is specially brought home at this moment to the minds of all who are interested in the Universities. A determined effort is being made by the sacerdotal reactionists to cretinise academical education. I can think of no general term more descriptive of the attempt, by excluding from University instruction the most important and stimulating subjects, the best books, and the ablest teachers, to bring the intellect of the students, and of the class to which they belong, down to the level necessary for the unquestioning acceptance of that which reason has not only questioned but rejected as untruth. Consider what a level that is—consider to what a state the mind, and not only the mind, but the character of English youth and of England generally must be reduced in order willingly to bow itself to the Ritualistic yoke, and to accept the authority of the Ritualistic clergy as superior to reason and conscience!"

A correspondent of the Pall Mall, who thinks that if the Bishops had taken their stand upon the great difference in the circumstances of the English and Irish Churches, and confined themselves to obtaining satisfactory articles of separation, the former would have come out stronger and brighter from her present trial, protests against the "sink or swim" together policy which has been adopted; and says:

"If the present state of the question were put in the form of an apologue, it would be something as follows:—'A good ship was sailing with a crazy barque in tow. The officers assembled in council, and the decision was not to cut the barque adrift.' However generous this may have been, was it the wisest and best resolution for all concerned? The barque must sink, but will the ship now weather the storm?"

The Rev. T. T. Carter, in urging the clergy to sign the petition to Convocation on the Natal question, which has upwards of 1,000 names attached to it, says:—

"If ever there was a point on which it seems reasonable to show that we feel strongly, and on which the clergy more especially, of all orders, are bound to act as one man, it is surely this dreadful scandal which weighs so heavily and anxiously in our hearts."

The personalities in which the clergy, High Church and Evangelical, indulge towards each other, are getting quite scandalous. In a lecture at Liverpool, delivered the other day, under the auspices of the English Church Union, Dr. Littledale, after speaking of "the leading English and Scottish Reformers" as a "set of miscreants," and saying that Robespierre, Danton, Marat, &c., "merited quite as much admiration and respect as Cranmer, Ridley, Latimer, and Hooper," he added, referring evidently to Dr. McNeile:

"Within the present century there was a popular preacher at a great English seaport who showed clearly that the spirit of persecution was far from extinct. He was not a person who had ever written anything which did credit to his head, or done anything which was a credit to his heart. But he declared himself, on his own authority, to be 'a great and good man,' and found some people silly enough to believe him. That person had avowed that, if he had the power, he would pass a law punishing with death every clergyman who practised auricular confession. If that person had the power, how many victims would he have? Would not Mary Tudor be left far behind?"

On the assertion made by Archdeacon Sinclair, in a charge to the clergy of Middlesex, that writings "not only intelligible, but interesting to the artisan, the petty trader, the shopman, the clerk, and other similar classes, . . . issue daily, monthly, and yearly from the press by millions," the Pall Mall observes:

"It has been usual to contrast the coarseness and levity of anti-Christian writers of the eighteenth century—Voltaire and Paine, for instance—with the unctious, not to say pious, with which the Deists, Secularists, and Positivists of our own days express their views. As to the writings issued 'by millions,' daily, monthly, and yearly, it is much to be wished that the Archdeacon would mention names. There used some years ago to be a small Secularist paper called the Reasoner, which was published, if we remember rightly, in Fleet-street, but it has been given up for several years, and its circulation was exceedingly small. When Mr. Congreve and his six or seven adherents see fit to make a demonstration upon any subject, the signature of a bookseller and publisher of whom we know nothing except that he publishes some of Mr. Congreve's pamphlets, is usually attached to the manifesto. Mr. Bradlaugh, who furnished the Saturday Reviewers with an additional sting to articles in which his name was coupled with that of Mr. Beales, avowed atheistical views, but they met with so little favour that he had to leave the committee of the Reform Association because he brought discredit on the cause. These, however, are very exceptional cases, and we firmly believe that the notion of atheistical productions circulated by millions, so often referred to with a shudder by clerical writers, is a mere bugbear."

At a synod of the Established Church of Scotland, the Rev. R. Wallace, who seems to be taking the place of the late Dr. Lee, as leader of the Liberal party, gave a very simple and straightforward definition of what he conceived to be the ideal of a National Church, but which he felt was for the present impracticable, because it had no chance of receiving fair consideration. He ridiculed the idea of the House of Commons settling the principles of religious truth, and maintained that "the only kind of Established Church which the State is competent to create is an organisation of religious teachers competent as to character, ability, and learning, made entirely dependent of the temptations of popular control, and left perfectly free to speak what seems to them to be true."

An article in St. Paul's on the Irish Church Debate concludes with these sharp sentences:

"We have said nothing of the evils by the acknowledged existence of which the Irish Church Establishment has been doomed. It would be vain to repeat again and again the stories of parishes with thirty—twenty—ten—five Protestants—with one—or perhaps not even with one Protestant, to justify the existence of a parson. The very contradictions to the statements made have proved their truth. When whole columns are written by the staunch defenders of the Establishment to exhibit the falseness of the statement declaring that the parish of A has only three Protestants, whereas it is well known to have four, and that B has three, whereas it has been said to have none, need any one seek further evidence?"

OLD TESTAMENT CHAPTERS FOR THE SUNDAY SCHOOL.—IV.

SUBJECT: "Ancient Hebrew modes of worshipping Jehovah before the time of their final rejection of the use of images."

Read Judges, chap. xvii. and xviii., the story of Micah, the man of Ephraim, who had a house of gods: a graven image, a molten image, and teraphs (probably wooden images). Point out that the young Levite whom Micah took to be his priest was of the tribe of Judah, and not of the tribe of Levi; which circumstance shows the account to have been written before the establishment of the Levites as the priesthood, as they were afterwards under the Hebrew kings. And search among the early books for other instances of the use of images being suffered among the Hebrews, as, for example, the images that Rachel stole from her father Laban, and the image that David's wife, Michal, laid in the bed.

Read, on the other hand, Deut. iv., 15—31. "Take ye therefore good heed unto yourselves, . . . lest ye corrupt yourselves, and make to you a graven image, the similitude of any figure," &c. And remark how strong a disapproval of images had grown up among the Hebrews during the three centuries and a half that elapsed between the early writings of the books of Judges and Samuel, and the reign of king Josiah, when Deuteronomy is supposed to have been written.

AMERICAN NOTES.

A statue of the poet Bryant, an honoured member of our household of faith, is to be placed in the new Central Park at New York.

The action of the Episcopal Church in New York towards the Rev. S. Tyng seems to have aroused a defiant spirit in that portion of the clergy which sympathises with him. Since the reprimand two others have committed the offence of preaching in the pulpits of non-episcopal denominations, and the Rev. D. R. Brewer, of Brooklyn, recently took a seat in the Methodist conference in that city, and at the communion service on Good Friday had several clergymen of other denominations seated with him in the chancel assisting in the service.

We learn from the Liberal Christian that the Episcopal Church is not the only one that is "exercised." Mr. Malcom, a Baptist minister at Newport, a young man of fine talents and culture, is a determined advocate of "open communion," and in consequence of this innovation his church has been refused fellowship, and his case is to be tried at the next meeting of the Association. He has been assured of the sympathy and aid of many Baptist ministers in his course and trial. He is a friend of Mr. Hubbard, the second Episcopal offender, who has added to his first "transgression" by preaching in the Congregational Meeting House, at New London, without consent, for which misdemeanour he has been arraigned. It is said that an Episcopal clergyman remarked to Bishop Clark: "Unless you treat this matter very tenderly, you will have the Methodist division over again." To which the Bishop replied: "I think it will come any way. I don't know how wide this disaffection spreads; but it seems to be a foregone conclusion that we shall split. Some things must be ground to powder to work them over again."

The Michigan Journal contains an interesting sketch of the life of Father Baraga, Bishop of Marquette, who died there last January. A Carniolan by birth, the son of wealthy parents, after studying for several years in the University of Vienna, and acquiring the mastery of several European languages, in 1828 he was elected priest, and three years afterwards went to America, and laboured as a missionary among the Indians, in the Lake regions, with unceasing diligence up to the time of his death, having, it is said, baptised (half-breeds included) about 3,000 Ottawa and Ojibway Indians. Before leaving Europe he divided his property among his relations, reserving only a small annuity for his own use; and in his new position he thoroughly adapted himself to the Indian mode of life, hardening himself to exposure and dispensing with all luxuries; nor did he make any change in his living when he was appointed Bishop of Marquette and Sault St. Marie. With a single exception, at every station he was a pioneer, and even at La Pointe every trace of the once active Jesuit Mission had disappeared before his arrival. When the copper mines of Upper Michigan were opened in 1844 he made the round of them at great risk to satisfy the religious wants of the miners. Often he would preach in one day in four languages—German, French, English, and the Ojibway; he could speak seven with fluency. Thus his reputation grew immensely in those parts, and he was welcome to the captains of vessels and an object of superstitious reverence to the Indians. The following is a list of his works while among them: 1. Anamie-Masinaigan, a prayer-book in the Ojibway language, with an appendix of songs and a catechism. Many editions of this were published, and the work was finally stereotyped. Baraga also published a version of it in the Ottawa dialect, which ran through several editions. 2. Gagikwe-Masinaigan; excerpts from the Old and New Testaments, containing chiefly Epistles and Gospels for Sundays and holydays. This too appeared in the Ottawa dialect. 3. Nanagatawendamowinan. A complete exposition of the Christian doctrine. 4. Kagige Debwewinam. "Some Truths:" a book of meditations, consisting of short sermons. 5. A Theoretical and Practical Grammar of the Otchipue Language. 6. A Dictionary of the Otchipue Language, for the use of missionaries, &c. His most important works are the two last mentioned, which are a valuable contribution to comparative philology.

One of the most significant events which has occurred in America since the close of the war, is the recent election in South Carolina. A large immigration from the North having taken place, it has virtually become a New England State. A constitution has been adopted, which places the negroes on an entire equality with the whites, and a school system established giving equal advantages to the two races. A Radical Republican, Mr. Scott, has been elected governor, and a Mr. Cordoza, a negro, a graduate of Glasgow University, chosen Secretary of State. A considerable proportion of the new Legislature are negroes, and a majority of it Radicals.

A BISHOP ON THE TRINITY.

We take the following passages from the Essay on Spirit (edition, London, 1751), by Dr. Clayton, Bishop of Clogher.

"When the title of God is given in the Scriptures to any other being but the Father, we are to understand this only as expressive of some God-like power which hath been given or communicated to that being by God the Father. . . . When all power, therefore, in heaven and earth was given to the Son, he was made a God to those beings over whom that power was given, and over those only.—Section xxi.

"The Son becometh our God, not so much on account of his having been employed in our creation, and that by him God created the world, as because all judgment is committed unto him."—Section cii.

"The doctrine of the Trinity is as certainly revealed in the 19th verse of the 28th chapter of St. Matthew as the doctrine of the Eucharist is in the 26th verse of the 26th chapter of the same evangelist. But the Scriptures are as silent about the consubstantiality of the one, as about the transubstantiation of the other. Whence, then, came the revelation of these wondrous doctrines? Why, both originally from the same oracle—from the Papal chair."—Section clvii.

To this Essay many replies were published: and the orthodox forged in the name of its author a Sequel, and afterwards a Genuine Sequel to it. In 1753 the Bishop published a pamphlet, called Thoughts on Self-love, chiefly in reply to some metaphysical doctrines of David Hume, and in it he censures these forgeries; and after alluding to the statement made in the Genuine Sequel, that he had received the first hint of the Essay on Spirit, and also assistance in its composition, from another person, he says (p. 48): "I neither received the hint nor assistance from any man whatsoever, and I wrote it with no other view than that of endeavouring to ease Christianity from that load of error, in the Athanasian exposition of the doctrine of the Trinity, which hangs like a millstone about the neck of it. For . . . if the Trinity be a mystery, let it remain so." And again (p. 50): "I have met with no answers or arguments since the publication of that treatise which have occasioned any alteration in my mind upon that subject, but rather the contrary;" inasmuch as he was led to think that the cause must be bad which had to be supported by forgery and calumny.

With respect to the Trinity, he says (p. 52): "As God the Father and God the Son are always represented in Scripture as two separate and distinct agents, . . . they cannot possibly be but one and the same individual substance or Being. And because reason, revelation, and human authority all combine in declaring for a priority of existence as well as a subordination of power between Father and Son, as the very terms themselves imply, . . . they cannot be co-eternal and co-equal. For if there be in nature such a thing as a contradiction in terms, it must be to say that a Son is coeval with his Father; or, as our Saviour observes, to assert that the servant is equal to his Lord, or he that is sent equal to him that sent him.

His opinions on another subject are equally bold and equally sensible. He says (p. 17):

"The expression of an Original Sin is a contradiction in terms; for, as the word sin implies an act of the will, so the word original implies the direct contrary, and supposes the criminal act to have been committed by another person, to which act that person to whom the sin is imputed neither contributed by thought, word, or deed."

And again (p. 40):

"What is commonly called the corruption of our nature is the necessary consequence of a tedious infancy, during which time we are entirely governed by our sensual appetites, which, from the very frame of our nature as at present constituted, must have had an advantage over our intellectual faculties, whether our first parents had transgressed or not."

After these quotations, it may be well to add that neither was Bishop Clayton "deposed" by his "metropolitan," nor did those who owed him money decline to pay it unless compelled by the Court of Chancery. He was never "excommunicated," and he died a natural death. Times are changed, and with them the liberties of bishops. CYRIL.

The Unitarian Herald.

FRIDAY, MAY 15, 1868.

THE EPISCOPAL VIEW OF THE SITUATION.

THERE are some defences that are much more damaging than silence, and we are much mistaken if the great Episcopal demonstration at St. James's Hall, last week, does not prove of this kind. A Bishop is a kind of being that should only exhibit itself very sparingly in public, and then in associations exclusively of the mild benignant order. But in both these respects the meeting at St. James's Hall is a warning. Good Mr. VERNER, indeed, innocently asked Mr. GLADSTONE if he would persevere with his resolutions after the mind of the Bishops had been so strongly expressed; but that attitude of meek submissiveness has not characterised the general comments of the world on the subject. The general feeling which the whole affair left upon the mind was that of a big trades' union demonstration, in which, for the moment, the most diverse elements had coalesced under the pressure of a sudden peril to their particular monopoly. The saddest element in the whole spectacle was the presence of the Bishop of LONDON and the Dean of WESTMINSTER. One expects His Grace of Lambeth to stand by things as they are; men of change might be admitted to the lower ranks of the Episcopate, but a Primate with an idea of his own is something unheard of. We imagined, however, that in Dr. TAIT and Dr. STANLEY we had men who could rise above the conventional Churchman, and dare to be the knobsticks of their order. We do not for a moment accuse either of them of unfaithfulness to conviction, or of cowardice, but we cannot help feeling how miserably the Church elements amongst which they have always lived must have densified and distorted their moral vision for them to be able to stand up in defence of the Irish Church. Dean STANLEY, at least, is one who clearly sees, and has clearly stated his theory of an Establishment. But, then, that theory does not in any way apply to the state of things in Ireland. The vast majority of those present at the meeting saw this clearly. They were glad enough to have Dean STANLEY on their platform, but they did not want his philosophical Churchmanship—still less did they want his notions of reform, and the clamour which obliged him peremptorily to sit down, need not be altogether regretted, if it shows him the true nature of the party with which he is taking sides.

But the meeting was interesting upon a wider ground than that of its relation to the Irish Church. The Irish question merged into the larger one of Establishments in general; and it happens rather opportunely that our friend Dr. VANCE SMITH's defence of an Established Church, resumed this week in our correspondence column, receives illustration from so distinguished and authoritative an advocate as the Bishop of OXFORD. Unfortunately, however, the Bishop and our correspondent only agree in advocating establishment, being diametrically opposed to one another as to the object and true method of establishment. The Bishop of OXFORD says: "The essence of Establishment I hold to be this—that the nation acknowledges that its subjects need religious teaching, and that adopting a particular form of religion which it believes to be true, it authorises the ministers of that particular form to teach in the name of the State as well as of the Church." This is very clear, only in order to see its precise bearing upon the present Establishment we should have to ask which of the three very distinct forms of faith that the State now "authorises the ministers to teach"—Broadchurch, Ritualist, and Evangelical—is the one which the nation "has selected as true?" We ask no better formula than this of Dr. WILBERFORCE's by which to try the Establishment, and by which to prove its utter unworthiness of the ascendancy and maintenance which is the only article of faith that its diverse and contending elements agree in holding. When we turn to the Nonconformist advocate of Establishment, we hear nothing about the nation's selecting a form of religion. Dr. SMITH's idea is of a church comprehensive enough to admit everybody. We can imagine the appreciative chuckle with which our thoroughgoing Church opponents would read his arguments for Establishment, ridiculing the diversion which they create in the camp of Nonconformity.

Our friend, indeed, in his letter of this week, does little more than repeat and extend his previous arguments. He insists upon identifying the Liberation Society with the narrowest minds among the Baptists and Independents, and "cannot understand how any true friend of religious liberty can follow such leaders." Now, in the first place, he is not asked to follow such leaders. The whole question is not one of following leaders, but of working together for a great common principle, that all varieties of religious life and institution shall stand upon the same footing before the State. In the second place, even if it be true that there is not "one in fifty" among the Baptist and Independent ministers who fully understands the principles of religious liberty, we would simply ask our friend whether he thinks there is even "one in fifty" among the established clergy who understands them? Dr. SMITH cannot see that "state support of religion implies state control." He "cannot see that it necessarily implies anything more than a certain regulation of revenues without any interference with doctrine or liberty of thought and speech." Would he have us to believe that among those with whom he is working to maintain the Establishment, there are as many who will go with him in this broad idea of it, as there are among our Liberationist friends who, working for religious liberty and equality in their national aspects, would also do their best to preserve them in congregational life? We wish some of our very liberal friends would only make half the allowance for the gnats of Dissenting narrowness which they are constantly making for very camels of intolerance among the clergy.

HEAP BRIDGE, NEAR BURY.—On Sunday May 10th, the Rev. Jas. Drummond, B.A., of Manchester, delivered two sermons on behalf of the congregation, who have taken upon themselves the responsibility of maintaining the Sunday service. The amount collected was £22. 18s.

A LETTER FROM CANADA.

A MEMBER of the Toronto Unitarian congregation writes us as follows:—"We have inaugurated our new political condition with a unanimity, as far as Upper and Lower Canada are concerned, seldom met with in things political. The spirit of harmony and the love of country which pervade the masses, extend to our several local legislatures, and their first sessions, with one exception, have been characterised by the almost entire absence of the conflicts of old political parties. A desire to legislate for the country's welfare, and to place the new confederation on a firm and secure basis, irrespective of former political organisations, pervades both the Senate and the House of Commons of our new born nation. Never was there a time in British North America when loyalty to our mother country was more earnest, and we think we begin to see that the cloud of reluctance towards the new confederation which overshadows our maritime provinces is thinning off and beginning to show the silvery edge of a much-hoped-for political harmony. The absence of anything like a church 'by law established,' and the entire equality of all religious denominations in Canada before the law, have contributed largely towards our general harmony and contentment. I wish the people of the United Kingdom would take a leaf out of our book, and blot from their statute book law-made churches.

"There exists also a more liberal and tolerant feeling in matters theological. I speak from the experience of a residence in this country lacking only a few months of half a century; and can state, and do so with feelings of pleasure, that religious intolerance has very perceptibly abated. The field is becoming white unto the harvest, but where are the reapers to be found? Though there is a modification of religious denunciation and intolerance, which indicates a more liberal tone of the public mind, liberal Christianity has as yet assumed a concrete form only in the cities of Montreal and Toronto, where church edifices for the liberal faith have been erected, and congregations gathered. In the former city a numerous, wealthy, and intelligent congregation is established, and some are of opinion that there is now room there for the establishment of a second society. In Toronto, the society, though exhibiting signs of healthy growth, is yet small. Sixty-seven have united with it, most of them heads of families; and of these twenty-seven are accessions made during the years 1866 and 1867. Many of the members contribute liberally towards the current expenses, some giving as high as seventy-five and others fifty dollars per annum, besides occasional contributions to the Sabbath-school fund, and other incidental expenses. These facts may be accepted as proofs that they are deeply in earnest in the good cause; and are willing to make considerable pecuniary sacrifices to sustain it. The church funds have been of late placed in a position to enable the congregation to increase their pastor's salary one hundred dollars per annum. The Sabbath school is also prosperous. There are now seventy-three pupils on its register, with an average attendance of from fifty-five to sixty at each reunion. The increase in the number of pupils within the last two years has been forty-three. Under these circumstances, we think there is good reason to 'thank God, and take courage.'"

FIRESIDE READINGS.

AT THE CHURCH DOOR.

THEY have been hearing how the highest name
Of all the world by a poor man was borne,
And judged the great ones of his day to blame,
Who held that name in scorn.

They have been hearing how that he himself
Looked with God's eye alike on rich and poor,
And even thought the holder of the pelf
Was not of heaven so sure.

They have been hearing how with him, who might Have chosen from the highest in the land,
Poor fishermen found favour in his sight
And welcome at his hand:

And how that all he said and did on earth
Went to uplift the lowly, and to make
All mankind brothers, of one equal birth,
For God the Father's sake.

Surely, inside the church, one life had flowed
From heart to heart—one light, one hope had shone

From heaven, upon one family of God,
Kneeling around one throne!

Yet see them at the door, where rustling Wealth
Meets in a swarm of smiles and shaking hands;
While Poverty shrinks out and off by stealth,
Or at a distance stands.

If, passing to their carriage, rich eyes dare
On lowly fellow-worshipper to rest,
'Tis with the cruel patronising air
That stabs the poor proud breast:

Not with that perfect oneness of their Lord,
Whose breath, more potent than the strongest blast,

Broke down all earthly difference, ignored
The very thought of caste.

O impious Rich, with your unchristian arts,
And this his Sabbath, this his temple door!
O recreant Poor, with Christ within your hearts,
To feel that you are poor!

PART IV.

ETERNAL TORMENT.

HARRY was still lying sick and wasting on his little bed. This morning he had heard the doctor say to his parents, in the next room, and in tones evidently meant not to reach his ear, that he was afraid they must prepare themselves to part with him. Harry was not made sad at hearing these words, except for the thought of the sorrow which his dear parents and his brothers and sisters would feel at losing him. He lay in quiet thought, repeating only to himself a verse of poetry which he had lately learnt:

'Silence filled the courts of heaven, hushed were angel harp and tone,
While a little new-born spirit knelt before the Eternal Throne;
And his small white hands were lifted, clasped as if in earnest prayer,
And his voice in low sweet murmurs rose like music on the air;
Light from the full fount of glory on his robes of whiteness glistened,
And the bright-winged seraphs round him bowed their radiant heads and listened.'

"Lord, from this world of glory here
My heart turns fondly to another,
O Lord our God—the Comforter, Comfort, comfort, my sweet mother."

And he thought how soon this might be his own case, and how he even in heaven would also pray even as he did now, "Comfort, comfort, my sweet mother."

His mother had gone away to hide her weeping, but the nurse, who, with all her unlovely notions, was a good woman, and loved Harry almost as much as his mother, sat by him watching, while the tears stole down her cheek. Presently, Harry turned round and caught her crying.

"Dear old nurse," he said, "don't cry for me. I know you think I shall leave you, but then, you know, I shall go to heaven, and see the Heavenly Father, and the dear Jesus."

"O," now sobbed the nurse, "I wish I could be sure of that. I wish I could be sure of it. O child, child, it almost breaks my heart to think you are going, going, and will never once be awakened to know your lost condition, or cry for mercy through the atoning blood of the Lamb. Your father and mother won't teach you the way of salvation, and won't let me teach you. And I must speak out. Their doctrines are soul-ruining delusions. O child, child, how I have prayed for you to be converted, prayed with tears and groans."

"But, darling nurse," said the boy, moved by her distress, "don't vex yourself so. Tell me what it is that grieves you. What do you want me to do?"

"O, I want you to flee from the wrath to come."

"But what is the wrath to come?"

"O dear, dear, to think you should not even know what the wrath is, much less know how to escape it!"

"Well, but what is the wrath to come?"

Nurse thought for a minute, and then said, flinging down her apron with which she had been drying her eyes, "Well, I will tell you; I shall clear my own conscience, even if master and mistress should turn me out of doors. The Gospel tells us that we are all born in sin—miserable sinners. We are all naturally rebels against God; and his wrath is on us, and dooms us to everlasting perdition unless we seek for pardon through the blood of Jesus."

"O nurse, I don't understand a bit of this. How can we be born in sin since God makes us? And then what is this everlasting perdition to which God's wrath dooms us?"

"O Harry, it is a lake of brimstone and fire, in a great dark vault, where sinners will be tormented in flames for ever and ever. O Harry, Harry, it is dreadful to think you should go there through the ——" She was going to say neglect of his parents, but she stopped, feeling that it was a hard thing to say to a child.

"Well, but nurse," said Harry, "look here. You love me, and you would not like me to suffer in flames for ever and ever if you could help it. And you know all my naughty ways almost as much as God does. Do you love me better than God does, nurse, or has God a harder heart than you have?"

"O don't talk in this way, child; God's ways are not as our ways. Ah, if you had but read what those holy men—Richard Baxter and John Bunyan—have said about the wrath to come, you would not treat it so lightly."

"Well, you old darling, to oblige you I will read what they say if you will fetch the books; for I know you have them in your room."

Nurse went away, as if to fetch the books. To do her justice, she deliberated very seriously with herself whether it was right to let the boy read the terrible passages to which her mind had referred. She knew the doctor had given strict charge that his mind was not to be tried or excited. But then she thought, again, that his immortal soul was at stake, and that was of more importance than his frail body. Perhaps when he had read these dreadful passages, showing the terrors of the law, a sense of his lost condition might be awakened, and he might be led to cry for mercy. So she brought the books, "Baxter's Saints' Everlasting Rest," and "Bunyan's World to Come," and pointed out the passages she had marked, and while he read them she took her knitting.

Harry first read in Baxter where he describes "the damned wallowing in the most awful torment, with an angry sin-avenging God above them, saints enjoying, in their sight, the glories which they have lost, and about them devils and damned souls." "Their ears," he says, "will be assailed with the shrieks and cries of their damned companions—children crying out against their parents that gave them encouragement and example—husbands crying out upon their wives, and wives upon their husbands—masters and servants cursing each other—ministers and people, magistrates and subjects charging their miseries upon each other."

Harry's blood almost froze as he went on reading these dreadful words.

"But nurse," he said, "Nobody believes these shocking things now, do they?"

"Well, my dear, if I were to tell you that they are preached almost every Sunday at our chapel, you would not think much of that; but I will tell you that, in the year 1850, I was on a visit to my sister's, at Banbury, and I went to hear the Lord Bishop of Oxford address the Sunday scholars of the school where her two little girls went, and he said a great deal worse than that. He described hell as such a dreadful place that my hair almost stood on end. He said that 'Hell contained but what was simply and utterly vile. It was a place where there was no law, no restraint, where all the vilest and most devilish passions could rage, and the most brutal and violent characters riot with unchecked license, and work their will on the gentler ones; whilst devils were mingled with the awful multitude, in torment themselves and the instruments of torturing others. They stand round them exulting in their agonies, and increasing the sting of their ceaseless anguish.' I read the words afterwards in a newspaper, and got them off by heart."

Harry shuddered, but turned to the book to see what more it would say.

FLOWERS FROM PERSIAN GARDENS.—V.

THEY asked Lokman from whom he learned good manners. He replied from the ill-mannered. "Whatever in their behaviour appeared to me disagreeable, that I refrained from doing myself. Not a word can be said, even in child's play, from which an intelligent person may not gather instruction; but if a hundred chapters of 'wisdom' were read in the hearing of a fool, to his ears it would sound as nothing but child's play."

To one who was complaining to his spiritual guide how difficult it was to bear the slanders of injurious tongues, he replied in tears: "How canst thou be sufficiently grateful for this blessing—that thou art better than they think thee? How many times wilt thou keep repeating, the envious and malevolent are perpetually calumniating me, wretch that I am? If they rise up to shed thy blood, or if they sit down to speak evil of thee, cease not thou to be good, and let them say on their evil. Better this than that thou shouldst be evil, and that they should repute thee good. Look at me, whom men regard as a model of perfection, whilst I know myself that I am imperfection itself. Had I really done what they report of me, I had indeed been a virtuous and pious man! The door closed in thine own face to exclude men from thy presence, that they may not behold and spread abroad thy faults—the closed door, of what use is it before the Omniscient? before Him, who knows alike what is open and what is concealed?"

Yesternight, towards morning, a warbling bird stole away my reason, my patience, my strength, and understanding. My exclamations, by chance, reached the ear of a most intimate friend. "Never," he said, "could I have believed that the voice of a bird should have such power to disturb thine intellect." "It is not," I replied, "befitting the condition of man that a bird should be reciting its hymn of praise, and that I should be silent."

There is no harm in paying visits to others, but go not so often that they say, it is enough!

If a man would learn to reprove himself, he would never hear reproof from any one else.

Whoever is possessed of a finer mind, be he orator, or lawyer, or instructor, or scholar, if once he descends to low, worldly greed, he will find himself entangled like a fly in honey.

AN EPISCOPAL RIDDLE.

Once a Week says that the following riddle was written by Archbishop Whately, who offered in vain £50 to any one who would guess it:—

"When from the Ark's capacious round
The world came forth in pairs,
Who was it that first heard the sound
Of boots upon the stairs?"

An ingenious correspondent of our contemporary now solves the enigma thus:—

"To him who cons the matter o'er
A little thought reveals
He heard it first, who went before
Two pairs of soles and 'eels."

But against this a correspondent of the Pall Mall writes:

"To him who cons the matter o'er
A little thought reveals
That in the Ark there never were
Two pairs of soles or 'eels."

WESTERN UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN UNION.

THE Spring meeting of this association was held on May 6th and 7th, at Oakfield-road Church, Clifton, when there was a numerous attendance of the ministers of the Unitarian Churches of the western counties and other friends.

The proceedings commenced on Wednesday morning with a conference, over which JEROM MURCH, Esq., of Bath, presided.

The Rev. WILLIAM JAMES stated that the committee last week resolved that it should be recommended to the meeting that petitions should be sent in favour of Mr. Gladstone's resolutions, and also in favour of Mr. Coleridge's Bill for opening the Universities. He suggested that a small committee should be appointed to prepare such petitions, and, under the peculiar circumstances in which the Queen had recently been placed, he thought that they should evince their loyalty by forwarding to her an address of sympathy with her in the sad trial she had been called upon to bear, and their congratulations on the safety, and, they hoped, health of her young son.

A committee was appointed to prepare these documents, which were afterwards brought before the conference for formal approval.

After a brief address from the CHAIRMAN,

The Rev. WILLIAM JAMES read a paper "On the Work to which the Union may direct its attention with the best Prospect of Success."

"Having given a sketch of the history of the society, and stated that membership of the association supposed a general approval of its aim and readiness to promote the great and essential truths of the Gospel as they were understood by those connected with it, he observed that their chief concern and duty now, as Unitarian Christians, was to send out, far and wide, just, rational, and honest conceptions of the Bible and of revelation. This was one of the first religious wants of the age, and it was one which the ministry of the Unitarian Church ought to be prepared to meet as no other class of Christian teachers could possibly meet it; and which a society like that should seek to supply for the masses of the people, who would be eager to accept it if it were only offered in a way that would approve itself to their minds and touch their hearts. Their work, as an association, was pre-eminently one of theological reform. They were concerned in common with other Christians for the conversion of the wicked, for the instruction of the ignorant, for the consolation of the sorrowful, for the relief of the destitute, and in their respective circles he trusted that they were found doing what they could for those objects; but in reference to that Union they were combining as Unitarian Christians for the propagation of better thoughts of God and His attributes, and of man and his destiny. That there were good and saintly souls in all Christian churches they thankfully and rejoicingly admitted, and that all who had been faithful, whatever might have been the form of doctrine in which they have rested, would be welcomed to heaven hereafter, they had never for a moment questioned; but the distinctions between the Trinitarian and Unitarian belief were so decided that they could not be ignored. Briefly glancing at these distinctions, he referred to places at home where missionaries might be employed with advantage. They had to render assistance to the smaller congregations in the district, but he thought their aim should chiefly be to establish self-supporting congregations in the large and more flourishing towns, and especially referred to Newport and Cardiff. In conclusion, he urged the claims of India on the Union, and said that if they were animated by the zeal with which Miss Carpenter was labouring on behalf of the women of India, the result of their meeting would be a determination to raise funds for the appointment of a missionary to the East by their own association."

CHARLES MOORE, Esq., of Bath, said that one of the great desiderata of the Unitarian body was that they should be faithful to their convictions—(hear, hear)—for those who mixed much with the world could not fail to see that their opinions were, to a great extent, leading the religious thought very much more than most people had any conception of. His own small experience had taught him that in many instances. Not long ago he spent a few days with a friend in the Midland counties, and he found that he was as thoroughly a Unitarian as himself. He presented him with two volumes of the "Unitarian Pulpit," and to his great surprise he found that he had preached nearly the whole of those sermons to his congregation. (A laugh.) Several other circumstances of a like kind had occurred to him, and no doubt to others, and they had to consider how they were to present their views more generally than they had hitherto been able to do, and especially so as to show how much there was in common between what was called orthodoxy and themselves. They had been giving them the negative side, why not now give them the positive side?

Mr. HAWKINS, of Trowbridge, spoke at some length on the decline of congregations in the county of Wilts, and suggested that some steps should be taken to assist them.

The Rev. H. AUSTIN (Cirencester) spoke encouragingly of the work in the Cotswold Hills, and suggested the establishment of a congregation in Stroud, where the liberal element was very strong, and near which town some Unitarian families lived, but were without a place of worship to attend.

The Rev. C. BEARD, of Liverpool, said he had been connected with such missionary work as it was now proposed to initiate in the West of England for the last twelve or fourteen years, and it was becoming a matter of very serious doubt with him, and with those with whom he was connected, whether it was wise to expend much labour in very small places. There was no outside public there on which to make impressions. If they wanted something to follow an expenditure of time and money and energy, it was best to go to places where there was a large and teeming population. One great question they ought to ask themselves was this—whether the appointment of a missionary under the direction of a general committee was the best method of going to work; and he ventured to say that the experience of the association in his own neighbourhood had pointed in the direction of the non-appointment of a missionary, for these reasons: if they appointed a general agent, and he itinerated from place to place, the result of that was that he did a little everywhere, and did nothing permanent or lasting anywhere. If, on the other hand, they planted a missionary in a certain place, they would find that the congregation depended upon him and not upon themselves. It was a very difficult problem indeed, but he believed the way out of it was to confine the work of the central association to making subscriptions of more or less amount to the funds of the congregation it desired to aid, and that would stir up those congregations to contribute, and so support a minister of their own.

The Rev. W. JAMES hoped Mr. Beard would not suppose they were spending all their means on small places; on the contrary, the larger amount of their income had been spent in helping Cheltenham and Devonport.

The Rev. R. L. CARPENTER, of Bridport, lamented the want of organisation in their body. He thought it a melancholy position to be in that the denomination should depend upon its ministers. As the best physician was wanted for the worst case, so the worst congregation should have the best minister, and he almost despaired when he saw so many congregations in the West of England that could barely support a minister. He thought they might frequently have churches if they would be content with churches in the house. He was in favour of house or cottage services where the number of worshippers was small, and a missionary might go round now and then to those places where there were little churches in the house, giving lectures to interest the public. His own experience as a secretary of missions very much coincided with that of Mr. Beard with regard to mission stations.

The Rev. W. J. ODGERS, of Bath, alluded to the great difficulty—money. If they could not sustain their own feeble congregations, how could they do anything towards a missionary for India? He agreed with Mr. Beard as to the practical difficulties in the way of missionary exertion.

The Rev. W. JAMES suggested that if each minister would take the question home to his heart, and press his people to do what was right in the matter, the income of the Union could be very easily increased.

The discussion then drifted away into the pecuniary question, various suggestions being made, Mr. WORSLEY, Mr. PRYER, Revs. T. TIMMINS, P. H. WICKSTEED, J. E. CARPENTER, J. JENNINGS, and A. BLATCHFORD taking part.

The CHAIRMAN, in summing up the discussion, remarked that there was very much for the ministers to do in organising the laity, and quoted the case of a few young men of Bath, who, twenty-five years ago, studied together and undertook the charge of two or three chapels in the district. Two at least of these young men afterwards became ministers.

R. P. EDWARDS, Esq., of Bath, then read a paper on "The Duty of the Christian Church in Relation to the Temperance Movement." He desired not so much to start any new argument in favour of total abstinence as to set his hearers thinking. In the course of his reading of a lengthy paper, which was full of forcible arguments in favour of abstinence, Mr. Edwards observed that there were at the present time between three thousand and four thousand abstaining ministers in England; and he earnestly hoped that the Unitarian body, always foremost in works of benevolence and philanthropy, and the conference in particular, would give its support and sympathy to the movement, and he urged it now the more earnestly because of the sad and terrible fact that drunkenness was greatly increasing among our female population, and he had never seen or heard of a case in which a woman who had once given way to excessive drinking had been reclaimed.

After short addresses by Mr. HAWKINS, the Rev. R. L. CARPENTER, the Rev. W. JAMES, and the CHAIRMAN, the subject dropped.

A large company then adjourned to the Clifton Down Hotel for dinner.

In the evening the Rev. C. BEARD, of Liverpool, preached at Oakfield-road Church to a numerous congregation an admirable sermon from John vii., 37, 38, on the life-giving power of Christ and Christianity.

THE THURSDAY MEETING.

On Thursday, the conference assembled at ten o'clock, and though not so fully attended as on the preceding day, a considerable number was present. Sir J. Bowring being unable to preside, C. J. THOMAS Esq., of Bristol, was called to the chair.

Rev. J. E. CARPENTER, in the absence of A. Sidney Aspland, Esq., read a paper which had been prepared by Mr. Aspland on "The Present State of the Church of England, and in what respect the position and duties of the Unitarian Christians are affected by it."

The first duty of every one who loved religious freedom and equality must be to put an end to a state of things in which ascendancy and special privileges were given to one religious sect, and by which the members of all other religious bodies in the country were compelled to appear in the character of Dissenters. That was a great evil, and ought not to exist. The paper enumerated some of the principal offences against religious liberty which at present constituted an insuperable bar between the Church of England and the other religious bodies of this country. In the first place, they complained of the existence of a creed as a test of religious membership, and they also asserted that the existence of a hierarchy was not to be tolerated. The sitting of Bishops in the House of Lords was a flagrant violation of religious equality. Then, again, the sale of livings, and patronage itself, must be abolished. The great grievance was, however, the continuance to the Established Church of the exclusive enjoyment of funds, of which the greater part ought to be applied for the equal benefit of the whole people. No doubt a considerable portion belonged to the present Church exclusively, but as to that part of the Church property which was justly national they must not be debarred from demanding their rights by any suggestion that they were demanding an endowment from the State. It was a mere question of property, an ascertainable part of which belonged to them, and of which they ought to be put in possession. Assuming that all this might be done, and that it was possible to fuse the nation into one church, he ventured to think, however, that it would not be desirable, and that they could most effectually promote religious liberty, and render Divine worship most acceptable to the various religious bodies, by promoting, and even favouring, the formation of as many churches (all unconnected with the State) as there might be divisions of opinion. He had no doubt that millions of persons would refuse to enrol themselves as members of a national Church. He argued in favour of the voluntary principle. It was difficult to see how the absence of a national Church could remove the means of worship. The present Church existed in every parish, and the same bodies would exist throughout the land after the removal of the national character of the Church, and the same funds would in some form be applicable to the benefit of the people, and he hoped that, in the event of disestablishment, the Church would not be less zealous than any other section of the Christian community. He commented upon the differences that existed in the Church of England, and said it was his earnest hope that the Unitarian body would under no circumstances consent to be absorbed into a national Church, but would struggle for the constitution of many churches unfettered by connection with each other and with the State.

Mr. JEROM MURCH, in proposing a cordial vote of thanks for Mr. Aspland's paper, expressed a hope that the committee would consider whether some good use might not be made of it, containing as it did such admirable reasoning, and such a full and clear enunciation of their principles.

A very animated discussion then took place, of which, however, we can only find space for the speech of

The Rev. CHAS. BEARD, who said that in the first place it seemed to him to be hardly fair to enumerate all the defects of the present Establishment, and then, by implication, charge those defects on any future church that might be established. Nobody could deny that the Creeds and Articles were unfavourable to free thought; nobody denied that it was an unchristian thing that the Bishops should be chosen by the Prime Minister; no one denied that church-rates were a very great injustice. All this he was perfectly willing to admit: the Church of England was as far as possible from what he desired the future church should be. But there was one very serious consideration wholly omitted in the paper, and which appeared to him to be also wholly omitted in all the reasonings he saw on that point—viz., "Is there any form of church organisation which is distinctly involved in the very idea of Christianity itself?" It seemed to be taken for granted that they might organise, or rather disorganise, Christianity just as they pleased, and that the result would be all right. He could not conceive anything less like a Christian church than the ideal which Mr. Sidney Aspland had sketched at the end of his paper; that was not only to be content with as many sects as possible, but even to encourage their formation. He stated that there had never been a move more fatal to religious liberty in Scotland than the foundation of a Free Church there, and he expressed his belief that there never was so much apparent orthodoxy, whilst there was so much concealed hypocritical heterodoxy as at present in Scotland. Having adverted to the value of theological training, and expressed his belief that the intellectual standard of their ministers was declining, he remarked that he was as anxious as others for religious equality, only that he was for levelling up instead of levelling down. There were, he thought, two bases upon which a church could be constructed, the individualist theory, and the multitudinist theory. The individualist theory was that of the Independent, the Baptist, the Methodist, and all other Dissenters except themselves; and the multitudinist theory was the theory of the Unitarians and the Church of England; and what was the difference? The individualist theory was this, that no man could be accounted a member of a Christian church unless he absolutely by his own free-will, either by subscription to some test, or by undergoing some rite, declared himself to be such, and by the individualists the nation was sharply divided between Christians and non-Christians. That was not the feeling which prevailed within those walls; they looked upon every man who chose to join them as a Christian man, and they left it to himself to determine whether he was so or not. His theory was this—that every man of this Christian nation was by virtue of his birth a child of Christ, and that whether he chose to enter the church or not he belonged to the church from the very fact of his birth, and when he entered into communion with him he had no right to ask him if he belonged to his specific community, whether he had undergone the rite of baptism, or whether he had been formally admitted to any religious community; but that, if an Englishman, he belonged to the great English church of which he was a member, and needed no further question or recognition at his hands. The church which he hoped to see in the future would be a church entirely free, bound by neither Creeds nor Articles.

The Rev. R. L. CARPENTER replied to Mr. Beard, pointing out that however broad the Establishment might be made, there would always be some who could not join it. Let there be perfect equality; let every man strive to promote religion; let them all seek for unity where they could unite, and they would find that there would be a true Catholic church in all its great principles.

The discussion was continued by the Rev. W. J. ODGERS, Mr. PRYER (Bristol), Rev. P. H. WICKSTEED, Rev. H. MCKEAN, Rev. DAVID GRIFFITH, and Rev. W. JAMES.

The conference resumed its deliberations in the afternoon, under the presidency of Mr. HERBERT THOMAS, when a paper was read on "The best basis for the Religious Instruction of Children," written by the Rev. Edward Higginson, of Swansea, who, however, was prevented attending by indisposition.

The CHAIRMAN, in his opening remarks, adverted to the importance of the subject under notice, and expressed his regret that a larger number of persons had not assembled to take part in the discussion. In the course of his observations he drew particular attention to home influence in the matter of infant education. He thought there was nothing that could take the place so efficiently with regard to the education of the young as the influence of the mother.

The paper was then read by the Rev. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER.

It began by remarking that the basis of all instruction and education must of course be the faculties of the child, and the basis of religious education must be his religious faculties, which were his ordinary faculties applied to religion. He referred to the advantages in religious instruction which were to be derived from a true Christian home, showing how the parent would awaken the religious life and give to the child the first and, at the same time, the most effective idea of God and of Christ. The great question was, when the more systematic religious instruction should be given, and what part of the study the Bible should occupy in it. He was in favour of secular education in their schools, leaving religious instruction to the parents of children in younger life, and subsequently to their ministers.

After the passing of the usual vote of thanks for the paper, an interesting conversation upon the subject of it took place, in which Revs. T. TIMMINS, J. E. CARPENTER, W. JAMES, H. MCKEAN, and Messrs. PRYER and W. BUTCHER took part, the most interesting feature of the afternoon's discussion being, however, brief addresses from Miss MARY CARPENTER and Mrs. HERBERT THOMAS.

In the evening the Lord's Supper was administered at Oakfield-road Church. The Scriptures were read and prayer offered by the Rev. J. E. CARPENTER, and an address was delivered by the Rev. S. MARTIN, of Trowbridge. The bread and wine were handed to the communicants by the Rev. J. E. Carpenter and the Rev. A. N. Blatchford. The service was felt to be a very solemn and impressive close of the interesting two days' meetings.

OPENING OF THE NEW CHAPEL AT HASTINGS.

THE "Unitarian Christian Church"—the designation of the new building just erected in South Terrace, Hastings—was formally opened for worship on Wednesday afternoon, May 6. The new church is in the Roman-Doric style, the front presenting a striking appearance, with its columns, corona, and pediments, when viewed from the Central Recreation Ground. The interior walls are formed into recessed arcades; those at each end being occupied with circular-headed windows. A small neat platform takes the place of the old-fashioned pulpit. The central recess, behind the platform, is adorned with composite pillars and pediment, moulded architrave, &c., which make a good finish to the north end. The seats are of varnished pine, both in the basement and in the neat gallery which occupies the south end of the structure. The ceiling is panelled with central ornaments (for ventilation) in each panel. The effect of the whole is good. There was a full attendance, the congregation numbering several persons of influence and many strangers.

The service was commenced by the minister of the church, the Rev. WILLIAM BIRKS, and the Rev. R. B. ASPLAND, of Hackney, was the preacher.

A collection was made in aid of the building fund, there being a sum of £250 unprovided for at the commencement of the opening services.

In the evening a public meeting was held in the Castle Assembly Rooms. About one hundred and fifty sat down to tea, and the number was largely increased by incomers afterwards.

Sir JOHN BOWLING presided, and opened the proceedings with a congratulatory speech.

Mr. S. C. BURGESS, in reading a statement of the position of the building fund, expressed his gratification that their enterprise had been so far brought to a successful issue. The total expense of erecting the new church, so far as was known, was about £1,100, including the purchase of the site; and the subscriptions amounted, in round figures to £850. Toward the balance of £250 he was happy to inform the meeting that the collection after the service had realised £51. 4s. He warmly thanked the visitors who had so heartily shown their sympathy with the work; and he expressed the feeling of appreciation which the Building Committee had towards Mr. Beck, the architect, and Mr. Jones, the builder, of the handsome structure which they had provided.

Addresses of encouragement, and in exposition of Unitarian views, followed from several gentlemen. The Rev. R. B. ASPLAND, the preacher of the afternoon, in some remarks on the position of religious bodies in England, alluded to the Irish Church, and expressed his opinion that there would be a series of political and religious conflicts during the next two or three years; for the parsons were not men who would readily give in, but they would die hard. Whenever the day of reckoning came, he thought the Unitarians would generally be found true to their principles. (Applause.)

S. SHARPE, Esq., as a frequent visitor to this town, expressed his gratitude to the gentlemen who had been the means of raising the building in which they had assembled that afternoon. He stated that the success of the effort made in Hastings arose from the fact that the originators had begun in a humble manner; and pointed out that, in different parts of London, a work was going on in the same way, in order to spread Unitarianism. He hoped the example of Hastings would serve as a stimulant to Unitarians in other towns.

Addresses were also given by Rev. W. BIRKS, ALFRED LAWRENCE, Esq., Revs. R. E. B. MACLELLAN, R. SPEARS, Mr. BURGESS, senr. (of Battle), Mr. DAWSON, Revs. J. W. BRATHWAITE (Horsham), R. C. JONES, B.A. (Bexhill, near Hastings), A. LUNN (Chatham), E. TALBOT (Tenterden), and others.

MANCHESTER DOMESTIC MISSIONS.

On Monday evening, the thirty-fourth annual meeting was held at the Memorial Hall, Albert-square. There was a large attendance; and among those present were the Rev. Wm. Gaskell, M.A.; James Drummond, B.A.; W. H. Herford, B.A.; S. A. Steintal, secretary; S. Robinson and J. Harrop, the two missionaries; Messrs. R. D. Darbishire, treasurer; R. Nicholson, John Armstrong, Richard Aspdon, E. C. Harding, T. Francis, W. H. Talbot, Alderman A. Heywood, T. Brittain, E. Winsor, and H. J. Leppoc.

The reports of the missionaries having been printed, were taken as read.

The Rev. WILLIAM GASKELL, having been called to the chair, observed that he should have been glad if some wealthy layman had been prevailed upon to take it, because the missions stood greatly in need of the pecuniary example which such a one would have been able to give. He was always glad, however, to do anything in his power to promote their interests, for he felt that if there was one institution more thoroughly Christian than another—more completely in harmony with the spirit of him who went about doing good, alike to the bodies and souls of men—it was this ministry to the poor. Many in their happy homes had hardly an idea of the kind of things which were daily and nightly taking place in the wretched back streets and dismal alleys around them; if they had, they could not have the heart to remain unmoved by them, but would feel themselves compelled to do much more than they did to introduce a better state of things. Referring to the cases of physical distress which were given in the reports of the missionaries, he showed that the benevolence exerted through them, unlike so much that goes under the name of charity, was well directed, and almost sure of reaching its end. But their ministry, he said, had a higher object even than that of aiding the struggling and deserving poor; and tried to bring home the truth, that if the suffering need pity and help, still more so do the sinning. After illustrating this by a sad case from Mr. Harrop's report, and depicting the scenes of wretchedness and vice with which he and Mr. Robinson had to do, Mr. Gaskell said that the Missions were never in so active and vigorous a state as at present; and he concluded by moving

"That the perusal of the reports of the Revs. J. Harrop and S. Robinson, having deeply impressed the subscribers and friends of the ministry to the poor with a sense of the self-devotion with which, under manifold discouragements, they have fulfilled their arduous duties, this meeting would express its warm sympathy with those gentlemen in their work, and its hope that they may be strengthened to pursue the same in future years with undiminished zeal and with still growing success."

The Rev. J. DRUMMOND seconded the motion, and said he wished he could excite in their breasts the same heartfelt sympathy as had stirred his own on reading the reports of the missionaries. They represented a state of things that may be found in all large towns, and for his own part he thought it a great advantage that they should have presented to them reports which raised up questions of the greatest national importance. The facts laid before them presented what he thought to be a great national disgrace. That there should be a million of paupers; that crime should cost three millions; that there should be an amount of destitution which does not come under the name of pauperism, and that there should be a large amount of private crime in the form of cruel treatment of children and wives, and in so many homes almost every species of sin, is a national disgrace. And it is well that we should have these evils brought before us, that our sympathy may be excited, and that we may ponder the means for their diminution. He thought that what they ought especially to address themselves to as Christians was, how to deal with ignorance and sin, for were they to place the sinning in physical comfort, and leave them in their ignorance and sin, they would but perpetuate the sin. What they should strive to do is to fill the soul with noble resolves, and turn the intellect to such habits of thought as will lead to prevention in the future, and cause the younger ones to be turned to good and wise habits. Unless they could do that, they had, he thought, done nothing. Mr. Drummond concluded a very urgent address to do something in this way, by seconding the resolution.

Alderman HEYWOOD said he was not unwilling to throw his mite in the scale by thanking those gentlemen who have undertaken the duty of visiting the poor, and, after making a passing allusion to the likelihood of a general system of education being adopted, said that a kindred subject to this is the establishment in all large towns of health committees—(hear, hear)—to protect the health of the poor, and to raise them by securing for them homes healthy and comfortable. It is not the most agreeable thing in the world to visit nothing but scenes of destitution and misery, and he trusted the time would come—and not very long hence—when such a home as Mr. Harrop had pictured in his report will no longer be allowed to exist. (Hear, hear.) The Health Committee recently established in Manchester would cause such habitations for the poor to disappear—(hear, hear)—and not only these, but others in some degree better, but yet far from satisfactory, will also disappear within a reasonable amount of time, from the face of the city. This, he thought, was a move in the right direction, and when taken in connection with the prospects of education, he thought there were hopes of improvement. He might suggest that the ministers might be of essential service to the health officer recently appointed if, when they find dwellings in their districts which they think unfit for habitations, they would report them to that officer. (Hear, hear.)

The Rev. J. HARROP thanked the meeting for its cordial vote of sympathy, and said it must not be supposed that all their work was of the dismal kind described. On the contrary, they saw a good deal that was noble, and that would make a very bright report too. As they had passed a vote of sympathy with them, he would venture to suggest one or two ways in which they could show it. He would not ask for teachers, as they were well supplied, but when they got into their new building, he hoped that they would come and help them when they had collections. He also pointed out that very effectual help might be rendered in visiting.

The Rev. S. ROBINSON also acknowledged the resolution. He had felt much encouraged with what had been said, and by the hearty way in which the meeting had shown its sympathy. Sympathy was what they needed more than anything else. He had often asked himself in the sense of the isolation of his work, what real good am I doing? In four years only two ladies had been to him to show any interest in his work. If any would help in the way of visiting, he should be glad to find them a district in which to labour, though he was afraid if they went through it once, they would not do it again, except the district was of the better class. What he wanted most was a good teacher for a class of young men.

The Rev. S. A. STEINTAL then read the report of the committee, which stated "That the new building for the Tomlinson-street Mission is nearly ready, but funds are still wanted. £1,700 had been subscribed, but the contracts in progress would require £2,300, and the furnishing of the rooms, &c., will require £300 or £400 more. The damage done in January last to the Rochdale-road Mission by a storm, and the erection of some class-rooms, had caused an outlay of about £100. The Mission had promised £10, and by an advertisement in the Herald £46. 13s. had been obtained. On the whole, the committee believed that no society can claim to have worked with higher or more Christian aims, and to no nobler object can the subscribers dedicate their means."

Mr. R. D. DARBISHIRE read the financial statement. The income of the society (including balance in hand at the beginning of the year of £57.6s.5d.) had been £681.17s.2d.; the expenditure had been £639.1s.2d.; the present balance in hand is £42.16s. He urged that parents should interest their children by contributions to a society like this.

Mr. R. NICHOLSON moved that the report of the committee and the treasurer's account be printed. To him it was a satisfaction that they could afford some help to relieve distress; but he was pained to think how little they were now doing in contrast with the enthusiastic expectations with which they began the society to do the work marked out for them by Dr. Tuckerman.

Mr. H. J. LEFFOC seconded the motion, and urged that the Corporation should shut up as dwellings the miserable tenements alluded to by their ministers, for so long as they were open the eagerness of the poor to get cheap residences would cause them to be filled again until they were finally closed. He urged, also, that they should each take one or two families under their care, and so try to improve their condition.

The Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL supported the motion, and made an urgent appeal to the wealthy for subscriptions.

On the motion of Mr. THOS. BRITAIN, seconded by Mr. C. J. HERFORD, officers for the ensuing year were appointed, Mr. Herford suggesting that it would be wise to employ a trained nurse in the districts for the care of the sick poor.

INTELLIGENCE.

MINISTERIAL APPOINTMENT.—The Rev. T. R. Dobson, of Elland, Yorkshire, has accepted the unanimous invitation of the congregation at Sidmouth to become their minister.

QUEENSBURY, NEAR HALIFAX.—A course of theological lectures, organised from the central office of the Band of Faith, has lately been given in this populous place, by the Rev. Goodwyn Barmby, of Wakefield, the Rev. W. A. Clarke, of Pudsey, and the Rev. Joseph Smith, of Idle. The chief object of the mission was to increase the Unitarian congregation in the small hamlet of Pepperhill, about a mile distant from Queensbury. It is hoped this object will be gained.

ST. ANDREWS.—For some time past attempts have been made to introduce Unitarian opinions into this city. A Bethune, Esq., of Blebo, has exerted himself very earnestly to promote the cause of liberal Christianity by giving public readings from Unitarian authors in the hall of the Royal Hotel, and has occasionally secured the services of Rev. H. Williamson, of Dundee, who has given doctrinal lectures. At such a lecture, last Thursday evening, there were about sixty persons present. Questions were invited, and an earnest discussion took place, not only of the lecture, but of the whole Unitarian theology. A committee of six was formed to arrange for further lectures. If a Unitarian cause could be maintained in St. Andrews it could not but have considerable effect upon the country at large, through the large numbers of students who attend the University.

CORRESPONDENCE.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

W. C. S.—We are hard pressed for space this week, and so are compelled to omit your letter. We hardly think it necessary, however. Enough has been said on the personal question.

THE LIBERATION SOCIETY.

To the Editors.—If you can afford me the space I shall be glad to offer a few additional remarks on this subject, and more particularly to notice two or three of the points raised in your article of last week.

I have no wish to depreciate the just claims of the Liberation Society. It has done, and it is doing, a useful work, in exposing the abuses of the present Establishment, and in preparing the mind of the nation for the great change which is evidently coming at last. I would willingly help it to do this if it limited itself to that part of its programme. In its further aims I distrust its power to do good, and I would rather not follow its lead, for reasons which, so far as I have assigned them, I must take the liberty to think you have not conclusively answered.

You object, for example, that in referring to Mr. G. Hadfield and Mr. James I have only cited "the very narrowest minds which Independency has to show." I reply that I have, in them, simply cited two out of thousands who are animated by the same spirit, if I am to believe the deliberate statements of leading organs of the body—two persons who, in the point I referred to, merely carry out practically, principles theoretically held by all. I beg to refer you to an article in the British Quarterly, April, 1864, p. 357, where you will find an elaborate defence of doctrinal trusts, and a degree of assumption in regard to the possession of an orthodox faith by Independents which will probably surprise you, and which is not unworthy to be compared with Papal infallibility itself. And more than this, the writer declares that he has "reason to think there is not more than one in fifty among Independent ministers who does not substantially concur" in the practice of his denomination in "inserting doctrinal articles in the trust deeds" of their property; and that he has "rarely known an intelligent layman who has had any doubt either as to the policy or duty of the practice." The Patriot newspaper, of Jan. 12, 1865, has a long article, equally clear and determined, in defence of limiting chapels and chapel property for ever to those who believe just as the founders have believed; and it goes so far as to say, in so many words, that if a future congregation shall see reason to deviate seriously from former doctrines, it must and ought to "turn out" and build itself a new chapel.

I could give various other evidences of the existence of the same dark spirit; and I say again that men who manifest such a spirit—men who favour its manifestation by their presence, their concurrence, their pecuniary support, are not worthy leaders in the cause of religious liberty; and I cannot understand how any true friend of religious liberty can follow such leaders. I would rather ten times over have the "patronage and control" of the State, limited and defined by laws of the national Legislature, than I would have the patronage and control of such persons. I would rather have the Privy Council to appeal to than some small committee of shopkeepers, or of lawyers, like Mr. T. S. James—sitting in judgment, perhaps upon the question whether or not I have infringed the doctrinal schedule of a chapel deed, or whether or not I am found worthy to sit down at the Lord's table in their company. The persons who so control and patronise religion in a chapel committee, or a "church" meeting, and then step forth upon the public platform of the Freemason's Tavern to talk in high phrase about religious liberty, such persons appear to me to be like men who would shake hands with religious liberty before the world, while they take every opportunity in private of giving it a slap in the face.

You take exception to my preference of Mr. Bright as a leader; but did not he, as well as Earl Russell, suggest the appropriation of Irish Church property among the Irish denominations? I must add, I do not think that either of those statesmen ought so lightly to have abandoned so righteous a proposal, if they have abandoned it.

It may be, as you observe, that Mr. James's book is condemned by many Independents. I hope it is so; but nevertheless those who condemn it remind me very forcibly of the Broad-churchmen, in persistently occupying a position of inconsistency and contradiction. The true spirit of Independency is, as I have shown, perfectly in harmony with Mr. James's book.

You think, with the Liberationists, that State support of religion implies State control. I cannot see that it necessarily implies anything more than a certain regulation of revenues, without any interference with doctrine, or liberty of thought and speech. And I must insist that it is a perfectly sound and right principle that a people, a nation, shall, by its legal representatives, care for its own religious instruction and wellbeing; that it shall manifest its care on a large and noble scale, and not leave so great an interest wholly in the hands of little sectarian cliques, and congregational unions, and chapel committees, who, in the plenitude of their wisdom, may choose to set up the narrowest tests of orthodoxy, restricting even the Lord's Supper to those who have received from them a ticket of admission, to those whom they may deem to have been "converted," or to those who have undergone the outward rite of adult baptism.

You urge, objectingly, that I look forward to "some future development of the Anglican Establishment broad enough to admit everybody." I do so: I look forward to the transformation of the Establishment into a national church, standing on a basis as broad as that on which Christ has left us his Gospel; a church out of which no persons whatever "who profess and call themselves Christians" shall be excluded by any creed or test of human devising; and within which a far truer liberty shall exist than is now allowed by the prevailing spirit of Independent or Baptist institutions.

As to the majority of sixty, this, you think, renders the comprehensive theory more than ever out of the question. I venture to hope and believe just the contrary. That majority has simply pronounced for the cessation of the existing injustice. It has not finally disposed of the revenues of the Irish Church, and Mr. Gladstone has been very guarded in his expressions on this latter point. The peculiar character of the Irish case makes it, indeed, difficult for many of us to contemplate the simple distribution of those revenues among the Irish denominations. But yet I believe this difficulty would disappear if we could only let the high rule of simple justice prevail, and would but make up our minds to do to others as we would they should do to us. All I ask on this point is that this Christian principle should be applied fearlessly even to Roman Catholics, despite the eloquent bigotry of a Spurgeon and others like him, for it cannot be too widely known that Mr. Spurgeon has declared in a public letter that he would rather perpetuate the iniquity of the present Irish Establishment, than give to Roman Catholics their fair share of the national church property, which property, nevertheless, has in part come down from their own Roman Catholic ancestors.

And such men as these are among the shining lights of the Liberation Society! That society, then, I hope will have very greatly to change both its leaders and its principles before it carries with it any considerable proportion of the Unitarians of England; much more before it becomes the guiding power of the nation in future ecclesiastical arrangements.—I remain, &c., G. VANCE SMITH.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

AN APPEAL FOR INDIA.

At the last Annual Meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, in June, 1867, the following Resolution was agreed to:

"That it be an instruction to the Committee to consider how they can best meet the present religious wants of India; and that if they see their way to advance the knowledge of pure Christianity by the establishment of Missions or by a large distribution of books, this meeting pledges itself to assist them in raising any additional funds which may for any or all of these purposes be required."

It must be obvious to all our friends that such an effort, as this indicates, would entail an expenditure which the present funds could not bear, and yet the Committee are anxious to meet the wishes of the members of the Association. We may say that during the past year we have had most assuring statements made to us of the prospects of success for Unitarian Christianity among the two hundred millions of India, if we enter heartily into this cause; and also that Christianity is the only hope for higher civilisation in India, and that our form of faith is the only one that can possibly succeed among that people. The English Unitarians have at present only one distinctively Unitarian Chapel and minister of religion in that great country, at Madras alone. During the past few months we have had considerable correspondence with the Rev. W. Roberts (a native, of Madras); and Miss Carpenter has informed us that Mr. Roberts is doing a good work, and would be able to do our cause more useful service if he could be freed from his secular labours by a stipend from us. Our Appeal for India, therefore, is intended to aid Mr. Roberts, and to promote a more general diffusion of Unitarian Christianity by an efficient Missionary or Missionaries in that country. We need not remind our people that as India is under the British rule, and that as we are the recipients of some of the temporal advantages of this connection, we owe the people of India some effort and sacrifice to convey to them the Gospel of Jesus Christ.—Yours, very faithfully,

R. B. ASPLAND, } Hon. Secs.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

In the Austrian Upper Chamber, where the Religious Equality Bill has been read a third time, M. Rokitsanski delivered a remarkable speech, in which he said:

"I object to any privilege being given to a particular church, to any State religion, and I hope to be able to show that a State religion is not only superfluous but an evil. Religious liberty is of old date. Tertullian inscribed the equality of all creeds on his flag, and the bill now under discussion is in perfect harmony with his doctrine. The State as the realisation of the idea of justice can be of no creed, and yet it is in relation with many. Even if it had only to deal with one religion it should not adopt its distinctive creed. Otherwise it would subject itself to the Church which is always endeavouring to dominate, and which says it is persecuted when it is not allowed to dominate. If the State is to favour one creed more than others, it should examine dogmas and decide which are the best. Now the State can have no such function, and it has no such right. The Christian religion itself prohibits intolerance. Are not the love of one's neighbour, equality in the sight of God, and the other principles of that religion the very principles of a State founded on justice? St. Augustine said, 'There is no charity where there is not justice.' Christian ethics disavow intolerance. A State Church is not necessary, because domination does not become a church, because a preference given to one church is an insult to others, because the privileged church darkens the minds of its adherents, and fills the heart with pride, and this has been shown in the course of these debates."

On the festival of the finding of the true cross, the Pope performed the ceremony of blessing the Agnus Dei in the monastery adjoining the Basilica of Santa Croce in Gerusalemme, so called from the portion of the cross deposited there, and from the earth brought from Jerusalem to mix with the foundations. The Agnus Dei are medallions of white wax, collected from the Easter candles of the Sixtine Chapel and other churches, and moulded by the monks into an oval form, bearing on one side the Paschal Lamb with the usual legend, and the name of the Pope who consecrates them, and on the other the Virgin, with one or more saints. According to high Roman authority, these medallions, or even a fragment of them, possess, among various other virtues, the following: They preserve from sudden death, protect in battle and give victory, deliver from poison, combat epilepsy, appease winds, save from shipwreck, stop conflagrations, shorten the pains of childbirth, put to flight demons, prevent terrors by evil spirits, and save from eternal ruin. The last time his Holiness consecrated these medallions was in 1865. Surely, if he believes them to be only half as efficacious as represented, his charity should keep him constantly at work blessing them.

Count Mamiani, a distinguished poet and philosopher, as well as politician, has been delivering lectures at Florence to large audiences on the causes of Italian weakness. He ascribed it in part, at least, to the small influence of religion on Italian life and character, and said out plainly that that influence could never be exerted through an organisation relying so much on symbolism and sensuous agencies as the Romish Church does.

The inauguration of the monument of Luther at Worms, which we described some months ago, is to take place on June 25th, and the fête is to last three days.

Dr. Watson, of Dundee, who accompanied Dr. Norman Macleod to India and is not yet returned, has been appointed one of her Majesty's chaplains for Scotland, in room of the late Dr. Robert Lee. The office is pretty much of a sinecure, but the income nevertheless is pretty comfortable.

The Irish Bishops presented their address, which was rather a lengthy document, to the Queen yesterday week. Of course, "they believe that there is no more precious arrangement" than that of inviolable clerical endowments; "in the severing of the ties which bind the Church to the State, and the State to it," they see threatened "the disappearance of the Royal Supremacy," the overthrow of "an important safeguard of the Reformed Faith, and of many precious rights," and the transference of the influence which is now theirs "to another Church which can never be truly national," and, though last not least, they say "the assault on our Establishment is avowedly, on the part of its most strenuous conductors, only the opening of a general attack on the Establishments in England and Scotland, and if successful against us, it will prove almost irresistible in the other cases." We can only hope that the Irish Bishops, as regards this last point, are among the prophets. Her Majesty's reply was that she had no doubt that Parliament, "when fully informed through the labours" of the Royal Commission, would "adopt such measures as would be at once just and conducive to the maintenance of true religion" among her subjects.

A fanatical preacher is itinerating through Worcestershire and Herefordshire, to get up "a revival," who assumes the title of the "Weeping Prophet." At Worcester he was desirous of displaying his gifts in the theatre, but the use of it was refused.

From the report read at the annual meeting of the Home Missionary Society (Congregational), it appeared that during the past year its agents had preached in 876 places, containing a population of nearly 800,000 souls, spread over 39 counties in England and Wales. In the mission chapels and rooms there were 42,000 adult hearers, 17,663 children taught on the Sunday by 1,969 teachers, and 1,589 young persons in Bible classes, besides nearly 2,000 persons who were instructed in 34 week-day schools. The organisation consisted of 55 grouped stations, each station having from three to eight villages, forming one group; 60 pastors, with one or two villages to each, and 70 evangelists who do the same kind of work in the counties which efficient city missionaries do in towns. Last year these evangelists visited 26,000 families, held 6,000 cottage and other meetings, distributed 362,000 tracts, and with the other agents sold 1,722 copies of the Scriptures, more than 110,000 religious periodicals, and were the means of bringing 1,105 members into the fellowship of churches. The income for the year was £7,027, and the expenditure £6,421.

A correspondent of the Methodist Times thinks it may be interesting to some of its readers to know that Mr. Joseph Barker is acknowledged as a member of the Primitive Methodist body, and that his name appears as a local preacher on the Plan of the Portsmouth station. The correspondent "trusts the Primitives will try to make his (Mr. B.'s) last days prosperous and happy," and adds that he "makes this public announcement with Mr. Barker's knowledge and consent."

We don't know how Colonial sees manage without their Bishops, but at present there are five vacant, viz., Bombay, Mauritius, Grafton and Armidale, Labuan, and Barbadoes; and there are several prelates floating about besides the Capetown Metropolitan.

Punch has the following song of Mr. Whalley:

"You won't rouse, Ben,
Out of his den,
The British Lion. Blow it!
How could you cry
'No Popery!'
Proposing to endow it?"

On Episcopal lights the same contemporary says:

"The report of the commissioners on Ritualism contains the suggestion that any difficulties should be referred to the decision of the Bishop in Camera. Surely, this sounds uncommonly like a Camera Obscura."

Dr. Barry, a son of the late Sir Charles Barry, the architect of the Houses of Parliament, has been elected Principal of King's College, London, in place of Dr. Jelf, who a short time since resigned.

Thomas Cooper, author of "The Purgatory of Suicides," died at Lincoln last week. Originally a shoemaker, and then a schoolmaster, he became a local preacher among the Methodists. For a while he was connected with the Stamford Mercury, and with a Leicester paper, and then took to lecturing on Chartism. In 1842, a violent oration, delivered to colliers on strike, led to his committal to prison for two years, during which he wrote the poem we have mentioned, which in parts displays considerable power. On his release, he became for a time a Deistical lecturer; but recanting, he joined the General Baptists, and for the last fourteen years of his life was earnest and zealous in the recommendation of Christianity.

In the debate on Mr. Gladstone's resolutions, last week, the most telling speech, a maiden one, was that of Mr. Winterbotham, the member for Stroud, who boldly spoke of the author of Paradise Lost as the "Unitarian John Milton."

It appears that the extract from Mr. Whiteside's speech which Colonel Knox the other night flung at Mr. Gladstone under the idea that it was his, has been doing duty down at Carlisle. At a meeting of defenders of the Irish Church held there, a letter was read from Archdeacon Boutflower which concluded thus:

"And surely we ought not to despair when we call to mind the words, too memorable to be forgotten, with which the very leader of the assault himself cheered on in bygone days our fathers and ourselves in a similar conflict—'The Church in Ireland can never be destroyed but by a recreant Senate and an apostate nation.'"

Archdeacons' memories, it appears, are not altogether to be trusted, even as regards "words too memorable to be forgotten," by which they have been "cheered on in bygone days."

There is, as might be expected, considerable "activity" at present in Ritualistic literature. In his "Vestiarium Christianum," the Rev. W. B. Marriott traces the origin and gradual development of ecclesiastical dress from apostolic times down to the present; in "Lives of the Saints" we have the letter-press enclosed in appropriate borders, and fifty illuminations mostly coloured by hand; even more beautifully got up is "Saint Ursula, and the Story of the Eleven Thousand Virgins," adorned with illuminated miniatures; and "Sacred Archaeology" is a dictionary, prepared by the Rev. M. E. C. Walcott, of vestments, furniture, ritual symbolism, ceremonial traditions, and other characteristics of "The Church Catholic in all Ages." Bishop Forbes, too, of Brechin, has published what may best be described as a full-blown development of the famous "Tract Ninety," giving like it a Catholic interpretation of the Thirty-nine Articles. Composed apparently under Dr. Pusey's supervision, and with his help, it may be regarded as the latest manifesto of his party.

A "Life of Moses" has just been published at Leipsic, by Dr. Hermann Reckendorf, which is designed to pourtray the life of the Hebrew law-giver in the light of modern historical criticism. He claims for his hero no supernatural character, and is content that all the miracles recorded of him should be explained away, thinking that to have accomplished the sublime work of religious and political organisation which he did, and to have wrought out principles of ethics and of law which have entered into the codes of all subsequent nations, and been recognised by most nations as divine is sufficiently miraculous. It is a maxim, he says, of the Talmud, nearly 2,000 years old, that "he who interprets the Scripture literally is a liar and blasphemer;" and he claims the right and duty of unlimited freedom of inquiry, telling the Jew that in entering on a work like this, he must leave Bibliolatry behind him. Yet, somewhat inconsistently, he asserts that Moaism claims to be not only a revelation, but the only revelation, denying all genuineness to other pretensions of a like kind.

On Tuesday, Mr. Gladstone asked Her Majesty's Government what course they intended to take on the second reading of the Irish Church Bill, which stands for to-night, and Mr. Disraeli replied: "As we regard that bill as the first step towards the disestablishment of the Church, we intend to give it the greatest opposition we can."

At the annual meeting of the United Presbyterian Synod, just held in Edinburgh, a long discussion took place on the subject of union with the Free and Reformed Presbyterian Churches, and a motion was adopted, to the effect that, the progress which had been made in the negotiations for this end being encouraging, the committee to whom the subject had been entrusted should be re-appointed.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS

The remarks which the Pall Mall made on Archdeacon Sinclair's charge have brought our contemporary several communications about the state of infidel literature in England. It says:

"One gentleman sends us some statements extracted from a paper called the National Reformer, which we have never seen, but which, from his account of the matter, must be very like the old Reasoner. He says, amongst other things, that it asserts the existence of secularist 'societies, institutes, or missions' in London and in the principal manufacturing towns, that nine or ten meetings, lectures, &c., were advertised to take place in London in the first week of July last, and that there are agencies for the sale of the National Reformer in fifty-seven towns in the United Kingdom, Liverpool, Manchester, and Sheffield containing six apiece. 'As to the secularist literature,' says our correspondent, 'I might have known more of it were it not that after ordering a few books and pamphlets from the advertisements in the National Reformer, I was twice asked to subscribe to a testimonial to the bookseller who supplied them,' which does not look as if his trade was one in which books issued 'by millions.' We have also received a publisher's circular, which clearly shows that cheap editions of Paine are to be had at an establishment kept by a gentleman who upon the same circular states that he is the sole agent for the dandelion, detergent, and aperient pills, and for some other valuable medicines, and that he sells a 'Medical Monitor,' which from its table of contents would appear not to be a very edifying work. This is just the state of things of which we meant to indicate the existence by our article. Secularism is a small and obscure sect, with small and obscure organs in the press and elsewhere. It is no doubt one symptom of controversies, the importance of which we shall not be accused of underrating; but compare the sort of operations referred to with the publications of the Bible Society or the Religious Tract Society, which really do issue from the press by millions."

The Guardian remarks that

"The early education of Mr. Disraeli was conducted by Mr. Cogan, a celebrated Unitarian minister at Walthamstow."

Whether, if Mr. Cogan were now living, he would feel proud of his pupil, or somewhat ashamed that he should have helped to produce (in the words of his favourite Sophocles) τοῖόνδε μηχανορράφον, δόλιον, ἀγύρτην, we will not venture to say.

Writing of the address of the Irish Episcopal Bench to the Queen, the Times considers that "if they had drawn up the document and sent it to the newspapers, or distributed it at the doors of all householders throughout the kingdom, the moral weight of the proceeding would have been as great as at present," and adds:

"We are afraid many will be inclined to look less kindly on the defence when they see who are the advocates. The two Archbishops and the ten Bishops of Ireland all join in these representations. They are the most successful members of that great corporation which, in the opinion of its opponents, irritates, if it does not insult and injure, the majority of the Irish people. They are the chief patrons of the Establishment; it is they who have to distribute those astounding benefices, those cures of souls without souls to minister to, those Protestant settlements in the midst of a Papist population, which must be highly valued by those who love the emoluments and dignity of the pastoral office divested of almost all its toils. People will say that these elderly and prosperous Churchmen are the very last persons to judge fairly of the institution to which they belong. They have risen by it, they love it for what it has done for them, and they may have a keen sense of even higher preferment to come."

Of a speech delivered by Bishop Jeune last Friday, the Manchester Guardian says:

"It brings before us in rather a curious way the feverish nightmare which has settled down upon the episcopal mind. The right rev. Prelate was proposing the toast of 'Church and Queen.' His mind was clearly not at ease. To 'Church and Queen' he is himself passionately attached, but he is haunted by fears, and 'cannot determine whether our children will enjoy the same blessing.' The effort to pull down the Irish Church is described as a move on the part of political gamblers; but in case the work of destruction should extend to England, he is careful to tell his people—mournfully, of course—that, even if disestablished, the Church would still continue to live. He trusts that the saying, 'No bishop, no king,' will not be verified; but 'at any rate, come what may, there will be bishops.' They may be bowed out of Parliament, their incomes may be brought a trifle nearer to the apostolic rate, but 'their prayers will have the same efficacy they have now; they will 'still live to consecrate churches for Christian people;' and, if need be, they will administer in upper chambers and in secret places.' This is almost as touching as the Pope's talk about retiring to the Catacombs. Dr. Jeune went on to say that he would 'stick to the Crown even if hung upon a bush.' 'We once,' he added, 'had a House of Commons, a thoroughly English House of Commons, a great House of Commons, which took upon itself to govern. They began with the best intentions; they ended with murdering the King and destroying the constitution.' 'May that awful omen be averted,' he prayed. We say, 'Amen;' but what are the political or other circumstances of the time which could have suggested such a speech as this?"

In reply to a charge made in the Inquirer, Mr. H. J. Preston says:

"It was my privilege for several years to be a member of the executive committee of the Liberation Society, and there are few things I regret more than that illness has compelled me to retire from that position; it was a pleasure to work with earnest liberal-minded men like Mr. Miall, Mr. Edwards, Mr. Ellington, and other members of that committee. It was well known that I was an Unitarian, and more would gladly have been welcomed. No doubt there are illiberal Baptists and Independents; but do all Unitarians, or even non-sectarians, deserve to be called liberal? I can truly say that the Liberation Society is conducted in a thoroughly liberal spirit."

The Saturday Review thinks that of all burdensome duties to such a man as Mr. Disraeli the duty of defending the Irish Church must be the most unwelcome. If he had but had the luck in life to have been retained for the other side, he would have been so thoroughly in his element. There must be something comic, even to himself, in the thought that he, of all men, on such a subject, should have to speak the thoughts of Mr. Newdegate and Mr. Gathorne Hardy. Not knowing what to do, he has acted and written and spoken wildly, foolishly, and at random. He has tried everything he could think of—No Popery, Down with the Ritualists, Long live our Protestant Queen—but he has made no way. Foolish as Englishmen are, they are not quite such fools as he takes them for. But when all this is said, it is absurd to go further, and to see some uncommonly dark and wicked design in the commonest thing he does. He is simply a man hard driven, and driven, as he thinks, much more hardly than he deserves to be. He is not going to give up his office, which has cost him a great deal to attain, unless he is fairly forced out of it.

The Pall Mall informs us that

"Mr. Tupper, the eminent poet, makes his appearance this week in the Rock with some verses adapted to the present crisis. We do not know Mr. Tupper's works by heart, and we are, therefore, unable to say whether his rallying cry to all true Protestants has been published before or not. The general effect of the address is to admonish us to uphold the 'Cross and the Crown,' as represented by the present Premier. Great ministers in former times have not lacked words to sing their praises, and if Mr. Disraeli has lost the confidence of the country he has the satisfaction, which no one will begrudge him, of knowing that the great Proverbial Philosopher, with his arsenal of rhymes, is ranged firmly on his side. Among the adverse influences which threaten us Mr. Tupper enumerates the following:

All strong concentrations of power and of plan,
With spies, and unscrupulous tricks
To trap or to scare or inveigle the man
In a birdlime that stuns as it sticks.

It will be seen from this single verse that Mr. Tupper attunes his lyre with his wonted skill. A birdlime 'that stuns' as well as sticks is a perilous commodity, and Mr. Tupper has done well to call our attention to it."

Here is a specimen, taken from the Rock, of the tactics which the Evangelicals are employing for the support of the Irish Establishment:

"What cares the subtle, ambitious, quick-witted, eloquent Mr. Gladstone what church or what religion he destroys, provided, like Judas, he can 'carry the bag?' Let the Protestants of England be duly warned that the friend of the so-called Archbishop of Westminster (Dr. Manning) and the closeted confidant of the Pope is bent on destroying, if he can, that powerful bulwark of Protestantism which is established in the United Church of England and Ireland. He begins with the Irish Church, because Ireland is the weakest point, with a view, ultimately, to make Ireland a fulcrum for his lever in operating upon the English Church."

At the annual meeting of the Metropolitan Friends' Sabbath-school Union, among the various suggestions made, it was urged as important that the junior pupils should have the subject of kindness to animals impressed upon their attention. It was also recommended that the young men and young women attending the senior classes should repeatedly be advised to cultivate habits of economy and foresight, and to avail themselves of the facilities for saving afforded by the Government post-offices. Thus many might become permanently careful, and be enabled to avoid the severe temptations and privations consequent upon improvidence.

As we mentioned, the Record, about a fortnight ago, took Mr. Spurgeon severely to task for the dreadful offence of lending his Tabernacle for a meeting in favour of the disestablishment of the Irish Church. Instead of taking his castigation meekly, Mr. Spurgeon has the boldness to reply, and, among other things, says:

"I write to you because I cannot suppose that you would wilfully misrepresent any man, and because I would give you an opportunity to abstain in future from unfounded reflections upon me. * * I allude to your scarcely dignified mention of the aid afforded by Churchmen in the erection of the Tabernacle. Now it may be, and I trust was the fact, that many Episcopalians gave small sums at collections towards that object, and to such I am still indebted; but, so far as our accounts show, there were no donations of any mentionable amount from any persons known to us as Episcopalians, with but one or perhaps two exceptions, and those happen to be persons whose views upon the Irish Church are quite as much in harmony with mine as with yours. I am not ungrateful for the very minute aid which was thus accorded, but it is made to figure so largely in your journal and other kindred papers, that I thought you must be labouring under some misapprehension. I should scarcely imagine that any man out of Hanwell would assert that I accepted the donations referred to with an implied contract that I was henceforth bound to the expression of opinions favourable to the Establishment. No sort of condition was appended to or implied in these kind but comparatively trifling gifts, or they would have been indignantly refused. I do not believe that any gentleman in the whole Episcopal body would be so little-minded as to offer a voluntary contribution to a member of another church, and then twit him upon the reception of it. We Nonconformists, who have so few amongst us of the great and noble, and may not, perhaps, presume to claim any very great refinement of manners, would hardly like so greatly to demean ourselves, and therefore I suspect that this view of the subject has escaped you, and that upon second thoughts you will withdraw the allusion which you may have been led to make in a moment of natural irritation."

Imposing as the meeting was of Archbishops, Bishops, Dukes, Earls, &c., in St. James's Hall, it does not seem to have given satisfaction to either of the two great parties in the Establishment. The High Church Guardian says that the Bishop of London spent most of his time "in the childish rhetorical trick of affecting not to be able to find out what people mean by their terms, when they talk about disestablishing and disendowing;" while the Archbishop of York "did worse," with his talk about "strangling" the measure of the Commons in the Lords; and as to the danger of increased power to the Church of Rome, which many fear from the proposed changes, it seems to the Guardian "they will make little difference one way or the other, and that the real danger to be feared from the debates which will attend them is the danger of a class of political clergymen deriving influence and boldness from the fears of better men." The Low Church Record, while it thinks that the success of the meeting (querre, the rioting?) "was almost exclusively due to the vast body of Evangelical clergy who occupied the hall," still says "the exclusion of the Evangelical bishops from their proper position in the programme of the meeting could not but be observed," and "it is only," the Record predicts, "by taking up Protestant ground that the movement will succeed," which means of course, raising the "No Popery" cry.

Referring to the view presented by the Dean of Westminster at the same meeting, the Express remarks:

"The course taken by Dean Stanley can have no other effect than to strengthen the hands of men from whose spirit and aims he radically dissents. The resolution which preceded that moved by him at the meeting in St. James's Hall deprecated the disestablishment of the Irish Protestant Church on 'No Popery' ground, which the Dean of Westminster does not occupy, and which is revolting to him. Unless we had been acquainted with the liberality of his views on the subject of subscription, we should have been at a loss to understand how he could have refrained from holding up his hand against it. Dean Stanley cannot long keep his eyes closed to the fact that the abolition of sectarian ascendancy in Ireland is possible only in one way. Levelling upwards, by indiscriminate endowment and a plurality of Church Establishments, is out of the question. Religious equality can be secured only by levelling downwards. We have such confidence in the generosity of his temper and in his keen sense of justice as to believe that when the facts of the case are forced upon him, he will be ready to sacrifice to them a favourite, possibly elsewhere a sound, but in Ireland an impracticable theory."

It appears that an attempt was made by authorised agents to induce the Rev. John Bedford, the President of the Wesleyan Conference, to give the same meeting the benefit of his countenance and support. Writing to the Watchman to correct an erroneous statement, he says, "though I was 'waited on officially,' I was not 'requested to set the body to which I belong in motion in favour of the Irish Establishment,' but to take a part in the meeting recently held under the chairmanship of the Archbishop of Canterbury in its favour." This, he says, he respectfully declined to do, not on the ground of any personal opinion, but because it did not appear to him that it was the duty of the Wesleyan Methodists as a body, or of himself as their president, to act either for or against the Irish Establishment. "But," he adds, "I did say to the gentleman who visited me on the occasion referred to, what I have said to others, that if the issue to be joined is to be between the disestablishment of one and the endowment of three or all, nothing could induce me to consent to the endowment of Popery."

It is interesting to find the Osservatore Romano, the Papal organ, and the Record, which hates everything belonging to the Pope, for once in sweet accord. The former abuses Mr. Gladstone as savagely as the latter for trying to disestablish the Irish Church, and praises Mr. Disraeli as strongly for resisting him, showing that the love of state endowments and ecclesiastical supremacy is stronger than even the dread of heresy.

A POET'S DREAM.

ON one occasion, when Tom Moore was present, Sidney Smith, having pronounced the Irish Church a nuisance, said, "I have always compared it to setting up butchers' shops in Hindostan, where they don't eat meat; 'we don't want this,' they say. 'Aye, aye, true enough, but you must support our shop.'" As the poet jotted this down at the time, no doubt it was the origin of the following lines, which are worth reproducing just now:

"The longer one lives the more one learns,"
Said I, as off to sleep I went,
Bemused with thinking of tithe concerns,
And reading a book by the Bishop of Ferns,
On the Irish Church Establishment.
But lo! in sleep not long I lay
When Fancy her usual tricks began,
And I found myself bewitched away
To a goodly city in Hindostan:
A city, where he who dares to dine
On aught but rice is deemed a sinner;
Where sheep and kine are held divine,
And, accordingly, never drest for dinner.
"But, how is this?" I wonderingly cried,
As I walked that city far and wide,
And saw in every marble street,
A row of beautiful butchers' shops—
"What means for men who can't eat meat
This grand display of loins and chops?"
In vain I asked—'twas plain to see
That nobody dared to answer me.
So on from street to street I strode:
And you can't conceive how vastly odd
The butchers looked: a rosetate crew
Enshrined in stalls with nought to do:
While some on a BENCH half dozing sat,
And the sacred cows were not more fat.
Still posed to think what all this scene
Of sinecure trade was meant to mean,
"And pray," asked I, "by whom is paid
The expense of this strange masquerade?"
"The expense—Oh that's of course defrayed"
(Said one of these well-fed hecatombers)
"By yonder rascally rice-consumers."
"What! they who mustn't eat meat?"—"No matter,"
(And while he spoke his cheeks grew fatter)
"The rogues may munch their PADDY crop,
But the rogues must still support our shop;
And, depend upon it, the way to treat
Heretical stomachs that thus dissent,
Is to burden all that won't eat meat
With a costly meat Establishment!"

OLD TESTAMENT CHAPTERS FOR THE SUNDAY SCHOOL.—V.

SUBJECT: "Arguments used by the Hebrew writers against Idols."

Read Isaiah xlv., 9—20, a description of the making of a graven image of wood. First, the smith forges the iron upon the coals, and hammers it into an axe by his strength; then the carpenter's tools are spoken of, the plumb line, the awl, the plane, the compasses. The planting of an ash and the hewing down of other trees of the forest is related; the heating of the oven for bread-baking, and the roasting meat with a part of the wood; the workman's warming himself at the fire and carving for himself an image out of the remainder of the wood, which, when he has finished it, he falls down before and prays to.

Read by the side of this three verses out of Isaiah, chap. xlv., 5—7, where is described the casting of a gold or silver image by the metal founder, and its powerlessness to move from its place. "Yea, a man shall cry unto it, yet can it not answer, nor save him out of his trouble."

And again read Psalm cxv., 2—8, on the utter helplessness of idols, the work of men's hands. And in conclusion draw attention, with respect to all these passages, towards the state of darkness in religious knowledge that must have existed at these times, when the arguments supplied by these sort of illustrations could have been needed, or could have been found useful.

PAGAN THEN PAPAL.

SOME little time ago, as our readers may recollect, the Dean of Westminster troubled Convocation by describing with disagreeable minuteness the Pagan origin of the ecclesiastical costumes that are so precious and full of meaning to Ritualists. In this month's Good Words, he subjects some of the Papal paraphernalia to the same secularising process; and shows that the Pope, in his association with the old classical world, is not at all like the Pope as the chief oracle of Christendom. In Dean Stanley's representation he is a museum of curiosities, and the ceremonies to which importance is attached are insignificant. In these things the Holy Father has acted "merely as the shoal which, like the island in his own Tiber, has arrested the straws of former ages as they floated down the stream of time." The white gown, which is the ordinary dress of a Pope, is the common classical dress of all ranks in Roman society, worn before the difference between lay and clerical costume had sprung up; and perpetuated in the head of the clergy from their longer adherence to ancient habits. The formidable crosier of great ecclesiastics is not the symbol of the priesthood against the State, nor even the crook of the pastor over his flock, but simply the walking stick, the staff of the old man, of the presbyter, such as appears always in the ancient drama of Greece and Rome, and in the famous riddle of Œdipus. It is the symbol of old age and nothing besides. The chair of state, the sella gestatoria, in which the Pope is born aloft, is the ancient palanquin of the Roman nobles, and, of course, the Roman princes. The red slippers which he wears are the red shoes, campagnes, of the Roman Emperor. The kiss which the faithful imprint on those shoes is the descendant of the kiss first imprinted on the foot of the Emperor Caligula. The fans which go behind him are the punkabs of the Eastern Emperors, borrowed from the Court of Persia. The "Pontifex Maximus," from whom the name by which the highest ecclesiastical character of the Pope is indicated, was not the Jewish High Priest, but the Pagan dignitary whose duty it was to conduct all public sacrifices, preside at the assemblies and games, and scourge to death any one who insulted the Vestal Virgins. The word "bishop," episcopus, was taken, not from any usage of the temple or of the synagogue, but from the officers created in the different subject-towns of Athens, borrowed from the Grecians. The word ordo (our holy "orders") was the name of the municipal senate of the empire. The word and idea of a "diocese" was taken from the existing divisions of the empire. The Pope's "Temporal power" is in no way the result of the connection of Church and State, but belongs to that feudal and princely character which was shared by so many great prelates of the middle ages. When the Pope is seen surrounded by his Swiss guards, or defended by his Chassepot rifles, we must regard him as "the last of the brotherhood of the fighting, turbulent, courtly prelates of the Rhine, of the Prince Bishop of Durham, or the Ducal Bishop of Osnaburgh." Whether Dean Stanley is right or not in his belief that lessons of charity and wisdom are taught by considerations of this kind, they certainly are interesting in an antiquarian point of view.

GOOD OLD TIMES.

A PARLIAMENTARY return obtained by Mr. Hubbard gives a curious account of all ecclesiastical appeals to the High Court of Delegates from 1533 to 1832, when it was superseded by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. A hundred and seventy-seven cases are reported, but only seven of these involved any questions of doctrine. In 1663 a clergyman was deprived of his benefices for "blasphemous speeches against the orthodox faith;" in 1688 another was suspended for "disaffection to the Church of England" shown by "not baptising with the sign of the cross." A vicar was tried in 1691 for preaching in favour of Popery, and his benefice was sequestered; and in 1704 a Commission of Appeal heard a case in which one Jones had been prosecuted for speaking against the Book of Common Prayer, by saying that it was "good for nothing, and that people if they were fond of it might as well read it at home as come to church to hear it there," and was condemned to suspension and payment of costs. The great case of "wicked Will Whiston," whose books on the Trinity Convocation had decreed to be dangerous and heretical, occupied the court for a couple of years at the beginning of the last century, and in 1759 the churchwardens of St. Margaret's, Westminster were cited for having inserted painted glass in the great eastern window of the parish church, representing "superstitious pictures or images," and "more particularly the painted image of Christ upon the Cross," and in 1775 a clergyman was charged with having "denied, deprived, reviled, and ridiculed" the first five of the Thirty-nine Articles and the Athanasian and Nicene Creeds. The first of these cases failed, and the last was got rid of by the submission of the defendant. Two centuries ago a layman was excommunicated by the court "for not receiving the Holy Eucharist at Easter, for defaming his [neighbours], and absenting himself from divine prayers." A few years later a woman was "corrected" for having, at Yarmouth, "rashly, and without authority, intruded herself into a certain seat in the church between the wives of the aldermen of the town;" and towards the close of the seventeenth century the rector of Birmingham was deprived of his living for "preaching among Quakers, railing in the pulpit at the parishioners, and practising jugglery." But for the last-mentioned offence, this return might set some of the clergy sighing for the good old times, and cause them to say "the former days were better than these," when Colensoes and Essayists and Reviewers are so hard to reach.

THE WIDEST CHURCH OF ALL.

THROUGHOUT the discussion which has recently occupied our columns, with regard to the question of a National Establishment, those who have impugned the principles of the Liberation Society have taken for granted that in arguing for a comprehensive National Establishment they were upholding the principle of a wide and unsectarian church, in opposition to a number of small exclusive sects. Occupied with combating some minor objections on the outskirts of the question, we have hitherto allowed this enormous assumption to pass. We feel, however, that it involves the radical mistake in which lies the whole attraction of their ideal Establishment divested of all creeds and widened so as to admit everybody, and it is time, therefore, to examine its grounds and expose its utter unreality.

The real alternative, as every one must admit who notes the workings of the sincere and effective religious life of England, is, not between one great unsectarian church and a number of small sectarian ones, but between the divergent tendencies of religious life and thought, working themselves freely out with just so much co-operation as they may feel naturally inclined to, and those same divergent tendencies compelled into an unnatural alliance, and united into one anarchic ecclesiasticism. These divergent tendencies are not things that can be got rid of by attempting to ignore them; they exist just as much within the present Establishment as outside of it. The fact is, as the Rev. R. L. CARPENTER well points out in a letter to the Inquirer this week, those who believe in church organisation not based upon distinct doctrinal agreement are an insignificant fraction of the religious world. Neither Church people nor Dissenters believe in this. The organising of religious life into separate churches is not the cause of this, but the consequence of it; and what we contend is that so long as these divergent tendencies exist they will co-exist more peaceably, they will develop whatever life they have more healthily, they will be more likely to come gradually into friendly relations, while organising and acting in perfect independence than as the co-occupants and contending factions of a church nominally one. We have a signal illustration of this in the United States, where the Episcopal and other Denominational churches are manifesting much more tendency to fellowship than is visible between the same parties on this side the Atlantic. We have another very signal illustration of it at home, viz., that, as we have more than once pointed out, the most diverse sects outside the Establishment are much less intolerant and antagonistic—that is, are less sectarian—than the corresponding sections, Ritualists, Broad Church, and Evangelicals, within the Establishment itself. It is not, therefore, because we love sectarianism that we oppose the proposal to maintain the ascendancy of the Established Church for the hope of its eventually being made colourless and all-comprehensive. It is because we believe that by leaving the religious life of the people to organise itself naturally and freely, the wide brotherhood we all alike desire will be most speedily and certainly attained. So long as a large proportion of those who are strongly religious do, as a fact, magnify doctrinal differences into paramount importance, no mere decree of a heterogeneous parliament that the Established Church shall be free to all would really cause men of widely different opinions to unite in the only sense that is worth calling union. On the other hand, when Christian men in the different churches have come to see these doctrinal differences in their true proportions, they will draw into that gradually closer fellowship of work and worship which will constitute them true members of the same great church of Christ, even though there may be no formal ecclesiastical amalgamation. When this is the case, the fact of the different churches, while thus becoming gradually one, retaining their old historic names will not hinder their unity. Their names will be interesting old landmarks, like the divisions between our English counties, which do not touch our unity as a nation. That will be the widest church of all, and in this direction we are persuaded lies the real solution of the sad problem of sectarianism.

Meanwhile every element of complication in the problem of attaining this is increased and not lessened by the ascendancy of the Established Church. As we have already said, so far as its members are thoughtful and outspoken, they are more antagonistic in the Establishment than they would be out of it; whatever of apparent breadth it has is the harmoniousness of a menagerie whose members are prevented by their keepers from doing more than snarl, or are too well fed to quarrel. Meanwhile it perpetuates that arrogance of religious caste, that well-to-do assumption of belonging to "the only church fit for a gentleman," which is infinitely more hurtful to Christian life than the open theological antagonism which keeps men apart in sects. That there are many practical difficulties in the way of putting that Establishment with its conflicting sections on the same footing as the other independent sections of Christ's church in England, we fully admit. But no change that could be made, no most sweeping proposal ever broached by the Liberation Society could be so unjust as the maintenance of things in the status quo, or so Utopian as the expectation that any change could take place in its constitution which would make it anything but what it is now—the biggest, and most Conservative, and most quarrelsome of the sects.

THE WANDERER.—VI.

A POSITIVIST LECTURE.

SEENING that Professor E. S. Beesly was to lecture in the Cleveland Hall on the 7th instant, on "The Future of the Working Class," I resolved to be present, to hear what hopes the followers of Comte hold out to their humbler brethren. The lecture-room was but scantily filled, the audience being probably about 200, chiefly workmen, but with a sprinkling of the middle class. The professor is a middle-aged man, of fair complexion, and of pleasing and intellectual appearance.

He endeavoured to show that the lot of the skilled artisan, earning his 35s. a week, was harder than that of the toiling professional man; but seemed more successful in pointing out the miseries of the really poor, some of whom live habitually on wages smaller than the allowance of the Lancashire operatives during the famine. He reminded us that to the lower working classes life is so wearisome and joyless that the grave, whether for themselves or their kindred, seems a boon: as any one who has observed their manner of speaking of death can see. The Esquimaux may have fewer luxuries than the working man, but has he to toil in a factory from his earliest years? Does he not from childhood lead a healthier and happier life? The Jamaica negroes are blamed because they will not toil like English poor, when they can have enough to eat and wear without working. Probably the English poor wish they were as the Jamaica negroes. The farm labourer is worse off than he was 100 years ago—a time when the "gang" system was unknown. Wealth is but one of the elements of wellbeing, and it is an error to suppose its mere increase, without any fairer distribution of it, to be a progress.

To remedy this unhappy state various theories of communism have been created, and the systems of trades' unions and co-operation have succeeded them. The former theories always obtained wider acceptance in France than in England, but never succeeded in winning the support of the Government—a circumstance which greatly injured them in France, for "the logical and orderly character of the French mind, which abhors anything partial or patchy either in thought or action," leads it to seek the adoption by the State of all its schemes. In England we prefer to carry out our plans ourselves, rather than "to wait till we get a Government that agrees with us." It was inevitable that Socialistic theories should fail when put in practice, for they "suppose the existence of more unselfishness than we find in ordinary men, yet do not propose either to create it or to supply its place by the only power which can impel large masses of men—an organised Religion."

"The noble-minded men" who founded co-operation, proposed to end the evils of the conflict between labour and capital, by abolishing the class of capitalists—the workmen were themselves to be the owners of their work. The plan was soon found impracticable, and the co-operative mills employ non-shareholders to whom they simply pay the market rate of wages. In the province, however, not of production, but of distribution—as applied to shops and stores, that is, instead of to manufacturing—co-operation has been a success, and its benefits can hardly be overrated.*

The system of trades' unions, on the other hand, whilst giving workmen greater power of protecting their interests against any encroachment by their masters, would leave the two classes in their respective stations, and would aim "not at depriving the capitalists of power, but at teaching them to use their power for the good of society." For it sees that "a small body of capitalists would be more easily" controlled by public opinion, than a "multitudinous mob of co-operative shareholders; and believes that the working man must be benefited as a working man, and not as something else." It might naturally be supposed that the masters would view this system more favourably than the co-operative one, which aims at their extinction. Yet the reverse is the case. The cause is that they see in the rise of a large class of men possessed of a little acquired property, a protection for their own interests in the event of any attempt to remodel our social condition. What a few who have £30,000 each could not alone do, they may do when backed by a great many who have £300, for such men are fanatically attached to what they call "the rights of property," and lend willing ears to "the crafty impostors who talk big words about 'saving society.'" Indeed, Mr. Beesly seemed to have little sympathy with those who seek to rise out of the sphere of labour, and expressed his approval of the men "who are content to die in the condition in which they were born, and ask only that their wages may be fair, and their work regular. It is this easy-going class whom trades' unions especially protect." He denounced "the cant" of the Self-help school, who preach about the men that by perseverance and a certain low sharpness—after all, not the highest type of character—raise themselves from their original sphere and become, as Lord Shaftesbury lately expressed it, "good and even affluent." He left it to workmen to say whether those of their fellows who became masters were the best and most refined.

Trades-unionism being thus the only solution of our present difficulties, the relation of employer and employed is not destined to cease, but will endure "like another relationship also much attacked at present—that of husband and wife,"—because adapted to the nature and circumstances of mankind. "This is very far from being the best of all possible worlds;" and we can never escape the evils that are inherent in the nature of things, but we may learn how to adapt ourselves to them, "as a person may preserve his health in a pestilential climate, though he cannot alter that climate." There will always be hard and disagreeable work which some one must do, and his lot will consequently be harder and more disagreeable than that of others. Yet a great amelioration of the condition of the workman is practicable, and, indeed, inevitable. "Eight hours' labour a day for six days a week, and a complete holiday on the seventh will give him time to educate himself, to enjoy himself, and above all, to see something of his family." And the State, whilst refusing by any arbitrary adjustment of prices to aid the undue increase of population, or pauperise those whom it protects, may yet aid the working man in many ways. It may regulate more carefully the shopkeeper's weights and measures—unless, indeed, the universal presence of co-operative stores should render it unnecessary—it may ensure him a supply of good water; it may give him education, libraries, and museums; and it may provide good music for him in the parks on Sundays. (Applause.) His position will still be less desirable, his comforts less numerous, than his employer's: "but his condition, though less splendid, will not be less dignified," and his employer's wealth, though greater, will be greater within limits, for public opinion under religious direction will not allow the heartless magnificence which lends additional sting to the sorrows of poverty. "And when employers and employed rule their lives by the principles of a rational Religion," to live without working for a livelihood and despise those who do work, will be considered not an honour, but a disgrace, and such a disgrace that society will forcibly forbid it; and we shall no more know "that false shame which the industrious now feel in the presence of the idle."

The industrial classes have passed through three stages, that of chattels, articles of property without any rights; that of serfdom, in which, whilst still subject to ownership, they possessed certain limited rights; thirdly, that of perfect liberty and equality of rights. The transition from the second to the third stage was the work of those dark ages—so called—which, whilst losing the grace and culture of classic times, were raising the people from the utter degradation in which those times had been content to leave them. The perfecting of this last stage of progress is the work of to-day—one of vast importance. For if the first axiom of Government be to forward the happiness of the greatest number, we may test a man's statesmanship by what he does for the working class.

Sometimes one feels tempted to despair of the working men, when one sees so many who care for nothing but "low public-houses and vulgar music-halls. Yet these men, who care only for their pipe and glass and comic song, are to be moved to enthusiasm by appeals not to their selfishness but to their loftier feelings. They are able to see that it is right to work for others, though they may themselves be too weak to do so."

We must not shrink from making sacrifices in the great cause merely because we shall never live to see its triumphs. The hero of the French Revolution said, "Let my name be blighted, but let France be free." Danton, Paul, and Moses teach us the spirit of self-sacrifice in which a great work should be undertaken. We must work for posterity, just as our predecessors worked for us. We have not to suffer what some of them suffered, not even "to go to the gallows, like John Brown and George William Gordon, the latest martyrs of labour." And we may be proud of our purpose, for "a nobler cause than that of the working men of Europe marching in triumph to their final emancipation, the world is never likely to see."

With these words the Professor concluded his lecture, amidst long and loud applause. Indeed, his audience appeared to agree with all his political views, and applauded earnestly when he spoke of them as "men who, if not Republican in name, were thoroughly Republican in spirit," and still more so when he alluded to "the next French Revolution—for which, by the way, I am getting rather impatient!" His prophecies, however, of the benefits that are to arise through the adoption of a new and powerful Religion never elicited any mark of approval, though he never mentioned Positivism in terms, or specified anything as to the nature of this new faith.

The subsequent speakers were brief, except a man who claimed to have taken part in all the outrier movements of his time, and pointed out how the education of the last twenty years had diminished the number of the supporters of universal suffrage. He claimed also, as a result of trades' unions, that they had made the masters less averse to disclosing their accounts and profits.

CYRIL.

SELECTING A RELIGION.

THE other night Mr. P. A. Taylor drew out explanations from Lord Mayo concerning the enforced conversion of a prisoner by order of the governor of the gaol, on which the Daily News thus comments:—

"Things are coming to a pretty pass when Queen Victoria's servants are turned into recruiting officers for the Pope. It appears that at the Mountjoy Prison, Dublin, every prisoner is presumed to be of some religion. Why this should be taken for granted we do not clearly see. The fact that a man has done something to deserve imprisonment, so far as it goes, furnishes a presumption against his having any religion at all worth speaking of. Such, however, is the fact: a man who gets into gaol is required on the spot to make a profession of religion. The religions recognised by the rules of Mountjoy Prison—kept in stock, shall we say?—are of three patterns, Anglican, Roman Catholic, and Presbyterian. Considering that the Registrar General enumerates no fewer than 93 Christian denominations in his last annual report, the religious resources of Mountjoy must be pronounced very meagre. Mr. Taylor appears to have supposed that Murphy, on being admitted, professed himself a Unitarian. If this had been the case no difficulty ought to have been made. Unitarianism is one of the religions subsidised under the extraordinary system at present established in Ireland. Unitarian ministers regularly receive the regium donum, and there could be no objection to a prisoner receiving the ministrations of one of their number. Murphy, however, was not a Unitarian. When summoned to give an account of his religious belief, he described himself as a 'pagan,' and declined to receive the instruction of any clergyman whatever. The honest governor was not going to be baffled in this manner. If Murphy had been black or yellow, or had worn his eyes, like the Chinese, in the sides of his head, his profession of an outlandish faith might have been accepted. As it was, the governor, who is a military officer, in Lord Mayo's words, 'ordered him to select a religion,' of course from one of the three Mountjoy patterns. At the same time the prison doctor attacked him in a vital organ, and 'ordered him to be put on penal diet for three days.' At the end of a couple of days the treatment had begun to tell, for it was necessary to send the man into the hospital. He appears, however, to have still remained obdurate and impenitent, notwithstanding all that had been done for him, and not having selected a religion, he was again put on penal diet for three days. At the expiration of this time the good work was complete, and Murphy chose one of the Mountjoy religions—the Roman Catholic. Whether the Pope has accepted this extraordinary convert, and whether Murphy remains steadfast in his profession, we are not told. The absurdity of the whole proceeding, however, appears to have forced itself even upon the governor, and Lord Mayo intimates that he has framed a bill which will make it unnecessary in future for the officials of a gaol to extort by torture a false and futile profession from a prisoner committed to their charge."

AMERICAN NOTES.

It appears from a statement in the Nation that the votes of money by the Legislature of the State of New York to the Catholic Church, for the support of its religious schools and other ecclesiastical purposes, are now so regular and so large in amount as to be equivalent to a fixed endowment. In fact, it may be said that the Catholic Church is the Established Church of the State, in so far as a Church can be established by annual grants. The sum set apart for this purpose this year amounted to over $200,000, and in order to disguise the real nature of the performance from the public, a few grants in aid of the charitable institutions of other denominations are scattered through the list. One of these, to the Young Men's Christian Association, was never asked for, and has been refused by the president. What strikes one most unpleasantly about all this is not that the Legislature should vote the money, or that the mass of their Irish constituents should be gratified by seeing them vote it, but that the Catholic clergy should be willing to accept it. Their doing so is simply profiting by what they know to be an abuse; and, more than this, it is a breach of faith toward their Protestant fellow-citizens. It is just that kind of unscrupulousness, too, which has, wherever they have been oppressed by Protestants, furnished a ready excuse for oppressing them, on the ground that they never accept or concede equality themselves when superiority is within their reach. In fact, one of their organs, the Dublin Review, not very long ago denied that toleration was a duty when the true believers were in sufficient force to compel uniformity, and it looks now as if they accepted the voluntary system only when Protestants were too strong to be fleeced.

It is stated that the Rev. Olympia Brown has declined the invitation to lecture for the Equal Rights Association, the society at Weymouth having raised her salary and manifested a unanimous and hearty wish for her to remain their minister.

A copy of Eliot's Indian Bible, which no one is able to read, was sold last month by auction in New York for eleven hundred and thirty dollars, the highest price, it is said, ever paid for a printed book in America.

As a set-off against the feeling manifested towards coloured persons in a Congregational Church at Washington, to which we referred two or three weeks ago, we may mention that the President of the United States recently attended the funeral of William Slade (a negro), late steward of the White House. The ceremony was performed by a black clergyman, assisted by a white one, and the pall was borne by six alternate black and white friends. Slade left a considerable fortune, and was as well known and as highly respected as any man in Washington.

The Rev. Mr. Manning, of the Old South Church, Boston, who has been lecturing on Carlyle and Emerson, regarded the former as an infidel of the first water, and felt no doubt what his future setting would be. As to the latter, he entertained some doubts, evidently thinking that if not good enough to be saved, he was rather too good to be damned.

There is still work for the Bible Society, if the statement be true which appears in an American paper, that half a million people in Illinois are without a copy of the Scriptures.

Dr. Nathan, an eloquent German-Jewish Rabbi, is exciting considerable attention in America by his discourses. He spiritualises the idea of the Messiah, and does not expect his coming in the flesh. The Jews look upon him as "unsound," and he is not permitted to preach in the synagogues.

In one of his letters from Egypt to the Liberal Christian, on his first introduction to the sacred cow figured in a temple of Isis, Dr. Bellows says:

"The sacred character ascribed by the Egyptians to certain animals was probably not merely capricious disorder of their imaginations, but in every case the result of some important policy on the part of the priests, who thus called in the aid of religion to strengthen or render possible some economic necessity of the country. If wool were a greater want than mutton, the sheep was pronounced a sacred animal, and we have reason to know that the Egyptians did not eat mutton, and thus greatly increased their supply of wool. If milk and beef were the great desiderata, they preserved the cow by pronouncing her sacred, but killed the ox, reserving only the sacred bull, as the worshipful representation of his most servicable race. If they worshipped the crocodile, it was only in some particular places remote from the river where he made away with the smaller animals that perforated their canals, and undermined their precious dykes, or because he symbolised the holy Nile. Doubtless some things, as the serpent, the hawk, the ibis, represented or symbolised qualities with them, as they continued to do with us. But great as the degradation of the people became when their religion had developed its utter formalism, under priestly superintendence, there is abundant reason for acknowledging that its origin was pure and monotheistic, recognising a spiritual and invisible source of life and thought; and that its corruptions were only such as the cultus of all established religions, under ecclesiastical control, finally fastens upon the original essence of the faith they first formulise, then formalise, and then forget—worshipping at last the sign and not the thing signified. It is so with the Moslems; it is so with the Greeks; it is so with the Roman Catholics; it is fast becoming so with the Church of England."

BRIDGEWATER.—On Sunday, May 10, a number of the members of the congregation assembled at the house of the Rev. Thomas Timmins, who is about to leave Bridgewater, the pulpit of which he has for some time occupied in conjunction with the Rev. W. C. Coupland, to present him with a testimonial. The presentation, which consisted of an inkstand and pulpit gown, with a purse containing the balance of the subscription, was made by Captain Robins, with a very kind address.

FOOTPRINTS OF LOVE.

LIFE leaveth many footprints
On the golden sands of time;
Footprints of high and noble deeds,
And, alas! of many a crime.
Footprints of kings and warriors,
Of the conquerors of earth;
Footprints of busy little feet
Gathering around the hearth.
Footprints of stern, high daring,
And of deeds as soft and mild;
But the sweetest footprints I have seen
Were those of a little child.
The little steps went in
A dungeon walled around;
They went with gathered flowers to cheer
A prisoner chained and bound.
The little voice was heard
In whispers soft and low,
And the little hand was gently laid
On a dark and troubled brow.
And trembling words lisped forth
The Saviour's precious name,
Till o'er that captive's sullen mood
Repentant feeling came.
And the little steps went out,
But the footprints long remained:
Remained, too, in the softened heart
Of that prisoner bound and chained.
Footprints they are in time;
But not in time alone:
Eternity, in living light,
Those blessed steps will own.
Then, little one, go thou
And do some loving thing;
Leave footprints on the sands of time,
Whence blessed fruits may spring.

THE WINDOW THAT MADE FACES UGLY.

PART V.

Little Harry read what Baxter went on to say, that "the torments of the damned are the effects of divine revenge. WRATH IS TERRIBLE, BUT REVENGE IS IMPLACABLE. The great God shall say, 'I will now be righted for all the wrongs that I have borne from my rebellious creatures. I will let out my wrath, and it shall be stayed no more. You shall now pay me for all the abuse of my patience. Did you think I would always be slighted by such miscreants as you?'"

Harry was perfectly horrified now by this picture of God. If this was God it was a very different being from the Heavenly Father, mild and loving, he had been taught to look up to and love. He had always been made to think by his mother that nothing in the world could be uglier or more hateful than an angry or revengeful temper. Often and often had she drawn the picture of some boy, losing control of his temper and carried away by violent anger, and inflicting injury on some one who had provoked him, and had compared it to the picture of a furious animal, a fighting dog, or raging wolf. And here was God, the highest and holiest of beings, pictured as just such a being as this, losing his temper, and giving way to feelings of cruellest vengeance.

But Harry had become almost fascinated now with this horrible picture. He was well nigh sick, and yet he could not turn his thoughts away. He wanted to know what else there was, and so read on—

"How God will stand over them with the rod in his hand. O that men would understand this, and not put themselves under the hammer of his avenging fury."

"God will take pleasure in the execution of the damned. Is it not a terrible thing to a wretched soul, when it shall be roaring perpetually in the flames of hell, and the God of mercy himself shall laugh at them, when they shall cry out for mercy, yea, for one drop of water, and God shall mock at them?"

Harry threw the book from him with horror. "It is not true; it can't be true. Our dear Heavenly Father could not be so cruel as this. He could not take delight in the sufferings of His children. I will never believe it." Still almost while he spoke he could not help taking up the other book, "Bunyan's World to Come," which lay upon the bed; so powerful a fascination over his mind had the terrible subject thrown. He glanced at the pages and read:

"All the pains that may be endured on earth are but as the biting of a flea to those intolerable pains endured in hell. Every member of soul and body is tormented at once—the eye with the sight of devils of all horrid shapes, the ear with the horrid yellings and continual outcries of the damned; the nostrils smothered with sulphurous flames; the tongue blistered with brimstone; the whole body rolled in flames of liquid fire."

"And then God, so far from pitying them, rejoices in their misery, and will do so for ever. The Redeemer, who gave his pity for others, has no pity for them; and whilst they are howling in their misery under the wrath of an avenging God, the saints shall rejoice that they are damned, and God shall be glorified in their destruction."

"O, nurse," cried Harry, now bursting into tears, "Do, do tell me that no one believes these horrible things now."

"I cannot tell you that, Harry, because these are true," and though she saw how excited the boy was, she could not help going on with the fearful experiment. "Our minister, last Sunday, said it was true; and said that children who had died without repentance would be striped by devils, stripe on stripe, for millions of ages. He represented a little girl standing on a red-hot floor for ever. The roof was red hot, the walls were red hot, the floor was like a sheet of red-hot iron, and the devil says to her: 'Not for one moment during the never-ending eternity of years shall you ever leave this red-hot floor!'"

"O, stop, stop, nurse," now almost shrieked Harry, wrought up to a pitch of fearful excitement. "I cannot bear it any longer. If I were to think all this true, it would drive me mad. O, it would be horrible to live, and more horrible to die."

Nurse now feared that she had gone too far as she saw Harry's flushed cheek, wild, glaring eyes, and excited manner. She was frightened for the consequences, and began to see that, though she might excite and terrify the child, she was not likely to convince him against the teaching of his father and mother. So she removed the books, and, sitting down quietly beside him, took his hand and tried to soothe him. But Harry could not rest; he kept tossing about in an excited manner, and when his mother came to wish him good night she found him very feverish. At first she had no suspicion of the cause, but thought it was a turn in the disease; until she was leaving him, when he threw his arms round her neck, and begged her to stay with him and deliver him from the dreadful pictures that haunted him. For he seemed to see the burning lake; he saw the horrid forms of demons; he heard the howls and screams and the clanks and chains of the lost. He could not help fancying the form of the awful God, clothed in the black thunder clouds of wrath, looking down in anger on them. His mother felt, for the moment, as if she could have beaten Allen for thus cruelly abusing the mind of her sick child, as she now comprehended what she had done. However, she said nothing now, but set herself to soothe her darling, sponging his forehead, and administering cooling drinks. At last the boy fell asleep, but it was only to spring up soon with wild alarm, and screams that rang through the house and brought his father, the nurse, and the other servants to the bedside. Harry, panting, and with starting eyes, hid his face in his mother's bosom. He had dreamt—the same thoughts pursuing him—that he was dead, and then he looked up, and saw the great angry God looking down sternly upon him, and pointing him to the dreadful lake that yawned before him, while demons seemed to be pursuing and trying to clutch him. It was just as he felt the gripe of one of these horrid monsters that he awoke.

THE EPISCOPAL RIDDLE.

MANY ingenious minds appear to have been much exercised by Archbishop Whately's riddle, which we gave last week, as to who first heard the sound of boots upon the stairs of the Ark and the suggested reply that

He heard it first who went before
Two pairs of soles and 'eels.

Here are two comments on the answer:

As Father Noah knew well how Fish out of water feel,
It seems most likely that the Ark
Held neither sole nor eel.

Think yet again; it will be seen,
With water out, and none within,
A bootless errand 't would have been,
For soles or eels to enter in.

A STORY OF A LIFEBOAT.

We take the following, slightly altered and abridged, from the Telegraph:

On the 17th of December 1866, there was shown, near the Broomielaw in Glasgow, a lifeboat, named the 'Edinburgh and R. M. Ballantyne,' and by it there hung a money-box to receive the contributions of those who called to look at the 'boatie,' which the working men of Edinburgh had clubbed their 'siller' to build, and who might like to lend a hand towards completing her outfit and providing to keep her afloat. Among those who came to see her before she went to her station at Port Logan, on the Wigtonshire coast, was the wife of the captain of the Glasgow bark Strathleven, accompanied by her children. A sailor's wife and a sailor's little ones would naturally look at the boat with other feelings than those of a landsman's household. One can imagine how she would tell them of the awful scene when the ship comes upon the cruel rocks, and the masts lash like a whip, and crack, and go over the sides, and the gray and white seas sweep the deck; while there is no hope for the crew unless a boat like this be at hand. And then the thought would and did come, 'If "father" were ever in such a strait, and his life were hanging on the gallant strokes of the lifeboat men as they fought with the winds and waves to save him!' Whereat the heart of the sailor's wife sent her hand to her pocket, and one of the little ones was hoisted 'aloft' to drop something kind and helpful into the box. A simple incident enough! you will say. But exactly a year afterwards, on the 17th of December, 1867, a barque, with a captain and crew of fourteen men aboard, was caught in the cold wild weather off the Wigtonshire coast, and driven upon the rocks. The situation of the men was desperate: the vessel would soon break up; the fifteen souls who clung about the rigging knew that, unless they were quickly seen by the watchers at some lifeboat station, their fate was death. Happily they were seen, and soon the captain of the Strathleven observed the boat coming—for the vessel was none other than the Glasgow barque, and the captain the husband of the lady who had gone to visit 'the Edinburgh and R. M. Ballantyne,' and helped to set it at its work. But that was not all the marvel of the strange coincidence! When the lifeboat warped alongside, and took the fifteen helpless mariners safe off the wreck, she proved to be the Port Logan boat, with that long and well-remembered name painted on the stern-sheets. And so, when the captain of the Strathleven came to his home safe and sound, instead of drifting a corpse out into the rolling North Sea, with all his ship's company, he had to tell his glad and happy wife, and that tiny public who had heard 'mother's' little lecture upon lifeboats, that on the very same day of the year that they gave their money for love and charity to the boat, that self-same boat had saved him from death, and sent him alive and grateful to their arms.

Not once in a million shall we see good deeds thus visibly and directly rewarded. If sailors' wives could buy the lives of their dear ones so, how full the boxes of the lifeboats would be! Of course this is only what we call a 'coincidence,' and mathematicians would tell us how many almost infinite chances to one it was against such an extraordinary interest being paid by Providence upon such a principal. But in this world there is no 'coincidence' and no 'chance'; these are but names for effects whereof the causes are rendered inscrutable by their number and complexity. We may really take the children's view of such a lovely piece of 'accident,' and be very many times nearer to the truth than the mathematicians. For that ancient Greek said a good and a true thing when he wrote, 'The Fates sell everything at a fair price.' Here, in this 'coincidence,' we almost catch the Divine administration of good for good and evil for evil. What was it that the Scotch lady's silver actually furnished; what connected the first shining link of pity and womanly feeling and wisely yearning with the last link of manly gallantry and timely service at the other end of the chain of events? If we knew all, as the angels know it, should we know enough? Should we see that the very coin dropped into the box paid for a haliard or a towline which had to do with the rescue; or for a spare rowlock which saved a vital minute in starting; or for something or other which somehow led, with fifty thousand consenting causes, directly to this beautiful issue? Or if we looked with angel eyes, should we see greater wonders far than lucky haliards or towlines, or timely rowlocks? Should we see that the human love and pity which prompted the gift of the mother and children are really vast and potent forces, passing forth into the world, like commissioned influences, subtler than the most ethereal of the imponderable elements; infinite in power and result, like all force; contributions, for ever and ever, to the growing eternity of good—which must and will bear their fruit of blessed ripening, to scatter, in turn, for ever, fresh seeds of fresh fruits? Had we angel eyes, we might believe, as the children believe, that these emitted forces of sweet and noble thought and wish were angels too, and we might see a very marvellous spectacle in the Strathleven drifting upon her fate amid the rocks. To ordinary vision she was a doomed ship, drifting helplessly, with no hope for the poor souls on board but 'chance.' To the opened, wiser sight she was a lovely and glorious spectacle! for though the ship must perish, at the helm the wife's embodied gift of mercy stands like an angel, smiling, and beckoning the lost bark to the right spot for her grave; and at the lifeboat station the children's innocent pity for poor sailors, soft and fair in form, and visible, stoops at the ear of the look-out man, and whispers words of guidance.

OLD JOKES.

THERE is scarcely a modern illustration of witty or humorous Irish simplicity which is not at least as old as the Platonic philosopher of Alexandria, Hierocles, who lived five centuries before the Christian era. At that early period men laughed at the simpleton who resolved never to go into the water till he had learned to swim; or at him who wished himself as speechless as the sick man from whom he could obtain no reply, in order that he might return the invalid's incivility, or at that other who attempted to keep his horse alive without food, and who failed just at the moment of success by the obstinate brute dying. Greeks laughed long before Irishmen at their respectively alleged fellow-countryman who carried a brick about as a sample of the house he had to sell. The Hibernian who shut his eyes before a looking-glass, that he might see how he looked when he was asleep; who bought a crow, to test the truth of the assertion that the bird lived a couple of centuries; who, in a shipwreck, clung to an anchor to save himself from drowning; and who remarked to a friend who reasonably denied the asserted fact of his reported death, that the fact had been vouched for by one who was more worthy of credit than he who denied it—that Hibernian is an old Greek in modern disguise, and the Greek, as in the story of Amphitryon, is believed to be indebted to a Hindoo predecessor who may, probably, turn and "Chin chin!" to the original inventor of the story in Pekin!—Argosy.

LINES.

WHILE I was reading, a small fly lighted on my book, and presented in itself an immediate reply to a specious argument, intended to disprove the existence of the Divine Being.

The sky was like an amethyst,
Resplendent was the sod,
And yet the daring Atheist
Denied there was a God.

And while I read the impious tract
Of this presumptuous sage,
Not knowing how to think or act,
A fly lit on the page.

It was no larger than a speck
Of dust upon the hill,
Yet, as it moved its wings and neck,
I traced the Maker's skill.

The lenses of its tiny eye,
Its gay integument,
Its shape, its colour, and its dye
Were more than argument.

Confuted by a tiny fly,
With pity, more than ire,
In twain I tore the wicked lie,
And flung it in the fire. H. Y. J. T.

INTELLIGENCE.

BIRMINGHAM: NEWHALL HILL.—On Sunday last, the 34th anniversary sermons were preached by the Rev. David Griffith, of Cheltenham. The attendance and collections were larger than usual, the church being crowded in the evening. On Monday evening the annual tea party was held. There was a good attendance, including the Revs. D. Griffiths, R. H. Cotton, and E. Madely, Messrs. John and Matthias Green, T. Prime, T. Prime, jun., G. R. Twinn, J. R. Chirm, H. Payton, and J. Cooper. Mr. T. Prime presided, and the report was read by Mr. A. Derrington, one of the superintendents, showing in the boys' Sunday school 216 scholars; average attendance 160; teachers 32, average attendance 11; and in the girls' Sunday school 140 scholars; average attendance 104; teachers 18, average attendance 7. Instruction is given in both schools in reading, writing, arithmetic, and dictation.

BLYTH, NORTHUMBERLAND.—The friends at Blyth having again secured the lecture-room of the Mechanics' Institution for a religious service, the Rev. J. C. Street, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, was invited to preach, and on Sunday evening, May 17th, conducted worship there. The room was filled. The subject of the discourse was "God's property in souls," from the text "All souls are mine." The audience was evidently interested. At the close of the service, a meeting was held to consider the desirability of establishing a Unitarian Church at Blyth. A resolution affirming the desirability of such a step was passed, a preliminary committee and a provisional secretary and treasurer were appointed, and a subscription list was opened at once.

BOLTON: COMMISSION-STREET.—The annual school sermons were preached on Sunday last, by the Rev. A. Gordon, M.A., when collections were made amounting to £26. 7s. 3½d.

HYDE CHAPEL, GEE CROSS.—On Sunday last, the annual sermons in behalf of the schools were preached, in the morning and evening, by the Rev. Wm. Gaskell, M.A., of Manchester, when the collections amounted to upwards of £30.

NORTHAMPTON.—On Sunday, May 3rd, and Monday evening, May 4th, services were held at Northampton, to celebrate the enlargement of the Unitarian Chapel, and the erection of new school-rooms. The enlargement of the chapel consists of a partial lateral extension to the west, and affords accommodation for about a hundred persons or upwards more than formerly, besides adding otherwise to the commodiousness and general air of simple elegance which has always pervaded the chapel. The organ, which used to occupy the front gallery, has been removed to the newly added gallery on the west side of the edifice, and having been put in thorough good order by Mr. Kemshed, of Bridge-street, it was opened on Sunday by Mr. H. Kemshed. The improvement in the organ is marked, and afforded great satisfaction to the congregation. The part of the gallery lately filled by the organ will now, we believe, be occupied by the Sunday-school children. The new school-rooms are brought forward to the front, and face King-street. They consist of a lower and an upper room, and are both of a large and commodious character. The cost of the whole work of improvement and construction has been some £700 or £800. The work has been accomplished in a very excellent manner, and the congregation may congratulate itself, not only that the enlargement of the chapel has proved such a marked improvement, but that they are now in possession of two such excellent schoolrooms, which must necessarily prove of great utility. On Sunday the services were commenced by two sermons, preached by the Rev. Henry Ierson, M.A., of Islington. On Monday evening a public meeting was held in the upper schoolroom, under the presidency of the Rev. Iden Payne, minister of the place. There was a numerous attendance, and addresses were given by the Chairman, Rev. H. Ierson, who was present as a deputation from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, Messrs. G. F. Newton, P. Derby, Trench, Watts, Dennis, and Marfield. It appeared from the report that there is still a deficiency of £342.

OLDHAM.—On Sunday last, after sermons by the Rev. J. R. Beard, D.D., collections were made in behalf of the Sunday school connected with Lord-street chapel, amounting, with a donation of ten shillings received the following day, to the handsome sum of £31. 16s. 4d. The chapel had been cleaned and painted previously, and presented a much improved appearance.

CORRESPONDENCE.

CHELTEMHAM: A CORRECTION.

To the Editors.—My attention has been called to a remark of the Rev. Wm. James, at the recent meeting of the Western Unitarian Christian Union, at Clifton, as reported in your last impression, that "he (Mr. James) hoped Mr. Beard would not suppose they were spending all their means on small places; on the contrary, the larger amount of their income has been spent in helping Cheltenham and Devonport." In this I think there must have been some misconception on the part of your reporter, as for the last sixteen years and four months, during the greatest part of which I officiated as treasurer, I can assert that no pecuniary aid was required or given from the Western Union to the Cheltenham congregation, but that in that interval the fund was benefited by contributions from certain members of it to the extent of about £50. Thinking this report might make an erroneous impression on the Unitarians as a body, I beg the insertion of this letter in your next number, and am, yours respectfully, R. KERSHAW LUMB, The Park, Cheltenham, May 19, 1868.

THE LIBERATION SOCIETY.

To the Editors.—Dr. Vance Smith gives two reasons for not joining the Liberation Society. First, he is not an Anti-state Churchman; which is reason enough. But he adds that he declines to join a society, the leaders of which are Independents and Baptists. I presume he means he would not join it, even if he approved of its object.

Many years ago a number of persons withdrew from the Bible Society, because they would not unite in it with Unitarians. These exclusives were regarded and spoken of at the time as wretchedly bigoted and intolerant.

Pray tell me, would it be right to apply such epithets now to Dr. Vance Smith?

Again, as to this prospective, comprehensive Church Establishment, I would ask a question. If the clergyman of a parish, a conscientious, learned, and inquiring man, embraces and zealously preaches opinions which his equally conscientious parishioners regard as spiritual poison, and will on no account listen to, or suffer their families to listen to, so that his church becomes a desert, compared with which an Established Protestant Church in Connaught or Tipperary is crowded—tell me, are the tithes still to go to him, or is the State still to pay him? and are his parishioners to be deprived of their church, and left without further religious instruction? JOSEPH CALLOW MEANS.

THE ESTABLISHED CHURCH AND ORTHODOX DISSENTERS.

To the Editors.—Will you allow me space to expose what appears to me a fallacy in Dr. Smith's comparison of the theory and practice of the Orthodox Dissenters, in relation to their own congregations, with their advocacy of religious equality for the nation as a whole?

A Dissenting congregation, or sect, is a voluntary association. No man is asked to join it or contribute to it unless he chooses. If its members think fit to constitute it on the principle of close communion or doctrinal trust-deeds, they have a perfect right to do so. As long as they neither infringe on our liberty, nor in any way commit us to an approval of their proceedings, we have no reason to complain, whatever we may think of the wisdom of their course. A national Church, on the other hand, supported by national funds, and sanctioned by national legislation, deals with the rights of every citizen, and, alike in theory and in fact, interferes with his personal action and privileges. To say we will not act, in questions of national politics, with any men whose notions as to congregational organisation are different from our own, is as reasonable as to refuse to co-operate in a philanthropic scheme with a neighbour because we think he fails in the proper management of his domestic concerns.

Until it can be proved that members of the Liberation Society have shown some sectarian narrowness or illiberality in regard to its rules and conduct, it is not desirable that Unitarians should evince these unamiable characteristics in writing and speaking of their brother Nonconformists.—Yours faithfully, JOHN WRIGHT.

LONDON DOMESTIC MISSION.

At the ANNUAL MEETING, held at University Hall, Gordon Square, on the 25th May, 1868:

Rev. JOHN JAMES JAYSON, in the chair;

the following Resolutions were passed:

Moved by the CHAIRMAN, and seconded by Mr. W. A. CASE: That the reports of the treasurer and committee be received and adopted, and together with the reports of the missionaries be printed and circulated.

Moved by Mr. WORSLEY, and seconded by Mr. DAVID MARTINEAU:

That the thanks of the Society be given to the Rev. William James for his earnest and impressive appeal on behalf of the Mission, in the services of yesterday.

Moved by the Rev. W. JAMES, and seconded by the Rev. J. MARTINEAU:

That this meeting would express to the missionaries its grateful sense of the value of their services and sympathy with them in their labours, and its best wishes that health and strength may be granted to them for the efficient discharge of the arduous and trying duties of their life.

Moved by the Rev. J. C. MEANS, and seconded by Mr. F. NETTLEFOLD:

That this meeting offers its thanks to those who, by teaching in the Sunday schools or evening classes, or by taking part in the management of the libraries and other institutions, have assisted in promoting the work of the Mission.

Moved by the Rev. T. L. MARSHALL, and seconded by Mr. T. SMITH (CLERK):

That this meeting rejoices to hear the satisfactory report of the present condition of the day schools, and trusts that they may prove powerful instruments for the moral and religious as well as the mental training of the young.

Moved by Mr. E. J. NETTLEFOLD, and seconded by Mr. E. B. SQUIRE:

That the following gentlemen be the officers for the ensuing year:

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

Cardinal Andrea, the leading Liberal in the Roman Conclave, has been removed out of the reach of Jesuit malice and spite. From the reputation which Antonelli ("il Cardinale Diavolo") generally bears in Rome, and reminiscences of the way in which objects of priestly dislike have often been got rid of there, the suddenness and opportuneness of the cardinal's death has not unnaturally caused it to be whispered in Italy that he came unfairly to his end. And in one sense, at least, this is true. Having gone to Naples, his native city, for his health, he was cited to Rome on pain of degradation. There he was subjected to the various forms of insult and humiliation with which ecclesiastical hatred visits those whom it is unable to punish in other ways; and though he was evidently sick and declining, his heartless enemies would not consent to his return to Naples, which was his only chance of recovery, till a day or two before his decease, and the result is that they have been relieved of the fears which his liberalism excited, and have had the satisfaction of hearing the Pope pronounce a benediction over his coffin. They certainly have odd ways of doing things in the Holy City. Some few hours after his death there appeared a communiqué in the Osservatore declaring that he was never in better health. Some in Rome maintained that this was Jesuitic irony, and urged that another communiqué ought at once to follow, assuring the public that the Cardinal had obtained the desired permission to return to Naples.

Mr. Adderley, as Under-Secretary for the Colonies, has submitted a bill to Parliament "to relieve the Consolidated Fund from the charge of future bishops, archdeacons, ministers, and other persons in the West Indies"—in other words, to provide for the disestablishment and disendowment of the Colonial Church there.

It is stated that the Archbishop of Dublin, in compliance with the wishes of many hundreds of the Irish clergy, has determined to summon the Synod of his Province to meet on the 1st and 2nd of September, not, as hitherto, pro forma, but to consult with his brethren and the elected clergy, upon "urgent and difficult cases concerning the state and defence of the Church of Ireland."

The resumption of the adjourned debate on Mr. Coleridge's University Tests Bill stands for the 1st of July, but there is no chance now of its passing through Parliament this year.

A Congregation was held the other day at Oxford for the promulgation of a new form of statute, the chief object of which was to abrogate compulsory attendance at college services and sermons. Dr. Pusey was for retaining the requirement of attendance, but for abolishing the fines. Professor Conington, who objected to the clause forbidding attendance at dissenting chapels and private meetings for religious purposes, said he did not feel strongly on the former point, but the latter was wholly unsuited to the genius of the times and could not be enforced. Dr. Heurtley, in reply, said he thought it might be desirable to stop private meetings for religious purposes, if such should be held by Jesuits or Socinians. Dr. Daniel thought the statute did not go far enough, and that it should be understood that, important as religion was, the University had nothing to do with it. The Principal of Jesus College said such a declaration as that should not be suffered to pass without a formal protest. Whatever Parliament, in its omnipotence, might be about to do, for the present at any rate the University was a religious institution. Mr. Wickham thought any attempt to enforce the clause objected to would simply lead persons to declare themselves "extra Ecclesiam Anglicanam," and asked whether it was wished to drive men into Dissent. Mr. Thorley contended that the most offensive portion of the statute—that which was an insult to half the nation—had been retained, and objected strongly to the House being "dragged through the mud" by the Council.

At the last meeting of the Church Association, which has a guarantee fund of £42,000 for the payment of parliamentary and legal expenses incurred in opposing Ritualism, the question of most interest apparently was that of attendance at the next Church Congress, on which there was much division of opinion. If Evangelicals do not attend these meetings, they are taunted with being afraid to face the Ritualists; and if they do attend, they are snubbed, and hissed, and abused. It was felt, therefore, that they must either stop away altogether, when their opponents would have it all their own way, or they must go in a body and back one another up. The Rev. J. C. Ryle expressed his intention of going to the next in Dublin, because of his deep sympathy with the Irish Church, but to no other, for last year, at Norwich, he found himself in very doubtful company, being within two of Dr. Pusey at dinner, and the reflection constantly kept recurring, "Am I right in being here?"

In a speech at Leicester, last week, Dr. Cumming said that, while in other countries Romanism was "dying down to the very roots," in England there could be no doubt it was making progress. Archbishop Manning had stated that he had made 1,000 converts in Westbourne, and had admitted eleven clergymen of the Church of England within the last year into the Church of Rome. The Archbishop had also said that if the Roman Catholic Church could strike down England, the whole of Europe would be at its feet, and he was setting to work with masterly power and skill to effect this object. He had 1,600 bishops and priests working in England alone; he had also 206 convents, 40 or 50 monasteries, and 1,300 cathedrals, churches, and chapels.

The Record reports a meeting of the Scottish Reformation Society, whose chief object at present seems to be to educate and send forth upon the newspaper world 200 Protestant youths well skilled in short-hand writing, for the express purpose of counteracting "the machinations of the Jesuit newspaper reporters in the galleries of the Houses of Lords and Commons."

We are glad to have Mr. Thomas Cooper's own word for it that he is not dead, as reported in our last. He thus writes to the Lincoln Gazette:

"The Nottingham papers of Tuesday say I am dead. I can assure you I don't think it is true. I don't remember dying any day last week, though they say I died at Lincoln last Friday. 'Lord, lord,' as Falstaff says, 'how the world is given to lying!'"

The Record understands that the Select Committee on Church-rates in the Lords has unanimously affirmed the first and principal clause in the bill sent up by the Commons. The amendments which the Lord Chancellor suggested in his speech on the second reading as necessary to render the measure operative will next be considered, but the compulsory collection of church-rates may be regarded as now virtually abandoned by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, as well as by the Lower House. Of course, this is very sad in the Record's eyes.

In the debate on education at the Congregational Union, the resolution which was passed, with only two dissentients, was to the effect, that the principle of legislative recognition and aid should be accepted as the basis of future educational action. There was less agreement as to the form which the action of Government should take, but the feeling of the majority appeared to be that, while it was just and politic to maintain the present denominational ones, unsectarian schools supported from local rates were greatly to be preferred.

The General Assembly of the Church of Scotland was opened on Thursday (last week), before the Earl of Haddington, lord high commissioner, when the Rev. Dr. Barty, of Bendochy, was elected Moderator for the ensuing year. The Queen's letter, expressive of Her Majesty's continued attachment to the Church of Scotland, was read and ordered to be recorded, after which the Lord High Commissioner intimated that Her Majesty had ordered her annual gift of £2,000 to be continued for the promotion of religion in the Highlands and Islands; and expressed his hope that the decisions arrived at during the deliberations of the Assembly might tend to the true and enduring prosperity of the Church of Scotland.—The Free Church Assembly was opened on the same day, and the Rev. Mr. Nixon, of Montrose, was chosen Moderator.

The Rev. T. W. Mossman, rector of West Torrington, Lincolnshire, has established in his parish a "congregation of the Venerable Bede, to observe the holy rule of St. Benedict," and has issued the following proposal:

"I want help very, very much, to assist a poor student and candidate for holy orders in passing through Oxford. To show how very strongly I feel about this, I will promise that if any Catholic friends will help me in this matter I will make out a list of their names, and that so long as I live, and so long as the congregation of the Venerable Bede remains in existence, there shall be an offering of the Holy Eucharist weekly specially for their benefit, whether they be living or departed."

The Sunday bands opened the season in Victoria and Battersea Parks last Sunday but one. 60,000 persons are computed to have been present in the former, and between 30,000 and 40,000 in the latter.

In each park about 2,600 pence were contributed to the support of the movement.

At a meeting of the Hebrew Christian Alliance, over which the Rev. Dr. Schwartz presided, supported by the Revs. Mr. Isaacs, A. Saphir, A. D. Herschell, and several other Christian ministers of Jewish race, a report was read by Mr. Cohen, from which it appeared that branch associations of the Alliance were being formed in various parts of the world, the object being to band together all converted Jews, that they might strengthen each other's faith, and be able wisely to influence those of their countrymen who still rejected Christianity.

The following petition appears in the Church News:

"A PRIMER'S BAG.—Sir—will you kindly allow a poor priest to solicit donations from your readers towards providing himself with 'The Priest's Bag,' price ten guineas, for 'The due administration of the Holy Eucharist to the sick?' Contributions, however small, will be thankfully received and acknowledged by,—Your faithful servant, T. ELWIN J. EVERED, Incumbent of Bishopston, near Stratford-upon-Avon.—Invention of the Holy Cross, 1868." We must confess our ignorance of what "The Priest's Bag" is, though we remember that one of the apostles bore something of the kind.

Mr. Mark Firth, of Sheffield, a New Connexion Methodist, has resolved to erect and endow thirty-six almshouses, at a cost of about £24,000, on a site of two acres of land at Hanging Water, near that town, for the accommodation of twenty-four single persons, men or women, and twelve married couples. Each single inmate will receive 7s. a week, and each married couple 10s. Much as we admire Mr. Firth's generosity, we admire no less the liberal spirit which prompts him to open the charity, on certain conditions, to natives of Sheffield, without respect to their religious belief.

The Tercentenary of the Unitarian Churches in Transylvania is to be held on the 30th and 31st of August, at Torda, about ten miles from Clausenburg. The Rev. J. J. Tayler has accepted an invitation, transmitted to him and his colleagues in Manchester New College, by Bishop Kriza, and three of the professors in the College at Clausenburg, to be present on this interesting occasion, and will be the bearer of an address to our Transylvanian brethren from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

Notwithstanding the various influences which the Romish hierarchy have brought to bear upon him, the Emperor of Austria has given his sanction to the bills passed by the Reichsrath relating to schools, civil marriage, and the position of the different religious denominations. Metternich's saying that "Rome rests on Austria, and Austria rests on Rome," no longer holds good.

Some, perhaps, may feel surprise that the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland should have decided, by a majority of 211 to 81, to petition Parliament against the disestablishment of the Irish Church; but the Assembly, no doubt, has been influenced by the feeling that paries cum proximo ardet its own may be in danger.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

At a meeting of the clergy of the archdeaconry of Carlisle last week, to adopt measures in defence of the Irish Establishment, Dean Close brought Church and State into a strange "concatenation accordingly." His love for them, he said, was almost traditional. He had received it from his ancestors, who on both sides were clergymen, and though he had received from them the inheritance of the gout, he thanked them for the inheritance of the principle of Church and State.

Dr. Littledale writes to the Guardian in justification of the language of his Liverpool lecture respecting the Reformation, which we referred to a fortnight ago. He says of that great change,

"Some may look on it as a Pentecost, I look on it as a Flood, an act of Divine vengeance, not of Divine grace; a merited chastisement, not a fresh revelation."

Of the leaders in it he says,

"I gravely assert it to be impossible for any just, educated, and religious men, who have read the history of the time in genuine sources, to hold two opinions about the Reformers. They were such utterly unredemmed villains, for the most part, that the only parallel I know for the way in which half-educated people speak of them among us, is the appearance of Pontius Pilate among the saints of the Abyssinian Kalendar."

He admits that his "parallel with the Jacobin leaders was somewhat harsh and unjust—to them." For, he adds,

"They betrayed no trust, were not sharers in the particular iniquity they overthrew, crouched to no tyrant, perjured themselves to no man. So far they stand on a higher moral level than the base traitors who were, and deservedly, executed—blunder and folly as that execution was—by Mary I. I should have compared them with Egalité Orleans and St. Huruge, the basest of that bad 18th century."

The Guardian thinks it is a misfortune for himself, if not for his friends also, that Lord Shaftesbury cannot give an opinion on religious subjects without bullying. In common with many persons of different schools, he takes a serious view of the present condition of affairs in the Church; but the only remedy for it which he will allow to be discussed is his own. It is his practice to declare the Church of England lost whenever his wishes are not immediately acted upon. Incapable of seeing the possibility that any one but himself can be in the right, he lectures men, who are at least as good judges as himself of what is fit to be done, with an assumption of superiority which, if it were not excused as a constitutional failing, would be offensive to the last degree. It may suit Lord Shaftesbury's pedagogic temperament to tell his hearers that anything he disapproves of "will not do." But the peers are not schoolboys, and will not be guided by an adviser who deals with them as though they were. And for its own part, the Guardian, when it feels inclined to put itself under the ferula, will look out for a school-master who shows more inclination than Lord Shaftesbury has shown to hear before he strikes.

Punch says:

"It would seem that the expression, 'One in a thousand,' may fairly be applied to the Protestant population of some Irish parishes where the Established Church is maintained."

In his address at the Congregational Union, Dr. Raleigh combated the notion that it was enough to desire to believe the facts of the Gospel, and said:

"The great central truths of Christianity must be true or false. They are 'worthy of all acceptance,' or of decisive reprobation and rejection. Nor was it right, or consistent with the scientific spirit, to allow this question to remain in abeyance, laying the flattering unction to the soul, that, at least, the doubts entertained concerning it were honest. Surely the very air is, by this time, weary of hearing that—

'There lives more faith in honest doubt,
Believe me, than in half the creeds.'

I have an 'honest doubt' of that, and, therefore, I won't believe you; and there lives more faith in my honest doubt, believe me, than in all that creed. Doubt, even regarding these great facts, may be honest for a while. Honest it cannot continue to be, if the doubter is not meanwhile earnestly seeking its solution."

The Rev. H. S. Pinder sends the following account to the Guardian of what took place in a diocese under eclipse:

"Six clergymen and about 100 young people were assembled in a North Devon church waiting for a bishop to confirm. Shortly after appeared at the west door two persons, followed by a woman and girl (!) bearing a tin box, supposed to contain robes. On emerging from the gloom of the porch they were discovered to be a colonial bishop and his chaplain. At the same moment the incumbent of the church entered by the chancel door and crossed to the vestry, into which vanished for a time the bishop and his attendant. The service was most impressively read, and a plain but most edifying address delivered with much feeling by the bishop. All ended, the bishop disappeared into the vestry, and the clergy dispersed with their several candidates. No word passed between the bishop and any one of the clergy. They were as if they had never met before, and never would meet again. This is the third triennial exhibition of the kind which I have witnessed in the same church."

Our readers have had several specimens lately of the amiable treatment which the organs of High and Low give to one another. The other week, one of the former spoke of "the nauseous petroleum that flows from the Rock." Our Evangelical contemporary thankfully accepts the oily compliment, and says, taking rock oil, we suppose, instead of castor oil, when needed:

"It is the light which our petroleum sheds, we fear, which hurts the blinking eyes of these church owls; and as for its flavour, what good medicine is not nauseous?"

The Rev. P. W. Clayden has an interesting and instructive article in the Contemporary Review, on "The Ecclesiastical Organisation of English Dissent." He shows that "among the forces which are shaping the ecclesiastical future of this country, the Nonconformists occupy a most important place," and that their influence is likely to increase. He points out that the organisation of the Established Church is a foreign importation, and Presbyterianism a half-foreign one; whereas Congregationalism and Methodism were born in England, and grow naturally from the soil. This is one of the facts to which the aristocratic classes have hitherto shut their eyes, and they do not understand the democratic side of our national religious life, nor its supreme importance to our ecclesiastical future. Mr. Clayden then enters into a minute description of the organisation of Independent churches, and after dwelling on the demarcation which is made between church members and congregation members, he comes to the conclusion that, as culture more and more permeates the middle classes, such a distinction will cease to exist.

In a striking speech at the Congregational Union breakfast, Mr. Spurgeon, among other good things, had the following:

"I am not sure that the habit of getting down-cast and complaining of one's self is altogether a good one. 'The joy of the Lord is your strength.' It is delightful at Venice to hear the gondoliers singing as they row. Let us serve the Lord with gladness. We ought to tug at the oar and sing at the same time. Stopping near a lake in Italy one Monday morning, I heard the thundering of the cannon from various parts of the coast, and by-and-by, when I went down to the beach and looked around, I observed that in the middle of the lake there stood an island on which was the cathedral. From every quarter of the coast of the lake, around which small towns were dotted, I saw white boats coming. They looked very beautiful indeed. There was a procession of boats, with a big cross in front, and all converging to one centre; and as the oars kept time with each other, the people on the boats all sang the same chant, which was rather monotonous, it is true, but still it was exceedingly musical in its rhythm, as they came nearer, and nearer, and nearer, all to meet around the island, and then to march up to the shrine to worship. I thought it was very like the entire Christian church—various bodies of Christians coming from various quarters of this great sea of Providence—rowing and singing, and hoping all to meet in the one great church above, where they shall worship God, even the Father. But to sing as you pull the oar is a grand thing. I am sure it is that gladness, that 'oil of gladness,' that keeps the machinery from creaking."

According to a statement made in the House, on Monday, by Mr. Milner Gibson, the late Ashton riots were not so much owing to the lecturer Murphy as to a tea party, given by the Protestant Electoral Union, at which the Rev. Tresham Gregg and the clergy of the district assisted. Mr. Gregg described himself as holding a valuable Irish living—with which, unhappily, no clerical duties were connected—and who, in consequence, devoted his whole time and thoughts to the extinction of Popery all over the world. The president of the tea party opened its proceedings by putting on "an Orangeman's hat" to add to the dignity of his appearance, and there was an immense display of Orange favours on the occasion. The next day the streets of Ashton were filled with persons flaunting orange emblems in the face of the Irish Roman Catholic population, and upon this they donned their national green, and a fight naturally ensued. Mr. Gibson strongly condemned the clergy of Ashton for having identified themselves with such men as Tresham Gregg and Murphy. Mr. Whalley, in reply, disclaimed all connection with the Union, and declared that he had held no communication with Murphy for the last nine months, but added that he believed that "a more honest, truthful, and accurate man in statements had never appeared as a lecturer on religious topics." Mr. Whalley's ideas on honesty, truth, and accuracy appear to be of a most ultra-liberal character.

On the claims made by the Roman Catholic prelates in reference to University education, the Northern Whig says:

"No British Government, whoever may be the members composing it, can concede what Archbishop Leahy asks. These demands are made not for, but against, the Irish Roman Catholic people. The Roman Catholic laity, who are declared authoritatively to be without judgment or voice in the education of their children, ought surely to show some sense of the treatment to which it is proposed to subject them. Not to protest against this ecclesiastical despotism is to deserve it."

At a meeting in Preston on Monday last, among other wild things, the Vicar indulged in the following:—

"Nor do the people pay the tithes to the clergy in England; they receive very little from the people; what they do receive is from ceremonies which they celebrate for them. The people pay something for marriage, and those people are only too glad to pay when they are going to be married. They do not pay for baptism, which is a sacrament of God. Mark that: a clergyman never charges a fee for administering a sacrament. You pay for the interments of your friends, when your hearts are bleeding for the loss, but you pay a very small pittance indeed, and that charge is regulated by the law itself, so that it shall not be oppressive to anybody, and I think nobody objects to it. Well, you know you did pay here; you don't now—you have not paid for two or three years, but you did pay me 6d., some of you. Well, you see, I can now smile over that, though it is a heavy loss to me; because, you know, when those little were put together they made up a good sum; you know I have plenty of children, and a lot of grand-children; I have just got an importation in my house of a daughter and six children, all at once; so that you see I might well be very sore about not getting that £150 or £200 which I might have got if the Easter Dues had gone on. All that the clergy get, upon which they really live, is what was given to them in ancient times, and what they enjoy now by a prescription of 300 years. They are not paid one farthing by the State, nor by the people; they enjoy an inheritance of their own. Now, I cannot help thinking that a Suspensory Act for Mr. Gladstone himself might be desirable. Well, it would not do to lynch him, I am afraid; but still I should like to hang him without hurting him, if I could."

A circular addressed by the East Worcestershire Liberal Election Committee, in the ordinary course of convass, to the Rev. W. Laing, incumbent of Langley, has elicited the following reply:

"That Mr. C. G. Lyttelton should solicit a vote from me—a clergyman of the United Church of England and Ireland—as an avowed supporter of Mr. Gladstone's policy, and in particular as regards the Irish Church, appears to me one of the strange things of these times. I can only say that I look upon Mr. Gladstone's policy with horror, and my daily prayer to Almighty God is that he will bring to nothing the foolish and wicked counsels of all such misguided men."

OLD TESTAMENT CHAPTERS FOR THE SUNDAY SCHOOL.—No. 6.

SUBJECT: The Hebrew writers make a frequent use of the feelings of the heart to arouse the conscience and to guide it. Read Nathan's parable of the little ewe lamb, 2nd Sam., xii. 1—7, and point out how King David's anger is kindled at the wicked injustice of the rich man in the fable, and his pity drawn forth by the poor man's loss of his only treasure. Presently, when his own conduct is thrown into the same light as that he has so warmly blamed, his slumbering conscience is awakened, and he is touched with remorse, and acknowledges his fault.

For a similar attempt to quicken the sense of right by an appeal to other of the human feelings, read Deut. xxiv., 17—22, where the Israelites are commanded to be indulgent to the stranger, the fatherless, and the widow, for "thou shalt remember that thou wast a bondman in Lower Egypt, and Jehovah thy God redeemed thee from thence; therefore I command thee to do this thing."

Again, a passage very much like this last will be found in Leviticus xix., 33, 34, where the stranger that sojourns among the Hebrew people is to be treated well, and is to be loved by them as themselves, "for ye were strangers in the land of Lower Egypt."

REVIEWS.

Faith and Works. By the Rev. W. A. O'Connor, B.A., of Trinity College, Dublin, Rector of SS. Simon and Jude, Manchester. Saunders, Otley, and Co., London.

THE writer of this little book does not, we believe, count himself a member of the "Broad Church." The book itself proves that he is a member of the true Catholic church of Christ, for it breathes that spirit which, whosoever possesses, "is of His." If we are not much mistaken, the author may lay his account with being reckoned as belonging to the respectable society of heretics, on the strength of this book. If some, at least, of the utterances therein contained have not a heterodox savour our scent is gone. The author is one, however, who will bear such a fate, should it befall him, without shrinking, though he will hardly court it. To us this little work is of value, because, setting out from a thoroughly "Protestant" standing point its author asserts, with much force and frequent beauty of style, the true inseparable oneness in a Christian sense, and to the Christian soul, of "Faith and Works;" and quails not at affirming what is commonly known as faith to be worthless unless accompanied, sealed, and certified by deeds. We welcome from all quarters, the more gladly the more diverse they are from our usual bearings, whatever proves that the various branches of the visible church spring from the same stem, are growth of the true vine, have the same vital sap circulating in them. We always maintain that this oneness of heart, this sameness of inner meaning, exists in all faithful and true minds that have learned of Jesus Christ, however differently as they think; and we always assert that no differences in forms of thought are of moment when compared with this oneness of heart. The root of the matter seems to us to be in one who says (p. 68): "It is true that a man is justified who believes in a God who has made provision for sin and shortcoming, when he strives to be perfect and fails; but it is not true that a man is justified who does not work, because he believes in a God who justifies those who do not work, or who in any degree designedly substitutes reliance on God's mercy for obedience to God's laws. God can take the earnest effort, and treat it as if it were success; but man must not separate the atonement of Christ from the example of Christ in such a way as to make regard for the one compensate for neglect of the other." The chapter on "Justification by Faith" has many other striking passages. If some of them show to us the field of our author's intellectual vision crossed here and there by the rigid bars of "Protestant" dogma, they also show those bars more luminous, if not yet melted away, by the fire of Christian love. The most eloquent and the most valuable chapter seems to us the fourth, "Forgiving the test of being forgiven." Our own sainted Channing would embrace the man who says "Jesus . . . teaches us that pardon or deliverance is not a formal and final sentence, that it is not an absolute and arbitrary fiat of omnipotence fixing the pardoned as God's people forever, irrespective of their moral condition, but that it is a mode of treatment, an application of a remedy, a patient, tender, long-suffering method employed by God towards man, and showing itself to be complete and successful when it produces in the delivered the spirit of the act of the Great Deliverer." If this be Calvinism, we are Calvinists too!

Nocturnal Sermons, No. 4: Mother Church's Proposal for National Reconciliation. By the Archbishop of Oneiropolis.

THE writer of this sermon can hardly have so poor an idea of Dissenters, some whose ministers he graciously admits "have honourably taken their degrees," as to imagine that they are likely to be dislodged from their daily strengthening position by such light-winged shafts as he here lets fly at it. Even when they reach their mark, they do but tickle, and mostly the least whiff of thought is enough to press them aside.

The proposal which he has to make, on behalf of Mother Church, is for "comprehension." His arguments, if such they can be called, in favour of this, which he regards as "simply a question of expediency," are too slight to require examination; but our readers may like to see a few passages, showing the kind of sermons that are preached in Oneiropolis or Dreamland.

But for the object which he avows, the Archbishop might be suspected of indulging in a little covert irony when he thus describes the Establishment as having become so broad that there is really nothing to dissent from:

"Mother Church has grown so indulgent that all her children may think and say just what they please. There's not a single conceivable conscience that now suffers the least inconvenience. Mother Church used to be very strait-laced and imperious; at one time she was always using the rod, and even turning her children out of doors; but all that has changed. Even our dear old Mother has grown wiser."

Not only has she "become all things to all men," "so that you may be as catholic or contracted, as æsthetic or tasteless as you please," but "as to doctrine likewise, the variety is exhaustive."

"You can't fail to be fitted with your special orthodoxy. We have our Rev. Thunder Blasts and Forked Lightnings for the lovers of the gospel of damnation; and our Rev. Silver Tongues for the believers in the gospel of peace; and our Rev. Cloudy Mists for the nebulous and transcendental; and our Rev. Mathematical Demonstrations for the solution of all the problems of spiritual, supernatural, and moral phenomena; and our Rev. Shifty Bottoms for such as delight in the uncertainty of never knowing where they are; and our Rev. Grub Moles, who are always burrowing under the foundation of things; and our Rev. Icebergs for the refrigeration of all enthusiasm; and our Rev. Leger Demains, who can transmute everything, however unreasonable and repulsive, into truth, beauty, and beneficence; indeed, time would fail us to show how many-sided dear Mother Church has become, and how wisely and generously flexible she now is to the spirit of the age."

His Grace admits that Dissenters may see some little difficulties in the way of conformity, but he undertakes to show that they are unreal ones, and that an Established Church has great advantages "over what is shaky and always exposed to change and decay." For instance, he says:

"You shake your head at Bishops. You say your ministers must be independent men, subject to no official dictation. Now, look you, are your ministers independent men, subject to no official dictation? You have an order of lay Deacons, among whom there is generally an Arch-Deacon. Is your minister independent of him?"

Then there is subscription to articles of religion. You can't stand that:

"But you do stand it. You have your articles of religion tacitly agreed upon if not expressed. You know who is sound and who is not sound in the faith. You only tolerate your preacher so long as he preaches your particular orthodoxy. . . . The Thirty-nine Articles, too, can be no obstacle to you, as you will not be asked to sign them; and as for your ministers, they might sign a hundred and thirty-nine now, for they may sign them in what sense they please. They may even sign them as having no sense at all—as sheer nonsense. Ex animo means now, according to every one's mind: that's the latest ecclesiastical decision about subscribing the Articles. There's an end, therefore, of that difficulty."

Again, you talk very loudly about liberty of conscience:

"But neither you nor your ministers dare deny a single article of your unwritten and jealously-guarded creed. You have your heretics and black sheep. That boast about liberty of conscience is all fiddle-de-dee."

No doubt Mother Church has her heresy-hunters too, but "she takes care to put them to considerable trouble and expense in the pursuit of their game," and "has made up her mind to respect conscience in future."

In his scheme of "comprehension," the Oneiropolitan prelate wishes it to be distinctly understood he includes all Nonconformists, even those whom some call heretics and refuse to associate with:

"The Unitarians, for example, those arithmetical arch-heretics of whom Dryden—but he was a Papist, you know—under the image of a fox, thus contemptuously speaks:

"With greater guile,
False Reynard fed on consecrated spoil;
The graceless beast by Athanasius first
Was chased from Nice; then, by Socinus nursed:
New swarming sects to this obliquely tend,
Hence they began, and here they all will end."

We don't observe any of them here to-day. They, you know, are a very respectable class of Dissenters, a little stuck-up, starched, and self-conceited, not very congenial, and perhaps a little vulgar in their affectation of respectability, but for all that they are an intelligent and estimable body of people. We have often wondered that they, with their pride of respectability, can tolerate Dissent. Dissent—excuse our plainness—is not a very respectable thing. Well, we propose to take them into the bosom of the Church, indeed many of them are in already; and as their ministers are generally well-educated gentlemen, and they like the frigid zone of religious life, we'll consent to ordain all their ministers, and convert their ice-houses into chapels of ease, where all the arctic spirituality of our great ecclesiastical commonwealth may find a congenial habitat and freeze in peace."

How far the Arch-bishop fairly hits us here may be worth considering; but as regards the rest of his discourse, we can say "our withers are unwrung."

EXPLORATIONS ROUND SINAI.

At the last meeting of the Geographical Society, the Rev. F. W. Holland, son of the member for Evesham, read an interesting paper on his explorations in the peninsula of Sinai during last winter, which was his third visit to the country for the same purpose. Dispensing with a dragoman, he adopted the independent mode of traversing the district on foot, and was engaged for four months in exploring, from Mount Sinai as a centre, the numerous hills and valleys, at the same time taking the heights of the former, and mapping out the intricacies of the latter. Making the monastery at the foot of the Mount his headquarters, at sunrise every morning he was awoke by the clanging of the pieces of iron and wooden boards used as bells to call the monks to service; and, after making his fire and cooking his breakfast, let himself down by a rope from his little room at the top of the convent, and commenced alone his daily explorations, depending on Arab ibex hunters for his information of mountain paths, the monks and their servants knowing nothing of the country beyond their walls. In his more distant excursions he took an Arab to carry his blanket and a bag of provisions, and slept out, sometimes, for three or four nights. He found, contrary to what he was led to expect, two or three springs of water on every important mountain in the neighbourhood and considerable vegetation, even at the end of a long dry season. With regard to the probable route of the Israelites and the sites of events in sacred history, he had come to the following conclusions:—After crossing the Red Sea somewhere in the neighbourhood of Suez, he thought the Israelites took the lower road down the plain along the coast as far as Ain Szouweira, which might perhaps mark the locality of Marah. They then turned inland to Alim, which he would place at Ain Howara. Their next encampment was by the sea, probably near the mouth of Wady Ghurundel, the most fertile place in the peninsula. The Wilderness of Sin he would identify with the plain of Es Seyn, and not with the desert plains of Merkha, as generally believed. From this their route would lie by Dophkah and Alusk, and afterwards up the Wady Es Sheikh to the Repidim, the site of which, after careful examination, he fixed at Mokad Musa, a narrow gorge in a long unbroken wall of granite, which stretches across the centre of the peninsula, and ten miles north of Jebel Musa. He was inclined to think that Jebel Um Alowee (possibly a corruption of Eloheem), a previously unknown mountain north-east of Jebel Musa, was the true Mount Sinai. The plain at the foot affords a much larger camping ground than that at the foot of what is now called Mount Sinai. In conclusion, he entered a protest against the theory that Sinaitic inscriptions were the work of the children of Israel; he had copied some hundreds of them, and found not a single point in favour of such a theory.

WHITSUNTIDE.

WHITSUNTIDE is come again—the season looked forward to by the young people of our Sunday schools through all the year, as one of joy and brightness. It is to those who toil one of their rare holidays in the long year. It is to our lasses, especially, the time for budding forth like the flowers in their new spring dresses; and it is the time for social gatherings and pleasant excursions to sea-side or woodland scenery—to grand cathedrals, the works of man, or to mountains, the works of God. We would say a word or two "to improve the occasion," as our Puritan forefathers were accustomed to phrase it.

And first, we would speak to our young people. We heartily sympathise with them in their joy. We bid them rejoice—to be as happy as possible. But we would point out to them that they will be happier the more they lay themselves out to make others happy. Go to your social gathering, we would say, or on your excursion, thinking only of your own comfort, thinking only how much enjoyment for yourself you can "grab" from the whole thing, and you will come home disappointed, complaining, perhaps disgusted. You got the wrong place; the tea was bad; the speeches stupid; the whole affair dull. There was nothing to amuse you. Or in the excursion the journey was too long; it was too hot, or too cold, or too dusty. The place you went to was uninteresting; or you were sulky because you were outvoted, and could not have your own way and go somewhere else. But go with the genial feeling of gladness to meet others; go with the self-forgetting desire to contribute to the happiness of others, and you will find happiness for yourself. There is no occasion in the year when there is more opportunity and more need for our young people to exercise the spirit of ladies and gentlemen. And let no one smile at the application of the words "ladies and gentlemen" to the young people of our Sunday schools. These schools ought to turn out real ladies and gentlemen. They ought to be the nurseries for these, dare we say, "minor" Christian graces of courtesy and willingness to please, and helpfulness, and patience, and forbearance, which contribute so much to the happiness of daily life, as well as for the sterner virtues. We remember in times past seeing a number of scholars entering an excursion train. Some of the elder girls were getting into a carriage, when a lot of the elder boys—young men, indeed—rushed upon them, pushed them aside by main strength, causing one to fall from the step, laughing with a brutal laugh at their triumph. We think such a scene would be scarcely possible now, even in our roughest districts. But we would not have anything whatever of the same spirit. Especially we would ask the elder scholars to look after the younger ones, and help to make their happiness somewhat their care.

And we have a word to say to our young people as regards their moral conduct on these occasions. It cannot be denied that there is temptation for the young in these festive meetings and excursions. From the beginning of the world, when a number of young persons of similar ages have got together, their spirits have had a tendency to rise, to make them a little giddy, and incite them to acts of wildness of which, at other times, their cooler judgment would be ashamed. Let us beg our young people to be aware of these temptations, and go prepared to hold themselves well in hand, and resist even the appearance of evil. Let them remember that they have not only their own character and good name to maintain, but that the honour of their school, and, to some extent, that of the church with which they are connected, is in their keeping.

And now a word to the more educated and wealthy of our congregations. We wish anything we could say would induce more of them to come among the young people of our Sunday schools at this season. It is astonishing what a great amount of good they might do at the cheap expenditure of a little time and courtesy, by mingling more in the social gatherings and excursions of Whitsuntide. This is not a slight matter. Our wealthier and more cultured people would thus convince the poorer class, of which our schools consist, that they care for them, take an interest in them, think them worth a little attention, and have an interest in their school. And to plant these convictions in the minds of the young people would not only make them happier, and raise them in their own self-respect, but would tend to cement the two classes together, would make our churches stronger, would bind the young people more warmly to our congregations, and give them the opportunities which—in Lancashire at least—they are ever quick to embrace, to learn from the culture and refinement of those who have enjoyed greater advantages than themselves.

THE LONDON ANNIVERSARIES.

WE desire to call the attention of our friends to the series of meetings to be held in London next week, and to ask as many ministers and laymen as are able to show their interest in them by their attendance. The General Baptists hold their meetings at Worship-street Chapel on Monday and Tuesday; and on Wednesday morning the forty-third anniversary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association will commence at Little Portland-street Chapel, when Dr. BELLINGS, of New York, is to preach the sermon. The Association in time past has done valuable work for Christian truth and justice, and the least our congregations can do is, by lay and ministerial deputies, to give it all the encouragement in their power. In the afternoon of the same day, at Radley's Hotel, under the presidency of JAMES YATES, Esq., M.A., the London District Unitarian Society will hold its meeting; and at the same place, on Thursday morning, the Conference of the Sunday-school Association will take place. This year there will be a brief report from the committee, and afterwards a short paper will be read by SAMUEL SHARPE, Esq., author of a new translation of the Scriptures, and various other works, "On raising the education in Sunday schools." Then in the afternoon at the Crystal Palace, the collation in connection with the British and Foreign Association will be held, under the presidency of GEORGE BUCKTON, Esq. Such of our friends as can make it convenient to attend, we are sure, will find a cordial welcome, and it would be advisable for them to intimate to the committee their intention to be present, as we see it is proposed to keep, during the anniversaries, a register of visitors at the office of the Association, 178, Strand.

FIRESIDE READINGS.

HENRY BROUGHAM.

BORN SEPTEMBER 19, 1778; DIED MAY 7, 1868.

A GRAND old tree has fallen! Can it be
That with so little stir it has come down?
That in the forest scarce a gap we see
For loss of that great trunk and reverend crown?
Gaunt, grey, with vice-like roots and gnarled knees,
A green leaf here and there on some tough limb,
That once had growth and girth for many trees,
He stood: no passer-by but noted him,
Wond'ring to gauge his wreck, and learn his age,
And hear how broad was once the shade he cast;
With what defiant port he faced the rage
Of storms, when weaker growths gave to the blast.
He lived and lived—from hot youth to hoar old,
From flush of leaf to bareness of green bough:
A giant in decay, that still upheld
A shrunken strength, and weight of furrowed brow.

Until at last we heard he was laid low;
Not by the stroke of storm or levin sped,
In still Provencal night, and May moon's glow,
When none was by, he bowed his ancient head.
The peaceful death to close the restless life,
The quiet eve to crown the stormy day!
Such should be the success from noble strife,
So should a well-spent being ebb away.
As he lies thus,—ere earth to earth is given,
We trace back his long life, and find it knit
With all wherein our century has striven, Stirred, spoken, reared, o'erthrown, fought,
wrought, or writ.
The ninety-year-old man was part of all,
Great part of most that's worthiest and best:
Through that long race the oar he scarce let fall,
Scarce through that long day's work paused once to rest.

It was a time of tempest and of toil,
An age of battle with all forms of ill,
Ill that brought strength to crush, and fraud to foil,
Delay to sicken, and contempt to chill.

Bias of honour, place, wealth, worldly good,
Drew all away; he would not so be drawn.
Truth and Right's soldier from the first he stood,
And in the thickest darkness looked for dawn.

Count all the triumphs in these fifty years
By Right and Truth o'er wrong and falsehood won;
Of the Good Cause's Paladins and Peers,
A faithful that Henry Brougham is none.
He lived through all those fights, and seemed to grow

Tenser and tougher with their wear and tear;
And when the strife was done, and the sun low,
And "age brought honour and the silver hair,"
He could look o'er his life, and say, at last—
"No cause for which I fought now counts a foe;
No goal I made for but is reached and past;
No ill I aimed a blow at but lies low."

A fighter born, with fighter's work in hand,
He had the fighter's weak points with the strong;
Hot, vehement to rashness, never bland,
In hates, as loves, too sudden oft and strong;
Vain, quick of temper, proud of all he knew,
As who that knew so much but might be proud,
By all he had done, and all he hoped to do—

Lifted, his great head's height, above the crowd?
Why note what flaws may be in such a fame?
Freer of flaws than his the fames are few;
Sum up the gains to which he linked his name;—
What nobler work did ever statesman do?

The senate purged; charity's stream strained pure;
Slaves freed; chicane and bigotry put down;
Knowledge on ignorance gaining, slow but sure:
This was his life's work, is his memory's crown?

THE WINDOW THAT MADE FACES UGLY.

PART VI.

It was some time before poor Harry could escape from the impression that his dream was a reality, or desist from the frightened screams which had startled the household. Nurse looked very much terrified; but the father, comprehending what she had been doing, gently, but firmly, put her from the room, and then set himself to help the mother in soothing their poor child. As soon as Harry was fully awake, and could understand that it was but a dream, Mr. Warner began to tell him to try to forget what nurse had been saying, for it was all a delusion—a doctrine borrowed from dark, ignorant, heathen times; that there was no such place; no such eternal torment; no such angry God as had been haunting his mind. It required, however, the soothing efforts of both father and mother during the greater part of the day, assisted for a time by the doctor, to bring back the child to his usual placid condition. At last, however, they succeeded, and the subject was allowed to rest for many days.

When he was strong and calm enough to have the matter renewed, Mr. Warner called nurse into Harry's room—Mrs. Warner was already there—and said, "Nurse, you have thought fit to make our child hear your view, and now I must beg you to sit down and listen quietly while I give him my view of God's dealing with His sinful children. I will not speak harshly to you for suggesting such terrible thoughts to the poor child. I know you did it, as you thought, for the best, only I am sorry you could think so."

"I am sure, sir," said nurse, "no one felt more for the darling's sufferings than I did; and I may be wrong, but it seemed to me that we must not spare the weak flesh when the salvation of the soul is at stake."

"Well, listen," said Mr. Warner, "and perhaps before I have done you may suspect that it is not necessary to punish the flesh, as you have done, to save the soul. I was brought up, then, to believe as you believe, that God was a stern and wrathful Being, who condemned millions and millions of his children to unspeakable torments through all eternity. Sunday after Sunday I heard the doctrine preached at church and chapel. At the same time I was told that I ought to love God. I tried to love Him. But how could I love a Being presented to me as the most unlovable, most hateful Being? No; I said in my prayers that I loved Him; I tried to fancy that I loved Him; but now I know that in reality I feared and hated Him. I was in one sense very religious; I always had God in my thoughts; I could not forget Him. I was afraid to forget Him. It was my fortune to have for a grandfather a very cold, hard, severe old man. I see him now, with his stern face that seemed never to smile. Of this grandfather I was terribly afraid. He had no sympathy with children; indeed, could not endure them to speak, scarcely to move about in his presence. I used to tremble, afraid to stir, while near him. I remember now the terror I had for days that he would cut out my tongue, as he threatened, because I began my childish prattle before him. I used to hear him pouring out his stern anger on my grandmother and aunt, when in some little matter they had offended him. And I think they trembled at his step and were as much afraid of him as if he were an ogre. Now, this grandfather became for years my picture of God. I thought of Him as like an old man, too, cold, hard, stern, unsympathising, angry, and unforgiving. And it is an idea of God like this that millions and millions of children are taught to hold. Was it possible for me to love such a God as this? No, I felt towards Him just as I felt towards the grandfather."

"As I grew up my mind unfolded. I was a great reader, especially I delighted in stories, whether in history, or biography, or fiction. And by and bye I noticed that all the characters which I most loved and honoured in books or life, and which were set up as being worthy to be loved, were just the very opposite to the God whom I had been taught to believe in. They were patient, gentle, unselfish, loving, forgiving, shrinking from inflicting suffering and hastening to relieve it where it existed. He was irritable, hard, selfish, stern, unforgiving, capable of inflicting the most terrible suffering in hell, and never being drawn to relieve it through eternity. Then, again, I noticed that the character I most hated, and that men in general most hated, was just in many respects such a character as that I had been taught to give to God. For example, I read in the papers of a mother beating her little child day by day—unmercifully beating her, sometimes with a hot poker; throwing scalding water over her, starving her till she was nothing but skin and bones, keeping her locked up in a cellar in darkness, filth, and squalor; so that the child was almost idiotic and a mass of ulcers from bad usage. Against such a mother a universal feeling of horror rose in the country. She was called a monster. The multitude yelled their execration at her as she was conveyed from the court to the prison, and could scarcely be prevented from tearing her to pieces. And yet the God that I was required to love and call my father was worse than this woman. He kept, not one, but millions of His children in a black cellar rolling in fire and brimstone. He had them lashed day by day by devils, until they were one mass of bruises. He starved them from every kind of joy.

"I could not make it out. I somehow took it for granted at that time that the clergy were right, and that the God who made and ruled us was as hard and cruel as they said. I wondered how it could be. And it grew year by year such an unpleasant, uncomfortable subject to think upon, that I voluntarily turned away my mind more and more from thinking upon it. I tried deliberately to forget God. Gradually I began to stay away from church and from every other place—and to keep from every book—in which I was likely to hear about Him. I lived as much as possible without God. I HAD BEEN FRIGHTENED AWAY FROM HIM. And I believe there are hundreds of thousands at the present moment living without God because they have been frightened away from Him. O, what harm—what shameful wrong—those teachers did me who filled my mind with those hard, dark thoughts of God and his ways, which for years clouded my life, hid from me the light of the Father's love; and made me a stranger to Him in that period of my existence when I needed him most. Ministers talk about infidel books and the infidel tendency of the press, as the influences that turn men away from religion and the churches. I am convinced from my own experience that the most powerful infidel influences are the teachings of ministers themselves, frightening millions away from God."

THE EPISCOPAL RIDDLE.

MR. F. T. MOTT offers the following solution of Archbishop Whately's riddle, which has been attracting so much attention, and thinks it may perhaps be the true one, because it is so bad that the archbishop may fairly have thought it safe to offer £50 for its discovery.

As down the stairs the hurrying shoals
Rush from the Ark's capacious door,
And stately men and creeping moles
Meet on the mountain's muddy floor,
While still the waves of ocean roar,
And still the distant thunder rolls;
Out speaks the venerable Noah—
"The patter-I-hark of human soles!"

AN ABYSSINIAN CATHEDRAL.

ONE of the many "correspondents" at present in Abyssinia gives the following description of a "cathedral" there:—Antalo contains about 400 houses, the inhabitants of which turned out en masse to stare upon the strange white men, the Franks (as all Europeans are called), who had come from some unknown far-off land to join in battle with the mighty Theodore. Attended by a large crowd of men, all clothed in white togas trimmed with scarlet, and with no protection to their head except their curly black hair, we rode into the centre of the town, where by the river side stands the cathedral, embosomed in a grove of lofty cypress trees. By cathedral let no one suppose that any massive pile of lofty architecture was encircled by these trees. The church is but a circular building one storey high, and roofed with thatch. It is built in three concentric circles. The innermost, or most central, is the holy place where the ark is kept, where priests alone may enter, and into which we were not admitted. The second is ornamented on the walls with rude frescoes. These represent the Madonna and Child, the crucifixion, the Stoning of St. Peter, and other incidents of New Testament history. The most prized of all are one of the Madonna encased in metal in Russian style, and a large fresco of St. George on a white horse killing the dragon. None of the paintings are executed with the slightest regard to perspective, and seem to be but rude imitations of the religious paintings of the Early Mediæval period. Into the second circle communicants are admitted. It was curious to find suspended on its walls, on either side of the reading-desk, two parchment scrolls [in Tigrean character, one of which was headed by the British Crown, the monogram "G.R.," and the words "George, King," in letters of gold. They must have been left here by Mr. Salt in one of his missions to Tigre in the earlier years of this century. The outer circle of the church is but a colonnade; its walls are bare of either painting or ornament. In it the people pray and prayers are publicly read. Several priests, distinguished from the laity only by their wearing voluminous white turbans, accompanied us through the church, and explained to us through our interpreter the designs of the paintings. All these they asserted to have been done by Abyssinian artists. After having seen the church, we were taken to the door of the chief priest's house, and were shown the church plate. This consisted of a Bible bound in silver gilt, two mitres of the same material, manufactured by an Italian artist while resident in Abyssinia, a copper-gilt goblet, with the arms of England and the motto "Honi soit qui mal y pense," a present from Salt, and a beautiful silver-gilt Greek cross, which many would have willingly purchased, but which the clergy refused to part with. While we were inspecting these we were ourselves inspected. A thick crowd of the male inhabitants gathered round us, and examined with the greatest curiosity and admiration our swords, revolvers, watches, spurs, and clothing. Many, showing the blue cords round their necks, which in this country mark a Christian, interrogated us by signs whether we were "Christian." On being assured that we were so, greatly pleased, they ejaculated constantly "Tayeb! tayeb!"—the Arabic for "good," which the Abyssinians believe to be a word in our language, and which our soldiers believe to be a word in theirs, and which, with the exception of "Salaam," is almost the only means of intercommunication between the two.

LIVERPOOL DISTRICT MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION.

THE annual meeting of this Association was held in Hope-street Schools on Monday evening, the 18th inst., the president, W. J. LAMPORT, Esq., in the chair.

Among those present were a large number of ministers, including the Revs. J. Alsop, Chas. Beard, B.A., George Beaumont, John Cropper, M.A., John Cuckson, Benjamin Glover, Alex. Gordon, M.A., Henry Green, M.A., T. Holland, B.A., Thos. Jones, William Pope, John Shannon, S. Alfred Steinthal, Charles B. Upton, B.A., B.Sc., Charles Wicksteed, B.A. There were also present Messrs. T. Avison, F.R.S., T. Chapman, W. C. Downie, T. Green, H. Hawkes, A. Higginson, Geo. Holt, C. W. Jones, J. Nuttall, C. P. Melly, F. Millson, C. G. Mott, Shaw, James Wood. The attendance was much more satisfactory than on some previous occasions.

The CHAIRMAN, in introducing the business of the meeting, said that it was as usual of a routine character; yet not entirely so; they would hear reports from their old friend Mr. Glover, and from their new friend Mr. Cuckson. The report from the committee still contains, positively for the last time, an allusion to the Southport congregation. They were so proud of the Southport congregation, that they could not leave out a reference to its present independent and flourishing state. Of Crewe they were proud, too, in some respects, but they would like to see the time a little nearer at hand when the Crewe congregation will render themselves self-supporting. Rosecommon-street had chosen for itself, with the full approval of the Association, a minister of its own. It complains again, as in former years, that its place of worship is too small, and he thought the time was come for the erection of a church there. The least satisfactory portion of the statements to be laid before them consisted in the smallness of the subscription list. It was not creditable to us as a body that our subscription list should be so slender. This was not the time for us, in any way whatever, to flinch from our duty, or to take our hand from the plough. "Only reflect upon the large questions to be agitated during the next few years, and then be careful how you give up any means of helping on your religious truth or spiritual freedom. The Irish Church is on the point of being disestablished; but the questions agitated now will not stop at the Irish Church. (Loud applause.) English Churchmen are perfectly right in their apprehension that the questions raised will not be allowed to rest there. Do not misunderstand me. I say nothing now about disestablishment or disendowment; but the time is speedily coming when a number of questions will arise about the English Church, which will call for our utmost attention and care. It is not because the Irish Church is to be done away with that these questions will become pressing, but because the national conscience has been aroused on these subjects; and men, looking on these things, are ready to cry with the patriarch of old, 'Surely the Lord is in this place, and I knew it not.'" (Applause.)

The TREASURER (T. Avison, Esq.) then read the report from the committee.

The Rev. BENJAMIN GLOVER read an interesting and hopeful report from Crewe. It was stated that about half the houses there were the property of working men. The strongest religious influence is that of the Methodists, particularly the Primitives. Yet there are plenty of inquiring minds. Tracts had been distributed, and among them some specially written for the locality. The Sunday services and school had been steadily maintained. Mr. Glover had also visited and preached at the Potteries.

The Rev. JOHN CUCKSON read a short and telling report of his first steps in ministerial work at Rosecommon-street. The existing institutions were in vigorous life; and a society of young men, for "mutual instruction and not quarrelsome debate," had recently been established.

The Rev. CHARLES WICKSTEED moved the first resolution, "That the reports be received, and that the best wishes of the meeting be offered to Mr. Glover and Mr. Cuckson for the success of their arduous labours." He could not but rejoice to express his sense of the obligations they were all under to Mr. Glover and Mr. Cuckson for the energy with which they had pursued what were properly termed their "arduous" labours. "Arduous" indeed they were, involving nothing less than a constant, bold, untiring, breasting of an opposing tide. And if the results were not as marked, as large, and as successful as they might wish, they must remember the very trying circumstances under which they were achieved. People who placed themselves in the advanced guard of opinion could not expect to have all the forces of the main army ready to rally round them. Their bold and honest leaders of thought went straight on in the pursuit of pure truth, regardless, though on looking back, they perceived that they had outstripped most of their followers, and were nearly alone. Whereas some politic and popular leaders were always looking about them to see who were with them, and if they had taken a step a little too much in advance barked back till "the following" came up. In the next place they must remember what friends they all were of liberty, and how remote they were from having a fixed definite system of faith, ready to be advanced, defended, and enforced in an available concrete form. He, for his part, while acknowledging the absolute necessity for liberty, as the very atmosphere in which alone they could breathe, regarded that liberty as merely a condition for the attainment of results; those results, he thought, were certain great religious and theological truths, and those truths, when once reached, he felt it was our highest duty to advocate and diffuse for the blessing and enlightenment of our fellow-men. In the third place, they must remember that the very improvement which had taken place in prevailing religious and theological thought around had made the contrasts of the churches less marked, and men were not now so hardly driven by a narrow Calvinism on the one hand, or a cold officialism on the other, out of the surrounding churches into the alone refuge of Unitarianism. From all these, and many other causes he could have mentioned, a slower recognition of our separate denominational position and significance might be accounted for. He noticed with pleasure, from what their president had said, that they were likely to have a new chapel in Rosecommon-street. But that chapel built, he would recommend a pause in chapel building. What we wanted was to have that room better occupied; congregations, not chapels, should be our next effort.

CHARLES GREY MOTT, Esq., in seconding the resolution, said: One excuse for many of the Unitarians in this neighbourhood who do not support this Association is that it is too little known. The only occasions on which our attention is directed to it are once a year at the chapels where collections are made, and once a year at this annual meeting. The low state of our funds is in great measure due to our not letting outsiders know what we are doing. The work we do is not a slight work—not one with which the Unitarian public, if they understood it well, would trifle. It should be set above almost every other which we have in hand. We hear from Mr. Wicksteed that it is the highest intellect of the country that is now open to our appeal; we hear from Mr. Glover that it is the working classes that are waiting for our truths. Both these gentlemen speak, doubtless, from their own experience; and I, who belong neither to the highest intelligence nor to the lowest stratum of our society, may claim, also, that the middle classes are ready for what we can give. So that, really, there is no class that is not prepared for our faith. I fear we have been far too selfish about this faith; we have been satisfied with keeping it in our chapels and in our families, forgetting the myriads outside who are waiting for it. The district embraced by this Liverpool Mission comprehends about one million of people. How many of these do we succeed in reaching? We have managed to establish a congregation at Crewe with an average attendance of about fifty; a congregation at Southport with an average attendance of about eighty; a congregation at Rosecommon-street with an average attendance of about sixty. This brings us up to somewhere about two hundred people to whom we have managed to convey the influence of our faith, after six or seven years' work. Is this satisfactory? If this were all, I should think it very unsatisfactory. But the existence of these, as centres of work, is of more significance than the mere formation of congregations. A hearer who has been attracted to a single sermon or lecture cannot go away exactly the same man that he came. We ought to have a centre of this kind in every village, or at least in every small town; yet we have not. And why not? Because the whole Unitarian body of the Liverpool District cannot raise for this missionary purpose more than three or four hundred pounds a-year. It is a sign of a bad workman, we know, to quarrel with his tools; but a very good workman, if he have no tools at all, cannot do much work. What of the future? Cannot we do something that will mend this state of things? It will rest with every individual person present to-night to take care, within seven days from this date, to let some fresh person know of the existence of this Association; and, if he will continue this process, we shall be in a different financial position this time next year. All the intelligence of the country tends towards us, and here we sit, satisfied with three or four hundred pounds to do this great and mighty work. I do not think this work exaggerated. I think it ten times greater than it has been represented. Would that the age of the disendowment of the Irish Church might be the age of our endowment with a new energy and a new spirit! (Applause.)

The CHAIRMAN then introduced to the meeting Rev. HENRY GREEN, of Knutsford, as an old and tried friend of the Unitarian cause, whose presence among them that evening he was rejoiced to see; and Mr. Green gave some interesting recollections of the former state of our denomination in Liverpool.

Mr. AVISON, in the absence of the treasurer (Philip H. Holt, Esq.), read the accounts for the year, which showed a deficit of £18. 12s.; it was, however, stated that this debt would be diminished by a sum of £10 just received from the Crewe congregation.

The Rev. W. POPE, who has recently joined our body and become the minister at Woodchurch, Oxton, moved that the reports be received and passed. He was unaware of the nature of the Association till to-night, but rejoiced in the discovery. He was not aware that there was an Association of Unitarians in this country for the professed purpose of religious aggression. (Laughter and applause.) He had full faith in the ultimate success of the movement. But they must certainly provide the sinews of war better. He had heard, since he had been in the neighbourhood, that money was very plentiful in the Unitarian body—(laughter)—and also that Unitarians were very liberal with their money. (Cheers.) They only wanted to be convinced that money thrown into this channel will not be thrown away, and the money would be forthcoming. The reports showed that the little means already expended had produced an ample harvest; had more been expended, more would have been reaped. They could not expect a very large harvest from a very small sowing. (Applause.)

Mr. CHAPMAN, who seconded the resolution, thought we had already sufficient places of worship, and wanted a greater spirit of worship. He referred to the meagreness of the evening attendance at our places of worship.

Mr. WICKSTED reminded the meeting that thirty-five years ago there was but one of our chapels in Liverpool open for evening service, and there, though there was a most gifted minister, the audience was no larger than might be seen in one of our places at present. And now there were no less than six chapels always open for evening service.

The Rev. CHARLES BEARD moved the appointment of a committee, secretary, and treasurer for the ensuing year. After alluding to the question of evening services, he said: I am about to make a confession which, I am afraid, will sink me very deeply in the eyes of some of our friends. I have not any faith in the attempt to propagate Unitarianism as such, to preach the doctrines of a particular sect, or to extend the religious influence of an organised body. There was one simple purpose which Christ and his apostles had in view; and this was by no means to overturn Judaism, or to found a fresh dogmatic system of religion; it was simply to save men's souls, to give to the ignorant light; to lift the sinful from the slough of their despond; to minister to the sorrowful that comfort which streams and can only stream from on high, and thus to put a new heart, a new soul, a new comfort, a new strength into man. To accomplish this has always been the end of any great religious movement; and just in proportion as we teach men, not our Unitarianism—nay, not even our Christianity—but simply in proportion as we are determined to teach them only religion, to lift them nearer to God, to turn them away from the narrowness of their own natures, will our success be. Going out in this way, and teaching religion, we certainly do, before very long, come into contact with problems of theology. And it is wrong for us, I think, to divide our work into two parts, so as to give, in our Domestic Missions, religion first and theology after, or, possibly, religion without theology; and, on the contrary, in our District Missions to invert that order, and give first theology and then religion. The natural order places religion first, and then theology. We do not need any exact doctrine of the person of Christ to prove how beautiful, glorious, and inspiring his example is; we require no metaphysical acquaintance with the nature of the Divine essence, to bring men to their Father in Heaven. When you have succeeded in drawing men a little nearer to the central source of all spiritual light and heat, then theological questions will occur, and you must answer them fully and freely; but I do not believe in any enterprise that puts theology before religion, and that does not make practical religion its first and foremost object. (Applause.) Now as regards the financial question. I am quite sure that when you have accomplished all that you wish in the way of collecting money, you have not done your work. We want something more than money, and the want is a far more pressing one. I agree with Mr. Pope that the Unitarians, English Presbyterians or Free Christians of this neighbourhood, are in the first place rich, and in the next place liberal. But what we want is men. (Hear, hear.) We want a different class of evangelists to that which we have hitherto succeeded in obtaining; men touched with fire from on high; men of self-denying lives; willing to do what I will find a hundred Catholic priests in this country, or a hundred Anglican clergymen willing to do—live among the poor, and spend their all upon them; and the moment we have a prophet, with whatever disadvantages of culture and means, whose lips have been touched, as were once Isaiah's, by a coal from heaven's own altar, and whose heart is all aglow with that divine fire, the moment we find a prophet, the common people will hear him gladly. (Loud applause.)

The Rev. THOMAS HOLLAND, of Southport, seconded the resolution.

Rev. J. ALSOP said he must dissent from the opinions of some previous speakers on two points. He believed that truth is the basis of religion. (Hear, hear.) It was a very easy but a very unfair thing to apply such words as dogmatism and the like to the cherished truths of our holy religion. Again, he was much attached to an evening service. While granting that persons who live at great distances cannot attend twice a day, he yet knew that there were many living in town to whom a second service was both a privilege and a delight.

The meeting was also addressed by Rev. JOHN CROPPER, M.A., of Wareham; C. P. MELLY, Esq., and Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL.

NORTHERN SUNDAY-SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

The annual meeting of this Association was held on Monday evening, in the Mission House, Stanhope-street, Belfast; H. DARBISHIRE, Esq., in the chair. Among those present were Messrs. J. M. Darbishire, Robert M'Calmont, William Spackman, A. O'D. Taylor, Thomas Shaw, Revs. John Scott Porter, C. J. M'Alister, John Jellie, T. H. M. Scott, T. Bowring, and D. Thompson.

Rev. J. C. M'ALESTER (the secretary) read the report.

"The committee have satisfaction in reporting that during the year all applications made from the schools connected with the Association have been carefully attended to, and that every facility within the province of the Association has been afforded for the efficient management of the Sunday schools. The Hibernian Bible Society has kindly supplied bibles and testaments for the use of the Association's schools at sixpence and twopence each. In addition to the books supplied at present by the Association, it might be desirable to publish, or supply at a low rate, volumes bearing on natural history in several of its departments, on animal physiology and kindred subjects, and on the history and manners of the people in Palestine; but the very small demand for works already issued by the Association has reasonably deterred your committee, for several years, from entertaining such a project. They have to acknowledge the kindness of the London Sunday-school Society, and of the Manchester District Sunday-school Association, for inviting them to send deputies to their annual meetings. While the committee were unable to accept these invitations, they are not less sensible of the Christian courtesy which prompted them. The interest which these English societies manifest in the Sunday-school cause, and the energy which they seem to throw into the work should stimulate us to increased exertions. They have also gratefully to acknowledge the courtesy of the American Unitarian Association, in regularly forwarding to this association the Monthly Journal."

Rev. JOHN SCOTT PORTER, in moving the adoption of the report, referred to some of the drawbacks which existed to educational efforts. The greatly relaxed state of parental authority was a very great obstacle to the education of the young.—Rev. D. THOMPSON seconded the motion, which was passed unanimously.

Mr. J. M. DARBISHIRE moved—"That a Sunday school devoted to the moral and religious instruction of the young, is an important means of educating the people in Christian principles; and that this Association, established for the purpose of supplying Sunday schools with books, and otherwise promoting their proficiency, is entitled to our cordial and united support."—Rev. T. BOWRING seconded the motion, which was adopted.

The Rev. JOHN JELLIE moved the next resolution:—"That we gratefully acknowledge the continued liberality of the Hibernian Bible Society in supplying this Association with copies of the sacred Scriptures for the use of these schools at reduced prices."—The Rev. C. J. M'ALESTER, in the absence of the Rev. John Porter, seconded the motion, which was passed unanimously.

The Rev. Mr. SCOTT (Dunmurry) moved the next resolution, expressive of sympathy with the London and Manchester District Sunday-school Associations in their earnest labours in the cause of Sunday schools, and their wish to co-operate with them in any way which might be found practicable.—Mr. T. SHAW seconded the motion, which was agreed to.

Thanks to the officers were then voted, and new ones appointed, after which the meeting was closed by prayer.

INTELLIGENCE.

HEYWOOD.—On the 17th inst., the annual school sermons were preached by the Rev. R. Pilcher, B.A., of Bradford. Collections, £22. 18s. 7½d.

LONDON: WEST-STREET CHAPEL.—A social meeting was held on Monday night, the 25th inst.; upwards of eighty present. The services of Mr. Carter, the lay minister in charge of this congregation, and Miss Warren, who plays the harmonium, and Mr. Webb, one of the choir, were handsomely acknowledged by gifts of suitable books. This little church is prospering.

MANCHESTER, WHITFIELD STREET, ARDWICK.—On Sunday last, anniversary sermons were preached at this place, in the afternoon by the Rev. G. H. Wells, M.A., and in the evening by the Rev. Wm. Gaskell, M.A.—On Monday evening, the annual congregational tea meeting was held, when the Rev. Dr. Beard presided, and addresses were delivered by the chairman, the Revs. J. Freeston, T. E. Poynting, W. H. Herford, B.A., and T. Harrison; Messrs. J. Heys, J. Heywood, T. Brittain, and D. Baxter. It was announced in the course of the evening that the recent bazaar and the subscriptions had yielded sufficient to purchase the premises they occupied, and that there was about £40 in money and £30 in goods beside to make the necessary alterations. The speeches were all of a hopeful and encouraging kind.

STOCKPORT.—The annual sermons on behalf of the church funds were preached on Sunday last, by the Rev. A. M. Creery, B.A., of Altrincham, when collections were made amounting to £41. 11s.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE LIBERATION SOCIETY.

To the Editors.—I would assure Mr. Means that my objection to work with Independents and Baptists is not founded on their religious opinions. I recognise in them the same right of private judgment which I exercise myself. But when I am invited to follow them as leaders in the cause of religious "Liberation," I object and decline to do so, because they are persons "who appear to me to have no just idea of the claims of religious truth or religious liberty." My reasons for thus thinking of them I have given at some length. Does Mr. Means question or deny those reasons? If so, it would be more to the purpose to tell us on what ground he does so, than it is to ask whether the terms "bigoted and intolerant" are applicable to me. These words are usually applied to persons who lay an unseemly stress on their own religious opinions, or religious rites, and have little consideration for the opinions or the rites of others;—persons, for instance, who put their ideas of Christian doctrine into legal forms, and seek to fix them upon future generations for all time to come. It is not I who do this, so far as I know. If Mr. Means thinks it is, I shall be much obliged to him if he will show me how, or where, and I will try to correct the fault.

As to his second inquiry, I would suggest to him that it is a little premature. Perhaps when, if ever, we come to the task of organising the future national church, it may be found practicable to provide for the case supposed. At any rate, I fancy we may very well postpone, for the present, the consideration of so interesting a difficulty, and turn to matters which are nearer to us.

Mr. Wright very properly points out what he considers a fallacy in my argument. He thinks that people have a "perfect right" to form a Christian Church "on the principle of close communion or doctrinal trusts." They who do so, do not ask others to join or contribute, unless they choose. In reply, I would ask Mr. Wright whether he really holds that any individual or number of individuals have a "perfect right" to use the name of Christ and of Christianity, as the cover, or plea, or pretext, under which to set up, and seek to bind upon future generations, their own private and sectarian definitions of religious or Christian doctrine? I cannot see that any such "right" exists. It is, at best, only an usurped right; and it always reminds me too forcibly of the American slaveholder's right "to wallop his own nigger." It makes little difference in the case, that the usurpers do not attempt to infringe on my liberty, or seek to compel others to join or contribute. Small merit to them for this; for the power to do it is not in their possession. But, nevertheless, do they not "infringe on the liberty" of their congregational successors—their own children and grandchildren, it may be? These will surely be under the "patronage and control" of those who have gone before them, and not with their own consent either. Their predecessors have taken away their privilege to judge for themselves. Will Mr. Wright defend this? Does he think it consistent with any high principle of religious liberty? or will he maintain that the persons who do it are leaders to be followed in the cause of religious liberty? If he does so, I can only hold up my hands in amazement, and appeal to the common sense of candid and free-minded men.

Mr. Wright will easily see, from this statement of the case, that I do not refuse to act with Liberationists of the Independent and Baptist names merely because their "notions as to congregational organisation are different from my own." My objection goes far deeper than outward organisation. What the sects just named are so largely, so generally doing, is plainly inconsistent with the free spirit of the Christian Gospel, and with an enlightened Protestantism. And they are doing it now, persistently, with their eyes open; and defending it by elaborate defences in the current sectarian literature of the day. I confidently appeal to Mr. Wright, and ask him whether he thinks that the men who do these things, who support them by their presence and their money contributions, are worthy leaders in the great cause of religious liberty?

What Mr. Wright says about a national church may be perfectly true, yet it will not justify the orthodox Dissenters in what they have done and are doing in the same matter. Nevertheless, to my own mind, a national church might be so organised as to leave a perfect Christian liberty to every member.

And here, Mr. Editor, as I hope I shall have no occasion to trouble you with further remarks on this subject, let me briefly refer to a leading article in the Inquirer of the 23rd inst. The writer alludes to those amongst us "who cannot forget unpleasant memories;" and after admitting the "shameful intolerance" of the congregational body, he adds, "But this is of the past." I would ask him has he lost his power of observation, that he seems to be ignorant of some of the commonest facts of the sectarian life around him? The model trust deed of the Independents may be bought for a shilling any day. The articles on admission to Dissenting Colleges are even now in full force. So is the restriction on admission to the Christian Church, as organised among Independents and Baptists. Dr. R. Vaughan, in his new work, "The Church and State Question," defends that restriction, and justifies the existing mode of admission to the Church on the ground that admission to a club or a literary society "depends on the suffrage of those who constitute it" (p. 181). These are not things of the past; nor is that notable volume of Mr. T. S. James. They are things of the present and the future; and I venture to suggest, as the practical lesson, that some of our friends, who write so decidedly at times on these matters, might occasionally inform themselves a little better on the subjects of which they write.

As to the "widest possible Church" which you have yourself proposed, Mr. Editor, allow me the remark, that when it is realised, if that day ever comes, it will be too like the widest possible education under which the nation is now suffering. I shall anticipate that the religious voluntarists of a future day will be ready to do much as our educational voluntarists are now doing; that is, they will loudly call for some systematic organisation, proceeding from a central power, to save us from wasteful competition and discreditable inefficiency.

G. VANCE SMITH.

UNITARIAN OR FREE CHRISTIAN?

To the Editors.—I regret to observe that the promoters of the establishment of a Unitarian congregation in Bayswater, in removing to new premises, persist in the designation of the place of worship as a Free Christian Church. I cannot but think that they make a great mistake. Such a designation, I sincerely believe, is no attraction to inquirers after religious truth, but is regarded as an unworthy disguise of their opinions on the part of those whose Unitarianism (as in this case) is perfectly well known. The pretence of being unsectarian seems to me a weak subterfuge. Was not Christianity on its first promulgation sectarian? Are not all opinions those of a sect? If the promoters of the present enterprise do not differ on material points from their fellow-Christians, why form themselves into a separate church? The most material point of difference—in fact the cardinal point, as I conceive—is that indicated by the word Unitarian: namely, a belief in the strict unity and spirituality of God, in contradistinction to a belief in and worship of a Deity of mysterious divine and human commixture. The term Unitarian is sometimes shrunk from, as entailing upon its adoption an implied assent to all the theological opinions of its early and eminent professors, such as Priestley and Belsham; but this is an evident fallacy. It is, however, certain that the belief in an anthropomorphic Deity once discarded, all the other dogmas contained in creeds and articles follow it into limbo. Hence in Unitarian chapels the doctrines of the fall of man, a personal devil, the atonement, and everlasting punishment are untaught.

I know there are some sincere and sensitive theologians, who, while they cling to a belief in the Duty of Christ, stumble at the doctrine of everlasting punishment for those who equally sincerely disbelieve the former doctrine, and excuse their defection from orthodoxy by construing the word eternal, or its Greek equivalent, in a less crucial sense than everlasting. For these weak brethren there is still room in the Established Church, from whose ample bosom they are not likely to pass into the cold desert of voluntarism however free or Christian. And I see no call upon Unitarians to provide a sanctuary for such or similarly vexed consciences at the cost of throwing our own vital principle of separation from other religious societies into the background.

Whom it is hoped to win or conciliate by this course I cannot imagine. The epithet Unitarian has ceased to be opprobrious (as the word Christian itself once was), though it is not yet fashionable.

I submit that we ought to shrink from being guilty of want of candour and uprightness, in a hopeless endeavour to compromise our honest convictions with vagueness of language, and thereby to escape a little social obloquy, which we now incur by being undeservedly charged with complete rejection of Christianity. Nor can this charge be avoided by our disclaiming a proselytizing spirit, and abstaining from direct doctrinal teaching. If we value our religious views, why should we not urge them upon others, who, we think, would be made better and happier by becoming acquainted with and adopting them? And can we justify the indirect subversion of their doctrinal belief by the mere insinuation of our own opinions? Surely to do so is to practise what, in the case of Jesuits, we condemn.

I believe if the public were more invited to come and learn what Unitarianism really was, many would receive it gladly. It appears to me that the appellation Free Christian Church contains no such invitation; and it conveys to me no assurance that I shall obtain, in exchange for the social discomfort of separating from my neighbours and friends in religious worship, the satisfaction of hearing clear and rational doctrine explained and enforced for the help of faith and duty.—Yours obediently,

CHAS. F. TAGART.

The RELIGIOUS SERVICE will commence at eleven o'clock, the introductory part being conducted by the Rev. CHARLES W. ROBERTS, and the Rev. JOHN PAGE HOPPS being the preacher. The MEETING for BUSINESS will be held in the Chapel at one o'clock. At four o'clock there will be a PUBLIC DINNER in the Hulme Town Hall, Stretford Road; E. BOWMAN, Esq., M.A., in the chair. Tickets, 3s. 6d. each. Ladies and Gentlemen can obtain tickets on the morning of the meeting. JOHN WRIGHT, Secretary.

UNIVERSITY OF LONDON.—Notice is hereby given, that the next HALF-YEARLY EXAMINATION for MATRICULATION in this University will commence on Monday, the 29th of June, 1868. In addition to the Metropolitan Examination, Provincial Examinations will be held at Owens College, Manchester; Queen's College, Liverpool; Stonyhurst College, St. Othbert's College, Llanwrst, St. Gregory's College, Downside; St. Mary's College, Oscott; and St. Patrick's College, Carlisle. Every Candidate is required to transmit his Certificate of Age to the Registrar (17, Savile Row, London, W.) at least 14 days before the commencement of the examination. Candidates who pass the Matriculation Examination are entitled to proceed to the degrees conferred by the University in Arts, Laws, Science, and Medicine. This Examination is accepted (1) by the Council of Military Education in lieu of the Entrance Examination otherwise imposed on Candidates for admission to the Royal Military College at Sandhurst; and (2) by the College of Surgeons in lieu of the Preliminary Examination otherwise imposed on Candidates for its Fellowship. It is also among those Examinations of which some one must be passed (1) by every Medical Student on commencing his professional studies; and (2) by every person entering upon Articles of Clerkship to an Attorney, any such person matriculating in the First Division being entitled to exemption from one year's service. WILLIAM B. CARPENTER, M.D., Registrar. May 29th, 1868.

SUNDAY DUTY.—A Minister, about changing his pulpit, having some time at his disposal, would SUPPLY for a brother minister any time after the 28th of June. Address B. A., care of Messrs. Johnson and Rawson, Market-street, Manchester.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

AN APPEAL FOR INDIA.

At the last Annual Meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, in June, 1867, the following Resolution was agreed to:

"That it be an instruction to the Committee to consider how they can best meet the present religious wants of India; and that if they see their way to advance the knowledge of pure Christianity by the establishment of Missions or by a large distribution of books, this meeting pledges itself to assist them in raising any additional funds which may for any or all of these purposes be required."

It must be obvious to all our friends that such an effort as this indicates, would entail an expenditure which the present funds could not bear, and yet the Committee are anxious to meet the wishes of the members of the Association. We may say that during the past year we have had most assuring statements made to us of the prospects of success for Unitarian Christianity among the two hundred millions of India, if we enter heartily into this cause; and also that Christianity is the only hope for higher civilisation in India, and that our form of faith is the only one that can possibly succeed among that people. The English Unitarians have at present only one distinctively Unitarian Chapel and minister of religion in that great country, at Madras alone. During the past few months we have had considerable correspondence with the Rev. W. Roberts (a native), of Madras; and Miss Carpenter has informed us that Mr. Roberts is doing a good work, and would be able to do our cause more useful service if he could be freed from his secular labours by a stipend from us. Our Appeal for India, therefore, is intended to aid Mr. Roberts, and to promote a more general diffusion of Unitarian Christianity by an efficient Missionary or Missionaries in that country. We need not remind our people that as India is under the British rule, and that as we are the recipients of some of the temporal advantages of this connection, we owe the people of India some effort and sacrifice to convey to them the Gospel of Jesus Christ.—Yours, very faithfully, R. B. ASPLAND, Hon. Secs. R. SPEARS.

WANTED, a Situation as COMPANION to an elderly or invalid Lady.—Address A., Rev. W. W. ROBINSON, Boston.

CHARITY COMMISSION.—IN THE MATTER OF THE CHARITY CALLED THE GENERAL BAPTIST EDUCATION FUND.

By direction of the Board of Charity Commissioners for England and Wales, Notice is hereby Given, that an order is proposed to be made by them after the expiration of one calendar month, to be computed from the publication of this notice, having the following objects, namely:

The appointment of new Trustees of the above-mentioned Charity. Vesting in the Official Trustees of Charitable Funds the right to call for the transfer of and to transfer into their names the sum of £94. 10s. New £3 per cent. annuities belonging to the said Charity, and also to receive the arrears of dividends on the same annuities, in trust for the above-mentioned Charity.

The following persons have been proposed for appointment as such new Trustees, viz.: The Rev. HENRY EDWARD HOWSE, of Bath, in the County of Somerset; the Rev. JOSEPH CALLOW MEANS, of New North Road, in the parish of St. Leonard, Shoreditch, in the County of Middlesex. Any objections to the proposed order or suggestions for the modification thereof may be transmitted to the said Board in writing, addressed to their Secretary, No. 5, York-street, St. James's Square, London, within 21 days next after the first publication of this notice. Dated this 21st day of May, 1868. HENRY M. VANE, Secretary.

UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN CHURCH, POOLE.

The Poole Congregation will be grateful for large and small donations from their Unitarian friends throughout the kingdom towards the erection of the projected new Chapel, of which the foundation stone is just laid.

The amount of money still required to complete the undertaking is much too large for them to meet alone, and being desirous to avoid debt, an urgent appeal is hereby made for assistance.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

The Deseret News, which issues from Salt Lake City, expresses alarm lest Parisian fashions should find their way among Mormon women. And no wonder. It would make a heavy pull on the pockets of such of the Saints as have a dozen wives or more, to furnish forth trains like those with which the French ladies sweep the dust, and they may well join with Goldsmith in saying:

"Man wants but little here below,
Nor wants that little long."

Rome has had an unexpected blow in Sicily. The islanders are very superstitious, and it was supposed that they would decline to bid for the confiscated Church property, under the idea that a curse would rest upon it. On the contrary, they buy it most readily, opening their hoards, and giving often double the upset price.

Whether they make a "happy family" or not is not stated, but the composition of the Pope's Guard of Zouaves, which numbers 4,593, is given as follows: 1,910 Dutch, 1,301 French, 686 Belgians, 157 Romans and other Pontifical subjects, 135 Canadians, 101 Irish, 87 Prussians, 50 English, 32 Spaniards, 22 Germans, 19 Swiss, 14 Americans, 14 Neapolitans, 12 Modenese, 12 Poles, 10 Scotch, 6 Tuscans, 6 Portuguese, 3 Maltese, 2 Russians, 1 South Sea Islander, an Indian, an African, a Peruvian, a Mexican, and a Circassian.

In the display at the marriage of the Crown Prince of Italy, not the least remarkable thing exhibited was the identical shroud in which our Lord was buried. According to the Osservatore Romano, this relic was preserved by Nicodemus, whom it discovers to have been "head of the Sanhedrim," and somehow or other it got into the hands of a French knight, who deposited it in a church on his estate, seven miles from Troyes. In 1451, one of his descendants, a Lady Margaret De Charny, flying for refuge from war to the Duke of Savoy, was attacked by robbers, but having the holy shroud about her, when they were about to cut it in pieces they were suddenly stricken blind, and of course became good Christians on the spot. The lady turned back, but at the outer gate of Chambéry the mule grew obstinate, and refused to budge a single step further, evidently showing it to be the will of Heaven that the relic should remain there; and thus, as Roman authorities tell, it came to be among the treasures of the House of Savoy.

Another sacred relic exhibited to some of the wedding guests on the same occasion, was a handkerchief, said to have upon it a representation of our Saviour, imprinted by his sweat. Of this handkerchief, after asking permission of the Archbishop, Victor Emmanuel devoutly kissed one corner, and the Princess Clotilda followed his example.

The opening of the Œcumenical Council is fixed for the 8th of December, 1869, and the Pope will publish the decree convoking it on St. Peter's Day, the 29th of this month.

According to the clerical journals, the Bishop of Barbadoes, being too unwell to perform his duties, a coadjutor bishop is to be appointed "as in the case of Jamaica." In this case, the Bishop of Jamaica has resided for a number of years in England, drawing £1,400 from the Imperial Treasury, and his coadjutor, who lives in Kingston and does the work, getting £2,000 more. We infer that the same comfortable arrangement will be made in the case of Barbadoes.

Whether the dread of disestablishment is the cause or not we cannot say, but one of the clerical agents advertises that his private list at present contains the unprecedented number of a hundred Church livings for sale at prices from £350 to £25,000.

The new laws to which the Emperor of Austria has given his sanction are a great step onward in the way of religious freedom. Henceforth clerical jurisdiction in matrimonial affairs is at an end, and if a priest throws any obstacles in the way of marriage not founded in law, the parties can be legally married by the civil authorities. The supreme direction in matters of education is to be exercised by the State, and religious education alone left in the hands of the clergy of different confessions. The members of one church cannot be forced to contribute in any way to the wants of another, unless such obligation is founded on patronage or private contract. No religious community can refuse a decent burial to persons of another religious confession in places where no burial place of that religious confession exists.

A local paper tells a strange tale about the monastery at Laleham under the control of Father Ignatius. A man, supposed to be one of the "brothers," has been placed in the garden at the rear of the monastery and tied up with a rope as though he were a dog, with an earthenware saucer placed before him to drink out of. He was there four days and nights, being obliged to lie on the ground. It is added that the wretched individual was doing penance for having killed a swallow. The Church News, however, contradicts the story.

The same "Father" resumed his duties, which illness had suspended, at St. Edmund the King's, on Friday last, when the church was crowded. He appears of late to have contracted a great aversion to West End people, whose churches he declared were filled every Sunday with fashionable prostitutes and thieves. The vices which prevailed in West End society were, he said, just the same, though apparently more refined, than those that were in full play in Ratcliffe Highway, Petticoat Lane, and the Eastern slums of London. A pleasant sight, indeed, it would be to see sinners of this kind transubstantiated into saints. His language was so strong on this point that two ladies rose and left the church, a circumstance on which he commented with great severity. One of his old opponents, Hughes, who was "received" into the Church of England on Christmas Day with much ceremony by Mr. Ormiston, and who has been starred at Protestant meetings during the last few months, has rejoined the Church of Rome during Mr. Lyne's absence from public duty, and herein he has a great triumph.

The Newry Telegraph states that an influential deputation from Ireland, to be accompanied by "a large body of peers and members of the House of Commons," will shortly wait upon the Premier to "urge on him the absolute necessity of the Cabinet adopting a strong Protestant policy."

It is understood that the meeting of Convocation on the 30th of this month is to be for the despatch of business, and that Mr. Coleridge's Universities Tests Bill and the condition of the Church in Natal are then to be taken into consideration.

The controversy respecting the composition of the Roman wafer, which has been going on in the Church Times for several weeks, is not yet settled. Great is the difference 'twixt tweedle-dum and tweedle-dee.

An Irish Church question, of a small kind, is the subject of a parliamentary paper just issued. In January, a child was found at the gate of the Tulla workhouse, and the master, who was a Roman Catholic, had it baptised by the Roman Catholic chaplain. The rector of the parish wrote to the Poor-law Commissioners, and asked whether, as representing the Established Church, he had not a right to the lost lamb. The Commissioners thereupon administered a smart rebuke to the workhouse master, and said that, though the register could not now be altered, should any similar case arise, the child must be registered as of the Established Church. The Catholic chaplain, however, was not satisfied with this decision, and wrote to the Guardians, informing them where there was no law children should be brought up in the religion that prevailed in the district; but the Commissioners directed the Guardians that they must not excuse themselves on any plea that might be urged by the Rev. Father Bowles.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

As is well known, a superstition prevails in Rome that no Pope can reign above 25 years; and the correspondent of the Pall Mall says that persons around Pius IX. affirm that he becomes more and more troubled by this superstition, and even expresses his fears whether he will complete the period. At the festival of the Ascension he looked ill and dejected, and his voice was very weak.

The Osservatore Romano, commenting on the reports concerning the cause of Cardinal Andrea's death, says that a post-mortem examination showed that it resulted from tubercular consumption and disease of the membrane enveloping the brain.

Mr. Disraeli has, as the London Review says, been driven into a corner. He has nothing left but the cry of "Church and King!" He must, whether he will or no, appeal to the country on the No Popery cry. He—the man of infinite arts, devices, and stratagems—is at last reduced to the necessity of accepting the policy of sullen, blind obstruction, dear to the Conservative squires and clergy.

Dr. Massingham, the notorious lecturer, in the course of an address to the members of the Blackburn Church Institute, last week, said he believed that Mr. Gladstone was actuated in the course he had taken with regard to the Irish Establishment by two motives; the first was revenge, and the second was a desire to get back to pay and place. The other day he astonished a gentleman by classing Mr. Gladstone with the Todmorden murderer, in so far that they both acted from the feeling of revenge. There was, however, this difference, they could hang the man for murder, but they could not hang the man who sought to disestablish and plunder the Church, and he held that hanging was too good for the man who proposed to do that. It might not be amiss if Dr. Massingham and some of his confrères were to meditate a little on what St. James says about the man who "seems to be religious, and bridled not his tongue."

Dr. Raleigh is being taken to task for one or two things in his address to the Congregational Union. On his assertion that if we "receive the historical facts relating to our Lord Jesus Christ," we "have a right to draw out of them what general conclusions or doctrines seem" to us "right and true," a correspondent of the English Independent, who thinks the doctor's statement calculated to unsettle the faith of many in the authority of the apostolic teaching, says:

"The truth is, that the apostles were divinely authorised to draw certain doctrines from the facts of the creed, and, in the plenitude of this inspiration, were sent forth into the world to 'preach Christ;' and we are really no more at liberty to refuse our assent to the doctrines which the apostles taught when we have once received the historical facts which they declared about Christ."

The editor, too, of the Independent thinks the doctor's assertion that there are "mistakes and errors in the Bible," should have been accompanied by further explanations, and says:

"We have no intention of raising a cry against him, because he frankly and courageously admits that the theory of the verbal inspiration of the whole Hebrew and Greek Bible cannot be maintained, and would be useless to Englishmen if it could be maintained, since they can know the books only through fallible translations. On the contrary, he deserves the respect and gratitude of all his brethren for his outspoken utterance on this head. At the same time, we believe his zeal has carried him a little too far. There ought to have been set forth, in a popular discourse, some distinction between historical books which make no claim to a verbal or precise inspiration, or to anything beyond substantial historic truth, and books in which a claim is made to direct, if not verbal inspiration, as in the doctrinal writings of the apostles, who profess to speak with nothing less than Divine authority."

The Record publishes two passages from the Sword and Trowel on the poverty of Baptist ministers, with the view of showing the mean proportions of "the giant voluntarism," but forgets to give Mr. Spurgeon's rejoinder that "Giants do not always do their duty."

Speaking last week at a Romish chapel consecration in Dover, Dr. Manning assured that "a brighter day was dawning for the Holy Church." There were "signs of decomposition, disintegration, and decay" in the Protestant Church. Such a change, he opined, "was not of life, but of death." In contrast with the "dissolution" of the National Church, the Archbishop likened the Roman Catholic Church to an acorn, which, by slow degrees, under the lapse of time, grows into a stately oak full of symmetry and splendour.

The Church News, referring to the "Natal scandal," says:

"We very much regret that the Duke of Buckingham has been led to write despatches to the Governors of St. Helena, Natal, and Capetown, which to all intents and purposes are calculated to give a most practical support to Dr. Colenso. Why, in the name of common sense, a minister should go out of his way to conciliate his political opponents, the Erastians, the unbelievers, and the indifferentist, by a policy wrong in itself and disastrous in its effects, we cannot possibly comprehend. Its fruit will be gathered at the next election. We hear, on good authority, that the clergyman who had consented to be consecrated to the vacant see of Natal, contemplates a change of plan, and will decline to accept the appointment owing to the Duke of Buckingham's extraordinary policy."

In a review of "Ecce Homo" and a work on the Atonement, the Times, after contrasting their writers, greatly to the disadvantage of the author of the former, and attributing his cleanness to shallowness, and his success to the attractions of a pellucid style and the advantage of anonymous writing, contends that in his opinion, according to his own statements, the object of the Church is in no degree theological, and that, whatever its object, no theological or religious means are employed in attaining it. This appears to the reviewer to "offer at the outset a gigantic paradox, which convicts the whole production of equal folly and ignorance." "It is competent to a man to argue that Christian theology is false and the Christian religion a delusion; but to say that the Church is not concerned with theology, and achieves its objects without reference to religion is an outrage on plain sense. To a mere critic such a statement of the author's conclusion would afford a sufficient condemnation of his work; but how modern theologians and religious writers can have quietly accepted, and even applauded a book which commences and ends with this repudiation of their most vital principles, is a greater paradox than the paradox of the author."

The Earl of Chichester, President of the Church Missionary Society, has joined Lord Ebury's Society for the Revision of the Liturgy. At the annual meeting, in moving a resolution that efforts should be made for obtaining the removal from the Prayer-book of all words and phrases now used to sanction Romish doctrines and practices, he said:

"When he considered the history of the Liturgy and formularies, and remembered that from the Reformation down to the present time the Church had never made any honest effort to adapt them to the views of the Nonconformists who remained out of her pale, he felt that that was a standing reproach against the wisdom and the charity of the Church of England. He had felt that the more strongly because he found in the writings of the most eminent divines of that Church, from the time of Elizabeth down to the present day, the highest praise bestowed upon the theology and the personal character of Nonconformist ministers and laymen, who were described by them as men who ought to be members of the Church because they so entirely agreed with her in great Protestant and Evangelical truths. He felt an earnest desire for the correction of those faults which had tended to keep persons who were so described out of the Church, and which he believed had produced a still more injurious effect in burdening the consciences of many who were in the Church."

In remarking on an article of the Conservative Globe, the Guardian says:

"To defend the claims of the Church to represent the Church of Christ in England is coolly put aside as irrelevant—not to say very questionable. Every one is aware of the distinction between a 'national Church' and the 'Church of Christ.' But it is curious that a champion of the Bishops, in claiming for the Church of England the former character, should treat it as disputable and of no consequence whether it has a title to the latter." Yet "it is not less true that, both in and out of Parliament, this doctrine is extensively held by people who call themselves Conservatives and friends of the Church."

The Rev. Edward Fellows, in a letter to the Guardian, commenting on Dr. Littledale's language at Liverpool, says:

"I will not attempt to argue the points advanced by him with respect to the Reformers, but to speak of them as 'utterly unredeemed villains' and 'base traitors,' to compare Cranmer, &c., to Robespierre; to call Edward VI. a 'young tiger-cub,' can hardly be consistent with a preacher of charity which 'thinketh no ill.' However bad the Reformers were, surely they had some redeeming qualities! Moreover, the people of this country have been taught to revere those who, whether rightly or wrongly, laid down their lives in the cause of religion. No one can defend the way in which the Reformation was brought about, nor, considering the schisms and divisions of the present day, speak altogether of its blessed effects. But nothing can justify Dr. Littledale's 'Billingsgate.' Again, no man with any decent feeling, however much he may have disapproved of and disliked Lord Palmerston and his ways, would sanction his being alluded to as 'that frivolous old heathen.' But, alas! Ritualistic language is not always discreet; not long ago a brother priest told me I was 'd—d awkward,' because, being bound to stick rigidly to the Prayer-book, I would not fall in with some frivolous Ritualistic practice."

Writing to the same paper on the present state of affairs in the Church, a "Country Vicar" says:

"There is the scandal of the Irish Church, which the Bishops are apparently doing their best to maintain, and there is the scandal of Bishop Colenso, which the Bishops are apparently doing nothing to remove; and, putting the two scandals together, it is somewhat puzzling to understand the position of those who would guard with such vigilance the temporalities of the Church, whilst apparently regardless of her spiritual jurisdiction."

In a sermon, preached on Sunday, at St. James's, Marylebone, from "The words that I speak unto you they are spirit and they are life" (John vi. 63), Professor Jowett said:

"It was difficult to explain the relation in which the spirit of Scripture stood to the words of Scripture, the record of facts being necessarily of a passing and evanescent character. No fact written with pen and ink could be fresh as at first. Questions would arise about them to which no answer could be given, and the sense might alter with the ages, but there never could be any difference with regard to mercy, justice, taking up the cross, and following Christ. It required no metaphysical or theological skill to understand them, and they did not suffer by translation from one language to another. God had made religion moral and not historical, but it seemed to have been the desire of men in all ages to invert that order. The signs and wonders connected with the Feast of Pentecost could not, he contended, have any relation to the Christian life. Such matters involved drawbacks to Christianity, and led many to speak of it as a failure. Some thought that the bounds of Christianity had been already fixed, and that the spirit of Pentecost had evaporated or been extinguished. Certainly, in many cases the spirit of party had taken the place of the spirit of Christ, and instead of Christianity having converted the world, the world had in too many instances converted Christianity. Another reason why it might be said to have failed was that Christians had not taken the right means to secure the end they had in view. Too often they had made faith at war with the progress of knowledge, which was the greatest power in the world. Yet, with all the drawbacks which might be mentioned, it would be a great mistake to suppose that Christianity had not a great influence on the character of the institutions of all countries in which it had prevailed; inestimable blessings had flowed from it even in its mixed and adulterated state. What might be its hope for the future was a question of serious importance. Some earnestly looked for the personal presence of Christ again on earth, while others thought that everything depended upon the union of the Greek and English and Roman Churches. To himself the signs of the times were of a much more common-place character, and did not lead him to look for such events. There was a tendency in the present day to receive the faith of Christ more naturally, and a greater knowledge of human nature, than formerly. They knew better how to treat man, morally and physically; they saw more clearly how it was that he was a mere child of circumstances; and although they had made little progress in the removal of great evils from the large towns, still they had attained to a knowledge of evils of which their fathers were unconscious, and were making some advances towards remedying them. This, indeed, was one of the hopeful signs for the future. If they could keep that path in view they would never be guilty of the absurdity of supposing that they could do good to the souls of men while neglecting their bodies; that they could relieve physical distress by means which enhanced the moral degradation of the people."

In answer to the question, What may the Pope's purpose be in attempting a revival of so utter an anachronism as a General Council? the Times says:

"Alas! What does Pius IX. know of his own purposes? To be a man of mark among Peter's successors, now as constitutional and patriotic Sovereign, now as a propounder of new-fangled dogmas, or embalmer of wholesale saintly batches—such has been the besetting infatuation of the Pontiff. He must do something, that the faithful may have their nine-days' wonder, that another column may arise by the side of that of the Immaculate Conception in the Piazza di Spagna. That nothing will come of the projected Council may be the conviction of all right-minded Romanists; that nothing may come of it must be their earnest prayer; nor is it unlikely that both their hopes and wishes may be realised; for, since the prelates from all parts of the universe went asunder at Trent, Catholicism has ceased to have even a tongue of its own. There is not scholarship enough among the mitred heads of Catholic Christendom to make them equal to a Latin discussion. Were deliberation and not mere show the real object of the meeting, Rome would soon exhibit the spectacle of a new Babel; for, out of their breviary, Roman Catholic priests have no common language whatever. The Pope, however, well knows that a Council such as he conceives does not bring together a multitude of councillors. It is dumb assent, or inarticulate acclamation, that he expects of the assembled prelates; such an assent as was given to his canonisation of Japanese martyrs, such an acclamation as greets his encyclicals and syllabuses."

LITERARIA.

An octavo volume of 200 pages has appeared in Paris, by Hippolyte Rodrigues, on "The Sources of the Sermon on the Mount," the object of which is to "prove scientifically to eyes which do not shun the light" that there is nothing new in Christianity, and that there is not a single moral precept recognised by civilised nations that may not be traced to Jewish Scriptures. In his comparisons, however, of our Lord's discourse with passages from the Old Testament and the Talmud, he hardly goes to work "scientifically," for he assumes that his citations from the latter are "anterior to Jesus," whereas it is known that the Mishna was not reduced to writing till about A.D. 189, the Jewish Talmud about A.D. 396, and the Babylonian about A.D. 500; and in compilations of this kind it is impossible to assign the precise date and authorship to their contents. The conclusion at which M. Rodrigues arrives is that the principles of Mosaicism and Christianity being the same, they should adapt themselves to the scientific and philosophic progress of the age, and thus become the one religion of the world.

Mr. Tallack, the well-known Friend, has just published a new life of George Fox, in which he traces the doctrines and constitution of Quakerism mainly to the early Baptists, more particularly the "General" as distinguished from the "Particular" Baptists. The differences of opinion which arose among them, relative to election and reprobation, about the time of the Civil Wars, resulted in many thousands joining the ranks of Fox and the Friends, but previously to this they appear to have anticipated several of his leading tenets.

A "Dictionary of Christian Antiquities" is in the course of preparation, under the general superintendence of Dr. William Smith. The work is divided into departments, which will be committed to separate editors. It is to comprise the history, institutions, archaeology, and biography of the Church from the age of the Apostles to that of Charlemagne. It will thus stop short of what is usually termed the middle ages; Gothic architecture, the Monastic orders, the Crusades, the Scholastic Philosophy, and Mediæval Antiquities in general being reserved for a separate work, to be published hereafter.

In his travels in the interior of South Africa, an account of which he has printed, Mr. James Chapman fell in with a number of missionaries, and commends their singleness of purpose and good intentions, but does not say much of the result of their efforts. Sometimes the "heathen" get the best of the argument. A certain chief, who was inclined to Christianity, and had carefully studied a translation of the historical books of the Old Testament, objected to part with all his wives save one till a satisfactory explanation was given him why Solomon and David had so many, and were still men after God's own heart. The missionary informed him that all their troubles were owing to their indulgence in many wives and concubines, and added "we have every reason to believe that they might be now undergoing the awful penalties of this their sin." Mr. Chapman laconically remarks that "notwithstanding Mr. M.—'s able discourse the native mind was far from satisfied."

A work on Sacerdotal Celibacy in the Christian Church, by H. C. Lea, of America, in which he traces the celibacy of the clergy historically, and analyses its influence philosophically, is a timely protest against certain tendencies in the Anglican Church. It concludes with this warning:

"A sacerdotal caste, whose interests are in many respects antagonistic to those of the society in which its members live; whose dominant aim, from the nature of the case, must be the temporal advancement of its church, is apt to prove a dangerous element in the body politic, and the true interests of religion are almost as likely to receive injury as benefit at its hands, especially when it is armed with the tremendous power of confession and absolution, and is subjected to strict subordination to a hierarchy."

OLD TESTAMENT CHAPTERS FOR THE SUNDAY SCHOOL.—VII.

SUBJECT: Wisdom as pictured by the Eastern poets."

Read Proverbs viii. 1, ix., 6, where wisdom is described as a heavenly being, a woman who calls to men that they should hearken to her. She tells them she has been the companion of the Almighty even before he created the earth, and she offers to them the choicest of her favours if they will only receive them.

Other very similar examples of this Eastern figure of poetry by which Wisdom is made into a person may be found in the Apocrypha. See, for instance, the Book of the Wisdom of Solomon, chaps. viii. and ix., where the writer declares that he has loved Wisdom and sought her out from his youth, that he purposed to take her to live with him to be his spouse, his counsellor, his comfort in joys and griefs. He then makes a prayer to God that he will give him this Wisdom that sitteth by his throne, that knoweth his works, and was present when he made the world.

For a more Hebrew way of treating the subject, read the beautiful passage in praise of Wisdom, Job xxviii. 12-28: "But where shall wisdom be found, and where is the place of understanding?" "Behold the fear of Jehovah that is wisdom, and to depart from evil that is understanding." And remark that while the heathen nations all around peopled the earth, the air, and the sea with spiritual beings of their own imagining, the instances are very few of a Hebrew writer speaking even in poetic language of any other unseen being or power but God alone.

AMERICAN NOTES.

It is stated that not long since a Massachusetts clergyman, at the beginning of his morning service, took a local paper out of his pocket, and read the prices current of flour, potatoes, meat, groceries, &c. After doing so, he folded up the paper, and, without note or comment, began his regular pulpit duties. Yankees are well known to be good at "guessing," and without much difficulty in this case they guessed what the minister's reason for so singular a proceeding must be. The result was that they went to work and made up a good-sized purse for him, seeing that the salary they were giving was insufficient to meet the advanced prices of the necessities of life.

A correspondent of the New York Methodist, describing Mr. Punshon's first appearance in an American pulpit, at Brooklyn, says:

"His voice is thick at first, harsh and guttural; it has a fuzzy quality, as if the speaker had wool in his throat. But every word is in its place, and the first sentence drops from his lips like a gold coin from the die, exact in symmetry and significance. With that first sentence he has seized the entire auditory, with the first unobtrusive gesture he has fastened their eyes, and for fifty-three minutes they sit magnetised, and never stir nor turn their heads, except to exchange momentary glances with each other. . . . Touches of tenderness make many tears fall at times. Sometimes his voice drops from the oratorical down to a soft, familiar tone, like that of a friend. Then it rises and swells, but never to the trumpet-call. At some of his delineations of the Christian's joy and assurance, hearty amens arise from his Methodist hearers. When he dwells on the soul's conscious discovery of the God-man in Jesus, and cries, 'We have found him of whom Moses in the law and the prophets did write,' there is shouting all around."

Of the church in which he thus preached, Mr. Punshon says, "It is decidedly the most elegant I have ever seen," and adds:

"There were several things which struck me as novelties. Immediately in front was a table for the reporter; to the right of the tribune a pedestal, on which was a very beautiful bouquet of flowers. The church was lighted like the British House of Commons, and the rays streaming through coloured glass, fell with a softened lustre which was cheerful without being dazzling. The total cost of the church was 200,000 dollars, or about £40,000. My only regret about it is that five less expensive churches have not been built instead of this costly one, although, for the large accommodation of every kind which has been provided, the money is not ill-bestowed. On the basement is a large, cheerful room, superbly furnished with carpets, mirrors, piano, &c., which is called 'the church parlour,' and which is the common property of the members. Here monthly reunions are held, and the ladies assemble for Bible classes, Dorcas meetings, and now and then for cheerful evening intercourse."

The New York Observer says that assurances from all sections of both branches of the Presbyterian Church are in favour of reunion, and that the joint committee of the two Assemblies have adopted measures which are a greater advance towards it than any previous ones. The Observer is hopeful, too, respecting the reunion of the Northern and Southern portions of the same church.

The Liberal Christian gives a curious history of the second Baptist Church at Newport. It was founded 211 years ago. It was a Six-Principle Baptist Church, and still holds the rite of confirmation, which is administered to all who come into the church, in the language used by the Bishops of the Episcopal Church. For a hundred years no singing was allowed. When it was introduced, it was amid a violent opposition.

Out of tender regard to the consciences of those who thought singing in church a sin, a vote was passed, allowing such to withdraw while the music was performed; and when the hymn was sung, a part of the congregation went out of doors and stayed in the cold. Thirty years ago the church adopted the practice of open communion, and its present minister, Mr. Malcolm, recently invited the Congregational and Methodist ministers and their churches to a united communion. The invitation was accepted, and a thousand communicants filled the house, the deacons and stewards of the several denominations distributing the elements. For this act the First Baptist Church of Newport has, by vote, withdrawn its fellowship from Mr. Malcolm and his flock, and his conduct is to be considered at the next meeting of the Baptist Association.

Mr. Eli Jones, who has been attending the annual meeting of Friends in London, was formerly a member of the Legislature of the State of Maine, and so popular, it is stated, that on one occasion he was proposed for the dignity of major-general of the second division of the State militia. On hearing of this, he is reported to have said:

"If I accept the election it will only be on condition that my orders are to be implicitly obeyed, and those orders will be as follows—first, 'ground arms'; secondly, 'Right about face'; 'beat your swords into plough-shares and your spears into pruning-hooks, and learn war no more'; thirdly, 'Go home every man to his farm or merchandise, read daily the New Testament, and ponder upon its tidings of peace on earth and goodwill to men.'"

Dr. McCosh, one of the professors in the Queen's College, at Belfast, whose utterances against Church Establishments, some time ago, drew down upon him, as our readers may remember, the dreadful wrath of the Rev. Mr. Rodgers and other hungerers after an increase of the Regium Donum, has been invited to become President of Princeton University, but we have not heard whether he has accepted the appointment.

FRIDAY, JUNE 5, 1868.

DR. RALEIGH'S ADDRESS AND THE CONGREGATIONALISTS.

Our friends the Independents, if we may judge by their leading organ, the English Independent, are in a somewhat disagreeable flutter concerning Dr. RALEIGH's address at the recent Congregational Union Meeting. That address was received with enthusiasm, and "applauded to the echo by the company of learned and unlearned auditors who thronged the Weigh House Chapel on the 12th of May." The Independent, in a leader of its issue of May 15, spoke in rapturous terms of the address, its vigorous thought, beauty of style, its "bold, manly, and outspoken" tone. It says "The manner in which the Union received it did it infinite credit." It further declares, concerning the reception of the address: "There is plainly a conviction that, in the Congregational Union, of all places, there must be 'liberty of prophesying.'"

We can, for the most part, endorse the eulogistic laudation of the English Independent. Dr. RALEIGH's address is a very able and eloquent one. It indicates the effect upon the writer of the scientific tendencies of the age, and evinces his desire to make evangelical orthodoxy acceptable to men of science and criticism. It is remarkably outspoken for a denomination, which, in spite of many real excellencies and much profession of liberty, still tenaciously clings to the written and unwritten law of a narrow Puritanical theology. It may be that the concessions made in it to critical objectors are, as the English Independent said last week in a review of the address, made only to win men to accept the dogmatic authority which they ought at once to submit to. But we are glad to see that a man so eminent as Dr. RALEIGH in his denomination, and upon such an occasion as the meeting of the Congregational Union, should have ventured to utter observations which mark him at least as a progressive man in theology. Of course, in the address, we see that a decidedly evangelical position is maintained, and Dr. RALEIGH might himself shrink from the imputation of heresy. Still, there are significant admissions in it; and its tone indicates that he believes it no longer possible to maintain orthodoxy by the old ways of dogmatic assertion.

For instance, Dr. RALEIGH states that the acceptance of the facts of Christianity, namely, "the birth, the labours, the miracles, the sufferings, the death, the resurrection of JESUS of NAZARETH," being based upon the most reliable historical testimony, does not involve the acceptance of the "dogma" concerning these facts as well. He says:

"Facts and doctrines are clearly, at least in a measure, separable things; and that, while facts proved are imperial and authoritative, demanding assent and full recognition—from each person alike the same quality of mental act—the doctrines cannot be placed in the same category, and require, in fact, quite different faculties for their verification. To claim for the whole body of orthodox doctrine (if, indeed, any one could tell exactly what that is) the same authority in kind and degree as is claimed for the actuality of the leading personages and events of Gospel history, is to supersede altogether the free action of human reason on religious truth, and to extinguish at a stroke—that is as like a Papal stroke as anything can well be—the right and duty of private judgment."

While declaring that facts cannot be accepted without doctrine, and vindicating himself from the idea of holding the "loose detestable sentiment" that one doctrine is as "good as another," Dr. RALEIGH furthermore states, in very emphatical words, that doctrines, even in Scripture, must be tested by the "verifying faculty" in each individual, and judged accordingly.

Nor am I for a moment forgetting that the Scriptures are didactic as well as historical, and that narrative and dogma are much interwoven—some whole epistles being engaged with simply the development of fact into doctrine. There are true, mixed, false doctrines: "doctrines of devils," "doctrines of men," and "doctrines of God." But what then? We are still left without any infallible instrument of verification, except that which, happily, each individual may attain in the right use of his faculties, and in right personal relation with God. But each must discern and decide for himself: cannot—absolutely cannot transfer this responsibility to another, since the professed transference would be, in fact, the use of the power; would be, if it were a rational act at all, deciding that another had ability and authority to decide. If men think and decide at all, they must use a private judgment, and therefore, instead of contesting the point by seeking to impose a whole system of authoritative doctrine along with the facts, the part of justice and wisdom is to concede frankly the broad practical distinction that exists between facts and doctrines, that there may be agreement in the first, and yet divergence in the second; that the frank acceptance of the first will put a man in the way of truth and safety; and that we may trust to the free action of the human intellect, to the advancement of knowledge, to the teaching of the Scriptures, and to the influence of the Spirit of God, to elucidate the true doctrines, companions of the true facts, in the end."

We need not be surprised, after this bold statement, to find Dr. RALEIGH rejecting the verbal inspiration of the Scriptures. Referring to the absurdity of claiming for the "sixty little books, tractates, letters" composing the Bible, "divine infallibility in every letter and line," he remarks:

We need not wonder—we may rejoice that such a pretension is decisively rejected by thinking men as a pretension which, in fact, can only be verified by the co-ordinate supposition of a constantly-inspired and infallible authority somewhere in the Church. No. It is just as certain that there are errors and mistakes in the Bible, considered as a human book, as it is certain that fallible men wrote the several parts of it, distinguished and selected them, one by one from other contemporary writings, copied them from manuscripts, translated them from one language into another.

These instances may suffice to show the nature of Dr. RALEIGH's admissions; though they do but scant justice to the broad catholic tone, the calm wisdom, and fervid eloquence of the address itself. We rejoice to be able to rank Dr. RALEIGH among those who love truth beyond faithfulness to obsolete standards, and who dare to speak honestly their convictions even at some risk.

But the Congregationalists having recovered from the spell of their chairman's eloquence, are now beginning to discern heresy in the address, and to qualify their first approbation by criticising its statements. In the English Independent of last week there are no less than three separate references to the address, objecting, in more or less mild terms, to various of its declarations.

The editors, apparently desirous of recalling the enthusiastic praises of a former number, in a review of the address, allow Dr. RALEIGH to be rather severely taken to task. Believing it to be simply impossible that the chairman of the Union can be unsound in any detail of the orthodox faith, the reviewer thinks it undesirable to discuss great theological subjects in a presidential harangue, because Dr. RALEIGH has been bold in speech, and complains of the very rhetoric which made the address acceptable to the hearers. He objects to Dr. RALEIGH's views about the differing authority of the Christian facts and the dogma arising out of them. He considers that the chairman's zeal against plenary inspiration led him too far. He complains of the "vain expenditure of needless concessions" in the address, and sums up by saying:

On the whole, the first part of Dr. Raleigh's Address must not be taken as representative of the opinions of all Congregationalists. We allow great freedom to good men; but it is very probable that the next five years may prove that other utterances, more friendly to the ancient standards of opinion, will receive equally enthusiastic plaudits from an assembly not very critical, and wholly destitute of judicial authority.

A "Country Brother," in the same number, considers some of Dr. RALEIGH's concessions as too liberal, and some of his positions, unless carefully guarded, as dangerous, not to say fatal, to the cause their adoption was meant to serve. But he rejoices that the Congregational Union is strong enough and free enough to allow the chairman to speak for himself.

A correspondent, also in the same number, wishes Dr. RALEIGH to explain his views relative to the acceptance of doctrines, because he fears the authority of the apostles and the plenitude of their inspiration infringed upon in the address.

These adverse utterances seem to indicate that Dr. RALEIGH is beginning now to be thought rather dangerously neological. We cannot tell whether his views will meet with a general expression of dissent. He will doubtless feel it due to himself to explain his positions a little further. We can only hope that he will not be induced to qualify statements which appear to be the result of earnest conviction, or to explain them away until they are shorn of any positive meaning whatever.

It is bad when, in a denomination professing to be so liberal and tolerant and advanced as that of the Independants, a man like Dr. RALEIGH, however eminent, cannot express his most cherished opinions without being suspected of heresy. We shall await with interest the results of Dr. RALEIGH's outspoken address. The Independents have evidently much yet to learn in the way of investigating and accepting the conclusions of liberal thought. It is a good sign when one of their most eminent men places himself in the van of progressive inquiry. We trust they will learn to have confidence in the truth, to encourage the honest expression of conviction, to welcome the developments of scientific criticism, and to be true to their dictum that there must in the church be "liberty of prophesying."

ANGELS EVERYWHERE.

"Millions of spiritual creatures walk the earth Unseen, both when we wake and when we sleep."
Milton.

A MYRIAD angels hover about this earth below,
And in and out our thresholds their footsteps come and go,
While in our very blindness their forms we do not know.

They sing to us in music, they smile on us in dreams,
They speak to us in echoes the worldly spirit deems But chirruping of woodbirds and chattering of streams.

They make light in our corners, they purify our air,
They take our hands unconscious, and guide us unaware;
The presence of their ministry is sweetly everywhere.

They sit up in the nursery, and kiss the babes to sleep;
Across the holy hearth-place they join their hands to keep

The light of love undimmed by the tears pained hearts do weep.

They lurk about the sick room, and trace upon the wall

Quaint legends for still musings when twilight shadows fall,
And pleasant thoughts and words they help us to recall.

Then steal they near the bed-side, and hold our passive hands,
And talk to us of strange things that health scarce understands,
Till home-like to the soul grow far-off heavenly lands.

THE WINDOW THAT MADE FACES UGLY.

PART VII.

LITTLE Harry's father continued his story.—The mother, and nurse, and little Jane, a year younger than Harry, and Joey, three years younger, being present.

I was confirmed in my hatred to the orthodox religion, and the orthodox God, by two incidents that happened when I was just growing into manhood.

I had been bound apprentice to a chemist, in a large establishment in the West End of London. There was a fellow-apprentice, a Scotchman, with whom I formed a friendship. We visited at each other's lodgings, and often took rambles on the Sunday together into the country. James was far more religious, or rather I should say more theological than I was, never having thrown off the stern Calvinistic notions in which he had been educated. He had formed an attachment to the daughter of his landlady, who, I had every reason to suppose, returned his affection. Just as he was out of his time a fellow-countryman came to London to seek employment. James lent him money, allowed him to share his lodgings, indeed, literally kept him, until he could get employment. At last, by his own exertions, he got Alexander into the establishment in which we were employed. And now it came out that all the time that he had been actually maintained by his friend, this traitor had been using his opportunity to win the affections of the young woman whom James considered engaged to himself. When Emily was taxed with her perfidy she confessed her preference for Alexander, and James and she parted in anger.

The wrath and indignation of James at this treachery of his friend seemed to drive him into madness. "It was not any enemy," he said, as David had said of old, "for then I could have borne it. It was mine own familiar friend, in whom I trusted, which did eat of my bread." The trouble so affected poor James's mind that I was obliged to take him to my own lodging, and watch over him as a brother. But he was always dwelling on the treachery of his false friend, and on the vastness and blackness of his guilt, and the awful punishment it deserved. He would say "Hanging was too good for such hellish iniquity. The wretch deserved to die by inches. Nay, he deserved to live but to have a curse for ever hanging over him. His business should fail; his friends should become his enemies; his false wife, when she became his wife, should betray him; his children should waste away before his eyes; and he should die the death of a dog, to go and meet a more awful punishment in another world." I saw that it had become a luxury to James to magnify the offence of the false friend, and gloat over the punishment it merited.

Such terrible vengeance was as new as it was horrible to me. I used to remonstrate with James and try to wean him from his terrible thoughts. I would tell him how wrong it was to cherish these deadly and vengeful feelings.

He would reply, "You wrong me; I do not cherish vengeful feelings; I only look at his sin as I believe God looks at it. God looks upon it with righteous wrath, and sees it bad enough and horrible enough to deserve burning in Hell-fire for ever and ever, and why should I not see it as God sees it. No, you are mistaken, I do not harbour thoughts of doing vengeance, I only measure the sin and think what vengeance it deserves. Vengeance itself I leave to God. 'Vengeance is mine. I will repay, saith the Lord.'"

I knew not what to say to this. To one who believed in a God of vengeance, a God whose vengeance was eternal torment, it was a reasonable conclusion. But it made me shudder at such a God still more, and I would say, "It seems to me, James, that this thought, that your God keeps a hell for those who sin against him, is feeding a hell in your mind, which is making you devilish yourself; and that hell in your mind, if you don't watch it, will explode, burst all restraints away, and drive you to the vengeance which you delude yourself into the idea you are not cherishing."

And so it was; notwithstanding all his protestations that it would never be—the volcano burst out. He could bear his sense of wrong, and his thirst for the punishment of his wronger, no longer. He went one evening to his old lodgings, burst into the room where Alexander was sitting with the false Emily, took out a pistol and shot him dead with one barrel, and then put an end to his own life with the other.

I felt that the horrible state of mind out of which this double murder had come had been largely fostered by the horrible belief in a God of eternal wrath.

The other incident which joined with this to increase my utter disgust to the orthodox religion was as follows: I had a sister who lived at Richmond; she had been left a widow with one little boy on whom she doted. He was about twelve; a beautiful boy, and as good as he was beautiful—high spirited, truthful, generous, brave, affectionate. His mother was a strict Methodist, and had tried to indoctrinate Charlie with her own views, but somehow Charlie did not take to them. They seemed to fall away from him like water from the feathers of a bird.

One evening in the summer she had been to chapel, leaving her boy at home to mind the house, which was a cottage near the Thames. The sermon happened to be on the sin of Sabbath breaking, and the preacher described how God would doom to punishment in hell's hottest fires those who insulted His Majesty by violating His Sabbath. My poor sister went home determined to impress this lesson upon Charlie, but, alas, just as she came to her door she found a crowd, among whom was borne the corpse of her poor boy. He had been tempted by some companions, and by the beautiful evening, to get into a boat, and push out upon the Thames. In the heedlessness of the boys the boat had become upset, and two of them had been drowned.

My poor sister took the body of her dear child in her arms and laid it on her bed, but never smiled again. It was not merely the loss of her boy that pressed on her mind; it was the picture of him in hell fire—stretching out his hands to her who could not help him—that haunted her. For she had no doubt that this was his fate, having died in mortal sin, breaking the Sabbath. Ah, poor woman, what an idea she had of her God, that He could doom His own creature, this poor little boy, to agony through never-ending ages, for having been tempted out by His own sunshine and His own balmy air and shining river, to enjoy the gladness of youth on the Sunday!

My poor sister struggled with her awful misery, fed by these horrible imaginings, as long as she could, moving about her daily work like a machine. At last her brain gave way under the terrible picture that was never absent, night nor day. She became raving mad, and had to be confined in an asylum, where, for five years, she was one of the most violent of the inmates, always seeming to have before her the torments of the damned, and shrieking and howling in sympathy with them, until death came to end her agony, and let her find again, in heaven, and dwelling amid the Father's love, the child whom she had dreamt of as in hell, suffering under the Father's wrath.

These two incidents so increased my horror of orthodoxy, that I made up my mind for ever that, as to eternal torment, it was—it must be—a huge and hideous delusion, which it was my duty to hate and to protest against as long as I had breath.

CROSSING THE ATLANTIC.

In a letter to the Methodist Recorder, the Rev. W. M. Punshon thus describes his voyage to America: "There is something grand, even to awfulness, in the thought of utter helplessness which you feel at sea. Sky and water—with no living thing visible over the vast expanse—for days together, just your own vessel with its human freight—and God. To a thoughtful mind there is no surer teaching both of humility and of trust. From the time we entered the Atlantic until close upon our arrival at New York, we had persistent headwinds, so that, if we would advance at all, we must make gallant way against them. Indeed, save only that we were mercifully preserved from peril, we had in our eleven days' voyage a compression of the experience of all possible voyages. I could not help thinking that it set forth in similitude the history of many a Christian life. Calm at the start; broken and troubled water when the Atlantic surges met us; heavy gales, blowing furiously against our progress; a sea majestic in its wrath, now making the ship to shake with trembling, now drenching it with showers of spray; the presence of three large icebergs, beautiful but dangerous neighbours; a shroud of fog which wrapped the heavens from our sight for a day and a half, during which the dreary fog-horn groaned out its dirge-like sound; calmer water as we approached the land, and then a brilliant sun, and a sea of exquisite beauty, as we sailed through the Narrows, and anchored in the fair haven.

"The passengers who are grouped together in temporary intercourse on a voyage are always an interesting study. Ours were for the most part intelligent and gentlemanly, with much respect for the ordinances of religion. They were of several nations, and of many pursuits in life. A New York banker and a Boston editor sat side by side with Liverpool merchants, and young English soldiers, stalwart representatives of the fair-haired Saxon. Yonder is a Spanish count, bilious and gloomy—here an aged apostle of temperance, who has spent a fortune in the spread of information upon its principles, and who has just had an interview with the Emperor of the French, whom he hopes to convert by-and-bye. There the popular author of 'Framley Parsonage,' yonder the 'stump orator' of a company of itinerant minstrels—popular also, though on a lower level. Here is a lady with two children, on her way to join her husband in California, who will be six weary weeks before she reaches the end of her travel. Oppressed with a sorrow which no stranger may share there, there is a gentleman who left New York a month ago, accompanied to the ship by a son of twenty-eight years of age, then in perfect health; but the fever has stricken him, and the telegram has summoned the father to a bereft and cheerless home. We had also on board a cool specimen of an American trader, who was currently rumoured to have with him a large quantity of what would be purchased at Niagara as genuine 'Table Rock,' but which was in reality Derbyshire spar, which he had been to England to buy.

"It was a work of no small difficulty, and yet a privilege of no common order to be permitted to preach on two Sabbaths in the ship's saloon. On the first Sabbath we were at anchor in Queenstown harbour, but on the second we were coursing swiftly through the water, and every motion of the vessel made you a Ritualist against your will. Still, the motley gathering—the crew (all of them who could be spared from duty) dressed in their Sunday best, and grouped in the lower part of the saloon; the passengers, of different nations, habits, beliefs, modes of thought, but all reverently gathered for the acknowledgment of God, and all apparently sincere in their responses to the litany of prayer, and respectful in their listening to the Word of Life—made the services at once novel and impressive. Our captain read the liturgy—an office which he never delegates to another; and right well he read it too—with a sonorous voice and appropriate emphasis, to attain which many an authorised reader of the service on land might well sit at his feet; and I endeavoured, afterwards, to rouse my hearers and myself to Christian manliness and heroism. The 'bread' thus 'cast upon the waters,' may haply be 'found after many days.'"

THE LONDON DOMESTIC MISSION.

On Sunday, the 24th ult., the sermons on behalf of this society were preached by the Rev. WILLIAM JAMES, of Bristol, in the morning at Little Portland-street, and in the evening at Brixton. The collections amounted to £77. 3s. 5d. in the morning, and £15 in the evening.

On Monday evening the annual meeting of the members and friends of the Mission was held at University Hall, Gordon-square; the Rev. J. J. TAYLER, B.A., Principal of Manchester New College, in the chair. The Common Hall was well filled with ladies and gentlemen, and among those present were—Meadows Martineau, Esq., LL.B., treasurer, and E. Enfield, Esq., secretary of the Mission; Mr. Corkran and Mr. Heywood, the ministers of the two Mission stations; the Revs. W. James, James Martineau, J. C. Means, T. Hunter, L. Lewis, Dr. Sadler, T. L. Marshall, John Taylor, J. Dare; and Messrs. P. Worsley, D. Martineau, R. Scott, A. Preston, J. Mitchell, A. Simon, E. J. Nettleton, J. T. Preston, J. Robson, B.A., E. Wright, F. Nettleton, B. Lewis, E. T. Whitfield, A. Titford, C. Hill, I. M. Wade, R. Dunn, N. M. Vertue, J. T. Hart, W. A. Case, M.A., I. S. Lister, T. C. Clarke, T. Smith Osler, LL.B., and W. D. Jeremy, M.A.

The proceedings commenced with the reading of the reports. The treasurer's report showed a balance in favour of the society of £60. 7s. 9d., arising, however, from the application to the ordinary expenditure of the year of donations and legacies. The treasurer announced that he had received a letter from Mrs. Mary Taylor, of Hook, announcing a donation to the society of £200, since increased to £300.

E. ENFIELD, Esq., then read the committee's report; after which, the missionaries' reports were read by the Rev. C. L. COREKRA and Rev. JOHN HEYWOOD. As these will be published, and as the various business transacted, with the names of the speakers, has already been published, we shall confine ourselves to giving our readers the addresses of the Revs. J. J. Tayler and James Martineau.

The CHAIRMAN, in moving the adoption of the reports said, We meet here, year after year and hear from our excellent missionaries reports bringing before us year after year very nearly the same details respecting the condition of the working classes, and the efforts made for their instruction and improvement; yet instead of finding his own interest in the work diminished he felt it strengthened; he felt every year more and more the great duties incumbent upon us whom Providence has placed in favourable circumstances, and blessed with powers to exercise a good influence upon others, to use whatever powers and influence we possess in aid of our missionaries in this truly evangelical and benevolent work. The peculiar element of their Mission was that it was essentially a religious work; it was not proposed merely to enlighten the understanding and improve the outward condition, important as that also undoubtedly was; but the principle was acted upon that until you can appeal to the conscience and improve the moral nature, you do not touch the deepest springs of life. He granted that improved legislation may do much for the working classes, and was willing to hope much from political reform; but unless we get at the inner man, purify the affections, and give a more permanent and elevated direction to the religious aspects of our nature, all those matters relating to the intellect and the outward circumstances may only make a man a more highly cultivated and efficient animal, but contribute little to his higher moral and spiritual welfare. A great deal has been done in this way, but, unfortunately, the efforts of the religious portion of the community have been very much marred by their misdirection. But a change was taking place in the religious condition of the community. He had lately had a conversation with a highly accomplished Oxford man, who expressed the feeling largely prevailing, he believed, among the class to which he belonged, their earnest wish to take some part in contributing to raise the condition of their fellow-beings without mixing themselves up in wretched sectarian matters. Gladly would he do this in connection with some broad Christian Church which had a higher object than mere sectarian proselytism. He (the chairman) thought that the ardent and enthusiastic might well work under the judicious guidance of our missionaries, and a greater amount of sympathy and active co-operation with their work would be an inestimable aid to them. The financial report, on the whole, was not unfavourable, but it was much to be regretted that the balance did not result from any increase in annual subscriptions, but from donations and legacies, which, instead of being invested as a permanent fund, had been applied to meet various expenses of the past year. Our older friends are passing away; we are losing valuable supporters; and he would say to a younger generation, whatever it may cost, you must not let a society like this fail in efficiency from want of funds. We often heard of the march of intellect in these days, but he must say that the march of luxury struck him much more than the march of knowledge or goodness. We attach the greatest importance to social position, and if their means allowed it he was no ascetic and found no fault; but he would urge upon them that this society must not suffer even if they have to cut off some of their superfluous luxuries. Let them show the power of self-denial and self-sacrifice. He believed that this was an institution which would infuse into the lower classes of society precisely those moral and religious influences, that power of self-control and self-respect which will be necessary to carry this great country safely through the vast social and political changes which await us. (Loud applause.)

The Rev. JAMES MARTINEAU, in seconding a motion of cordial sympathy with the missionaries, said: One of the great merits, at the same time one of the great difficulties of the Mission is to be found in the vast scope and varieties of the objects it comprises. He was talking the other day to a friend of the widest experience in this country in relation to the condition of the poor; one of the most eminent promoters of education, to whom we owe the present system of national education, and he made the remark in reference to the various efforts in which he had been personally engaged, "It always appeared to me that some monstrous difficulty pressed upon society which must be removed before any effort can be made effectually to ameliorate the condition of the lower classes. Early in life I had a great desire to see the old poor-law removed, which seemed to be the cause of the demoralisation of the poor, and the other strata of society which might in any way come under its influence; we had the greatest hope that when the new poor-law was carried one of the greatest evils we deplored would be abolished; but I have outlived that expectation.

Then the sanitary question came up, and we thought that if we could regulate the sanitary conditions under which the poor live, we should cut off a fruitful source of evil. We have got sanitary regulations carried out more efficiently, and now the house question, the over-crowding of the poor in miserable dwellings seems to be the great evil that stands in our way." And so it is; we seem to be always meeting some great bar obstructing our cause. But it is always a fatal mistake when reformers charge each other with beginning at the wrong end; as when sanitary reformers say to missionaries, it is no use to give religious instruction until you have attended to the health of the poor; and when those who are zealous for model lodging-houses say that nothing can be done until you have provided better homes for the poor. What would become of our great social ills if our missionaries and others, interested in the poor and neglected, were to stand aside until all these outward things were adjusted? Who but Christian missionaries that go among the poor with high aims and religious purpose, and find themselves checked by these obstacles at the outset, are the best fitted to let light in upon the dark places of our social condition? We need not despair of producing an elevation in the character of the poor by the moral and spiritual appeal even during the time when these evils are existing. When he considered the character of ancient civilisation at the time that Christianity won its first triumphs over the world, when he considered the condition of Rome, Marseilles, and other great cities of antiquity, and read indications in the Roman satirists and early Christian writers of the state of society, is it for us to despair of producing an impression upon the character of the people, when Christianity was carried successfully over all the evils of the Roman empire? It showed great want of faith to despair, instead of remembering that our human nature is a whole, and endeavouring to grasp it in all its dimensions. The great evil in our present condition of society arose from the huge accumulation of masses we have to deal with in almost every social problem that comes before us. There were, no doubt, great economical advantages in the vaster agencies with which the work of the world is now carried on. As in material things, co-operation is attended by a great saving; so, if we do our public charities by public institutions, we save a great deal of money and do great good; but a most serious question is whether the moral forces of society are susceptible of this accumulation, and whether anything can replace the natural relations of mankind, and the personal influence of mind upon mind and heart upon heart; whether the distribution of the moral duties of society and individuals is not more favourable to the character of mankind than the mode in which everything is now worked by institutions. The merit of this institution as compared with other institutions is that it is especially founded upon personal influences, and the missionaries bring themselves into personal contact with those under their care. But the tendency of society filled him with anxiety. The Oxford friend, to whom the chairman had referred, seemed to have the idea that if we can only create in London institutions similar to the Catholic brotherhoods, where wealthy young laymen could work for a few weeks among the poor in association and under the direction of experienced persons; and sisterhoods, where young ladies could occupy their time under similar directions; we should have troops coming up to take part in the work at intervals of a few weeks at a time. But he felt constrained to say that these are not duties to be performed in this way for "a few weeks at a time," but by direct moral relations and personal sympathies and affections; and until we can find our way to simpler and more natural relations of different orders and classes with one another, it would be very difficult to do any really effectual work for the improvement of our social conditions. One great source of hope is that many excellent men and women connected with our religious societies are at last awaking to the importance of social problems, and are more anxious to perform their duties to the poor. We cannot say that there is now, as in the last century, any coldness or indifference in this matter. All are more anxious to recognise their duty, and to take their share in the work. But there is now the new danger that people crowd around the poor, that they begin to quarrel who shall heal them, that while all anxious to enact the part of the Good Samaritan, they fear lest some unconsecrated oil should be poured in, or that the wounds be bound up with some poisoned bandages; nay, they dispute with each other upon which beast he should be carried to the inn. We have to learn that the heavenly balm which is to heal the evils of society is not found in any patent oil, or any special kind of ambulation, or any ecclesiastical magic, but rather in the heavenly charity which shall bring them all to feel that they have one nature. This is the next step to be taken in our charities, and this is the spirit in which this mission has been established, and, from first to last, has been conducted. No reproach could be brought against their missionaries that there has been any narrowness or shrinking from duty. He hoped that that high example would have told upon the district in which they labour, or come as a gentle suggestion when there is so much sectarian strife and absurd waste of benevolence from the eager competition of different churches and societies, and that our missionaries will come in as natural successors of humanity when sects are tired of their disputes with each other. (Much applause.)

THE IRISH UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN SOCIETY.

THE thirty-eighth anniversary services of this society were held, on the 17th ult., in Stephen's-green Chapel, Dublin, when, the preacher being the Rev. John Lettis Short, of Sheffield, the subject of the morning discourse was, "Unitarianism not a destruction but a fulfilment of the Gospel;" and of the evening, "The Capacity of Man to receive and assimilate the Spirit of God."

On Tuesday evening following, the annual social meeting of the friends and members of the society was held in the large schoolrooms under the church. After tea the chair was taken by LUCIUS O. HUTTON, Esq., the president of the society, who alluded to some of the principal events which have happened during the last year in connection with our faith. In referring to the proposed withdrawal of all grants from religious bodies in Ireland, and the probable effects it may have on our body, he said there could be little doubt that the immediate result would be that a few of the smaller congregations would very likely become extinct on the death or removal of their present ministers. Whether congregations kept alive by means of such grants are advantageous, or whether they are a strength to us or not was a matter of opinion; but, on the whole, he thought that the efforts and sacrifices that will have to be made will be of advantage to the body.

To the sentiment, "The Irish Unitarian Christian Society," the secretary, the Rev. D. D. JEREMY, responded and gave an account of what this society had done during the past year, and read some interesting communications which he had received from religious inquirers in reply to the society's advertisements, offering information and tracts illustrative of the principles of Unitarian Christianity. He also referred to the case of "J. Murphy," who, on being lodged in Mountjoy Prison for a political offence, had been placed in a punishment cell and harshly treated, because he refused to conform to any of the religions professed by the chaplains. Mr. Jeremy mentioned that the committee of the Irish Unitarian Society had become very much interested in the case, and taken steps to bring public opinion to bear on it.

"A cordial welcome to the Rev. John Lettis Short, and thanks for his services on Sunday last," was proposed by Dr. KENNEDY, and seconded by Mr. W. D. ANDREWS, barrister-at-law.

Mr. SHORT, in his reply, said: We are living in one of the most important theological eras the world has seen. Not only are the old dogmas uprooted, but the very soil out of which they sprang is deemed exhausted. Our men of science smile at them as relics of the past; our philosophers ignore them as having no base in the facts of experience, and, most lamentable of all, our younger clergy, while still using them as the formulae of their preaching, have largely repudiated them in their secret thought. A scientific friend having a large acquaintance scattered over England, Scotland, and Ireland, informed him, only last week, that he was astounded at the number of the younger clergy who no longer hesitate, in private, to declare to him that the old formulae and Church creeds no longer express their convictions. This is the saddest aspect of the revolution of religious thought through which we are passing. Doubtless these gentlemen have methods satisfactory to themselves of reconciling their consciences with the positions in which they are placed; but nevertheless the anomaly of their condition is acting disastrously upon the morals of the community. When the religious leaders and teachers of a people are felt by a community to entertain convictions which are not perfectly in accord with the forms of doctrine they are proclaiming from week to week, the consciences of that community, so far from being braced by the instructions of such teachers, are themselves rendered flaccid, and the ministrations which should strengthen the good and holy and true within them are pointed to as apologies for their own derelictions of duty. There are indications that these evils, however great, are only incidental, and that out of the ashes of the old dogmas there are arising new faiths in deeper harmony with human nature, with the facts of human life, and with the glorious Gospel that has vitalised so much of what is beautiful and true in the past history of humanity. Referring to his connection with the new Christian Union, Mr. Short said that movement has originated in a more generous recognition among us of late years than had been our wont amid the controversies that were forced upon us by the necessities of our position, of what was a primary doctrine with our fathers—the Holy Catholic Church of God is constituted not of the members of any one sect in Christendom, but of the good, the holy and the true in every sect, yea, of all true children of the Universal Father who crave for at-one-ment with Him, whether they be within or without the boundaries of a professed Christianity. It seeks to become the representative—whether it will do so successfully or not the event alone can show, and is a matter of secondary moment—but it seeks to become the representative, not of a theory, but of a widely acknowledged fact.

"Civil and Religious Liberty all the World over," was responded to by Mr. ANDREW PORTER, barrister-at-law. The meeting was then addressed by J. B. WHITEHEAD, Esq., and Dr. STEWART, of Lucan.

INTELLIGENCE.

ASTLEY.—The chapel accommodation at this place has recently been increased by about seventy seats, the bottom schoolroom having been thrown open so as to be used for service.

BRADFORD.—The annual school sermons were preached on Sunday last, in the morning and evening, by the Rev. William Gaskell, M.A., when the collections were larger than usual.

BRISTOL: LEWIN'S MEAD.—The annual excursion of the scholars took place on Whit-Monday to a farm and grounds in the village of Charlton, Gloucestershire, at the invitation of W. Baker, Esq. Nearly 300 children were conveyed in vans, and were joined during the day by a large number of friends of the congregations from Bristol and Clifton, with the respective ministers. Games and refreshments, as usual, were heartily enjoyed. The friends and visitors also sat down to tea in a tent erected in a spacious orchard.

BURTON-UPON-TRENT.—The Rev. Wm. Oates has just delivered a course of three doctrinal lectures in this thriving and populous town. The subjects were—"Original Sin," "The True Atonement," and "Eternal Torments." About one hundred people attended on the first evening, over three hundred on the second, and upwards of five hundred on the third. Each lecture which contained much plain speaking, was listened to very attentively, and frequently applauded. On every occasion discussion was invited, and was accepted by the Rev. G. French, B.A., of the Established Church, and several other gentlemen. In the midst of great excitement, though there was some over-zeal, there was no discourtesy or tumult. So much cannot be said for the local press, which was not satisfied with manifesting a strong bias in favour of popular opinions, but positively misrepresented the true character of the proceedings. This, however, will be exposed. At the close, the lecturer was urged by very many to visit Burton again.

HORSHAM, SUSSEX.—The anniversary services were held last Sunday, when friends were present from London, Brighton, Lewes, Guildford, Godalming, Ditching, Billingshurst, and Petworth. In the morning the Rev. Robert Spears conducted the worship, and preached an effective sermon on the universality of the Divine love and care. In the afternoon a number joined in partaking of the Lord's Supper, and in the evening a social meeting was held. The Rev. J. W. Braithwaite presided, and spoke of the condition of the congregation and of the Unitarian cause generally, expressing the conviction that, whatever the state of individual churches might be, there is great cause for rejoicing at the rapid spread of the truth which Unitarianism represents. Mr. Knight, of Crawley, moved the thanks of the meeting to Mr. Spears, who made one of his earnest and heart-stirring addresses, in which he strongly urged Unitarians to cultivate Christian sympathy and friendly intercourse. The Rev. J. W. Forsyth, of Godalming, spoke on the subject of Church Establishments, and the Rev. J. F. Kennard, of Billingshurst, also addressed the meeting.

IDLE: HIGHFIELD CHAPEL.—The Sunday-school anniversary services were held on the afternoon and evening of May 24th. The Rev. D. Berry, of Mossley, preached on both occasions. The collections amounted to £5. 3s. On Whit-Monday, the scholars held their annual festival in a field, kindly lent by Mr. J. Bottomley, adjoining to the schoolroom for tea, and for further play. It was very successful.

LONDON: ISLINGTON.—Miss Carpenter is again about to visit India, in the important mission of female education. She feels, with many of the leading minds of our day, that little can be done for a nation while the women are kept in gross ignorance. She will speak at Islington, London, on Thursday night. (See advertisement.)

MANCHESTER SUNDAY-SCHOOL UNION.—On Sunday last, the scholars of the various schools went, according to annual custom, to Cross-street Chapel, which they filled in every part. There were upwards of 2,000 children and people present. The Rev. T. E. Poynting was the preacher, and delivered an address to them from Matt. xxii., 11, in which he pointed out the loathsomeness of ignorance and vice. The music was excellent and the singing hearty, as it always is, and was thoroughly enjoyed.

NEWINGTON GREEN.—We understand that the Rev. J. K. Applebee, of Devonport, has accepted an invitation to conduct the Sunday morning services for six months from midsummer, and that they will be conducted up to that time by the Rev. Henry Solly.

RAWTESTALL.—On Sunday, the 24th ult., the school sermons were preached by the Rev. Jeffery Worthington, of Bolton, when the collections amounted to £21. 2s. 6d.

RIVINGTON.—On Sunday last, the school sermons were preached at this place by the Rev. J. E. Odgers, M.A., of Kendal, when the collections amounted to £19. 2s. 6d.

SHEFFIELD.—As an indication of the high estimation in which the Rev. J. L. Short is held at Sheffield, it is worth recording here that, at the last meeting of the local committee for conducting the Cambridge middle-class examinations, Mr. Short was elected by the clergy and tutors a member of the committee, being the only Nonconformist minister upon it. Mr. Short has also been requested by the committee to give an address at the annual meeting, when prizes are to be distributed to the successful candidates.

STOCKTON-ON-TEES.—On Sunday last, the Sunday-school sermons were preached by the Rev. John Whitworth, of Sunderland. There are 60 children receiving religious instruction in this school.

THOMAS PARGETER'S, OF FOXCOTE, CHARITY.—This very important charity, founded by the late Miss Pargeter, of Foxcote, and by her ordered to be called after the name of her deceased father, is now in operation. The trustees (being the Unitarian ministers of Netherend, Cradeley, and nine other chapels of the neighbourhood) met on Monday last, in the office of Messrs. Harding and Sons, Birmingham, and elected sixty-four annuitants, forty-four of whom will receive £20 a year each; the remaining twenty being ten pairs of sisters members of ten different families will receive individually £16 a year, or £32 for two.

WARMINGSTER.—The Inquirer says that the old Presbyterian Chapel of this place, which has been kept open for so many years chiefly through the liberality of the Wansey family, has just been closed, no member of that family now residing in the neighbourhood.

CORRESPONDENCE.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

ERRATUM.—In Mr. Tagart's letter last week, last paragraph, for what Unitarianism "was" read "is." W. S. F.—Received.

CHELTENHAM.—A CORRECTION.

To the Editors.—My friend Mr. Lumb kindly as well as justly supposes that there must have been some misconception of what I really stated in the report of the meeting of the Western Christian Union, which appeared in the Unitarian Herald. What I did say was this:—That in assisting small and feeble congregations, the Association did not lose sight of important towns in which there seems to be a prospect of establishing Unitarian worship, and that at Cheltenham, some years ago, and in Devonport still more recently, the congregations were aided by our society until they became self-supporting. This explanation would have been given sooner, but having been in London until the end of last week, I had no opportunity of seeing the Herald, and did not know anything of Mr. Lumb's letter.—I am, faithfully,

WILLIAM JAMES.

THE LIBERATION SOCIETY.

To the Editors.—Dr. Smith replies to my question, whether he is bigoted and intolerant, by saying that he does not object to the Baptists and Independents on the ground of their religious opinions.

I do not think the answer valid. Bigotry and intolerance are in the mind, and do not change their nature with the change of the object to which they are applied, which may be religious, ecclesiastical, political, or social.

Captain Gordon and those who acted with him in the Bible Society refused to associate therein with Unitarians, because these held objectionable opinions on the Divine nature and government. That was the religious application.

Dr. Smith refuses to associate with the Baptists and Independents in the Liberation Society because they hold objectionable opinions on the constitution of voluntary churches and the terms of their trust deeds. That is the ecclesiastical application. The captain and the doctor, I submit, are in the same boat, and must sink or swim together.

He suggests that my second question is premature. I think not: it touches the very pith of the matter. Rem acu tetigi. So far as I can learn, the great advantage anticipated from this "comprehensive" or "truly national" church, and the great plea urged for it, is, that it would secure to the clergy a degree of freedom in their theological inquiries, which is precluded by their dependence on their flocks under the voluntary system. It would make them independent. Precisely. And in like manner it would secure the independence of butchers and bootmakers of an ingenious turn, to have a state establishment for them; though their meat might not lie easy on the stomach, and their boots might wring gouty toes or pinch bunions. But I doubt if the community, which owned the stomach and the toes, would approve of the arrangement.

JOSEPH CALLOW MEANS.

FREE CHURCH OR UNITARIAN?

To the Editors.—In Mr. Tagart's letter of last week, on the names "Unitarian or Free Christian," it is again assumed, as it has often been by those who profess the former, that the name "Free Christian" is merely put forward with the hope of catching those whom the name Unitarian frightens away. No credit is given to those who wish to adopt the latter term, that they are acting from any high personal motive, with the desire to express by the name they assume their own deepest convictions. It is rather too bad that they should be still liable to such little scoldings, as if they were always attempting to take in the multitude with a name that falsely represents them. Considering that it is by no means a party among us who have shown either mental or moral weakness, who are eager for the adoption of the latter name, it is, to say the least of it, unbecoming to discuss this matter in the tone of your correspondent of last week. I am surprised to see in print the charge that is conveyed in your correspondent's sentence—"The pretence of being unsectarian seems to me a weak subterfuge." Of another sentence I must confess to utter ignorance of what it can mean, where he asks the question, "Are not all opinions those of a sect?" Would Mr. Taggart himself answer this in the affirmative after five minutes' reflection? I do not wish to enter into a controversy about the use of these words, Unitarian and Free-Christian, but simply claim that those who prefer the latter may not always be charged with a want of straightforwardness, because they think that it best expresses their profound conviction on the subject of Christian liberty and charity, and that they consider these of greater moment for the basis of a church, than any special doctrine about the personality of God, concerning which some feel their ignorance, and shrink back from a name that lays down a special dogma on such a matter. Let it be remembered that the Free Christians do not wish "to win and conciliate" any by a catch-word; they adopt the name involved, that they may express their own deepest convictions in the best manner they know how; and it does seem that there certainly are some who are very far from being won or conciliated by the use of it; but, as it has been adopted for the sake of correctness, and not for conciliation merely, it will scarcely be abandoned on that account. If it is put forward as a correct name for describing what men believe to be the basis of a truly Catholic church, let those who put it forward at least have the credit of being straightforward, honourable men, not dealing in pretence and subterfuge.—Yours obediently, Southport. T. HOLLAND.

THE ESTABLISHED CHURCH AND ORTHODOX DISSENTERS.

To the Editors.—Having, in the course of a long life, had many opportunities of observing and contrasting the spirit which, as regards their religious brethren, animates Churchmen and Nonconformists, I ask you to permit my expression of entire dissent from a passage in your leader of the 15th inst., which ran thus: "We wish some of our very liberal friends would only make half the allowance for the gnats of dissenting narrowness which they are constantly making for very camels of intolerance among the clergy." I ask this in no controversial mood, but from the bearing of your sentiment upon the objects of the "Liberation Society," and the question of the disestablishment of the Irish Church.

My experience would lead me to endorse the opinions, admitted to your columns, of Dr. Vance Smith, to the extent even of giving the "gnats" of intolerance to the clergy, and the "camels" to the Dissenters. Myself, a known convert from the Church, and therefore exposed to the imputations frequently cast upon the "renegade," I have met with only liberal allowance for my change of views from Churchmen, but with too much bitter pity—I know not how else to characterise it—from the Methodist, the Independent, and the Baptist. Great want of information as to the real doctrines of Unitarianism has pervaded them all; and I know that there are many, belonging to each of the Nonconformist bodies I have named, who only need to be better informed in order to their becoming as Christianly charitable as could be desired. Still, for gentlemanly urbanity, and anything resembling fraternal feeling, towards a supposed erring brother, commend me to the Church parson rather than the Dissenting minister. It is a very church-ridden city in which I now reside, yet two of the parochial clergy were much before any of the Dissenting pastors in seeing the possibility of friendly relations with the new "Socinian" preacher; and though officially connected with a society composed entirely of Nonconformist ministers and people, I have good reasons for thinking there are sound Churchmen in the place, whose objection to join it would arise from its political objects, and not its religious composition.

But these details are utterly insignificant as compared with the great question of the disestablishment of the Irish Church; or, as it ought to be called, of the English Church in Ireland; and with the expressed aim of the Liberation Society, namely, the disestablishment of the same Church in England itself. I need not inquire if the Liberation Society be sincerely desirous of freeing the Irish branch of that Church from "State patronage and control," or whether it will not, both individually and collectively, lend its heartiest efforts in that direction. But then I would say that one of the greatest bars to the accomplishment of that desire will be the simple existence of a society known to be working for the disestablishment of the national church, correctly or incorrectly so-called, in England. To the ignorant "No Popery" cry, it will do all in its power to add, in a multitude of cases, the truly conscientious and much more enlightened fear expressing itself by "The Church in danger," and the union of the two may go far to imperil that "Justice to Ireland," which the spirit of the age, and the effete and rotten state of the Irish Establishment, alike demand from English legislation. Were I, then, a member of the Liberation Society—which I never have been, nor am likely to be—I should consider that the best service I could render the Sister Island would be very greatly to abate my zeal for the attainment of that society's objects for the present. Not being a member of the Liberation Society, I hold myself free to observe that, to my mind, justice would be as grossly violated under existing circumstances, by the disestablishment of the Church in England, as it has so long been in Ireland by the upholding of a religious institution for the benefit of "one in a thousand," the thousand, minus the one, having to pay for it. The Church in England is cheerfully upheld by several millions of English people; and never had it more strength in their affections, and never more deservedly. It has its abuses, no doubt; but, for many years past, they have been regularly diminishing; and it contains its thousands of truly pious and hard-working ministers—High Church and Low Church—whose absence, in the rural districts especially, would be at once a religious and a social calamity. The theory of a strictly voluntary church is of course more perfect, but no English institution is based upon a theory; and, as a rule, the practical English mind conserves or rejects what has stood the test of a considerable time according to its practical effects. I do not say that it would be right to found just such an institution as the Church of England now; but I agree with Dr. Smith, that "it is a perfectly sound principle that a people, a nation, shall, by its legal representatives, care for its own religious instruction and well-being," and, consequently, I maintain that the fruits of that care, though subject to constant revision and improvement, should never be pushed aside in favour of the pet opinions of any individuals or societies until, as in the case of Ireland, they have proved to be utterly ineffective. The Church of England, and the parliamentary and legal judgments affecting it, are advancing fast in the march of liberality: in a multitude of separate instances its support is purely voluntary; compulsory church-rates are believed to be on the eve of extinction; and never did a large liberty of discussing the truth and propriety of its own doctrines and usages within its own borders point so surely to a period when it will be much more conformed to the simple Gospel, and much less so to articles, creeds, and catechisms. Time, and the general education of the people, will, far sooner than the efforts of any "Liberation Society," effect the objects placed in view by that society; and that without the taint of sectarianism which, however it may be denied, has, I am of opinion, in far too many instances, manifested itself in the statements and sentiments of its members at its public meetings.—Respectfully yours, THOS. CROMWELL.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

At the FORTY-THIRD ANNIVERSARY, held at Little Portland-street Chapel, on Wednesday, June 3, 1868,

GEORGE BUCKTON, Esq., President. The following Resolutions were, in addition to others of a formal character, unanimously passed:

Moved by the Rev. JAMES MARTINEAU, and seconded by the Rev. RUSSELL L. CARPENTER: "That the cordial thanks of the Association be given to the Rev. Dr. Bellows, for his comprehensive, vigorous, and impressive discourse. That his presence and services this day are gratefully welcomed as a token of the sympathy felt in America towards their English brethren; and that he be requested to communicate to the American Unitarian Association, and to our churches in the Great Republic, the assurance of our warm sympathy with them in their varied and zealous efforts to promote pure Christianity and religious freedom."

Moved by Sir JOHN BOWRING, and seconded by the Rev. SAMUEL BACHE:

"That a Petition to Parliament in favour of the measures introduced and announced by the Right Honourable W. E. Gladstone, for the discontinuance of the Church Establishment in Ireland, be adopted by this Association; that it be signed by the President and Secretaries, and sent for presentation to Mr. Gladstone."

Moved by Alderman J. CLARKE LAWRENCE, and seconded by the Rev. E. B. ASPLAND:

"That the invitation of the Unitarian Bishop of Hungary and of the Consistory, that the approaching celebration of their Three-Hundredth Anniversary at Torda should be attended by a deputation from this Association, be gratefully accepted; and that the Rev. John James Taylor, Principal and Professor of Theology of Manchester New College, London, be appointed as a Deputation, and be requested to carry with him an Address expressive of the deep interest felt by the Members of this Association in the welfare of the Hungarian Churches."

Moved by the Rev. WILLIAM JAMES, and seconded by the Rev. J. C. KYLE:

"That the Association records its gratitude for the measure of success which has attended the Missions in Northumberland and Durham and in Scotland, and desires their continuance; and that the committee be instructed to continue the efforts being made to raise an adequate fund for a Mission to India." Certain slight alterations in the laws of the Association were agreed to.

W. J. Lamport, Esq., of Liverpool, was elected President for the ensuing year.

GEORGE BUCKTON, President.

At the close of the proceedings, the chair having been vacated by the President, was taken by W. J. Lamport, Esq., when the following Resolution was unanimously adopted:

"That the best thanks of the meeting be given to the President, George Buckton, Esq., for his able and impartial conduct in the chair."

CHARITY COMMISSION.—IN THE MATTER OF THE CHARITY CALLED THE GENERAL BAPTIST EDUCATION FUND.

By direction of the Board of Charity Commissioners for England and Wales, Notice is hereby Given, that an order is proposed to be made by them after the expiration of one calendar month, to be computed from the publication of this notice, having the following objects, namely:—The appointment of new Trustees of the above-mentioned Charity.

Verding in the Official Trustees of Charitable Funds the right to call for the transfer of and to transfer into their names the sum of £34, 10s., New £3 per cent. annuities belonging to the said Charity, and also to receive the arrears of dividends on the same annuities, in trust for the above-mentioned Charity.

The following persons have been proposed for appointment as such new Trustees, viz.: The Rev. HENRY EDWARD HOWSE, of Bath, in the County of Somerset; the Rev. JOSEPH CALLOW MEANS, of New North Road, in the parish of St. Leonard, Shoreditch, in the County of Middlesex.

Any objections to the proposed order or suggestions for the modification thereof may be transmitted to the said Board in writing, addressed to their Secretary, No. 8, York-street, St. James's Square, London, within 21 days next after the first publication of this notice.

Dated this 21st day of May, 1868.

HENRY M. VANE, Secretary.

LONDON DISTRICT UNITARIAN SOCIETY.

At the EIGHTEENTH ANNUAL GENERAL MEETING of the Members and Friends of the above Society, held at Radley's Hotel, New Bridge-street, Blackfriars, on Wednesday, June 3rd, 1868:

J. T. HART, Esq., in the Chair;

It was moved by the Rev. E. B. MACLELLAN, of Malden, seconded by the Rev. A. LUNN, of Chatham, "That the reports now read be received, adopted, and printed for circulation, under the direction of the Committee."

Moved by E. CLEPHAN, Esq., of Leicester, seconded by the Rev. A. W. WORTHINGTON, of Mansfield:

"That the meeting, firmly convinced that Unitarian principles are calculated to elevate and improve mankind, commends this Society to the support of all who recognise the duty of diffusing our views, and expresses its thanks to the London Lay Preachers' Union for the support it has given to the various Stations of this Society."

Moved by the Rev. J. STREETER, of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, seconded by the Rev. R. SHILLLEY, of Yarmouth:

"That this meeting views with satisfaction the establishment of a Ladies' Visiting Society, in connection with the London District Unitarian Society, and trusts that by its instrumental friends from a distance settled in London may feel assured that an interest is felt in their welfare, and a hearty welcome will be given to all who may wish to join our Churches, or take part in the institutions connected with the Unitarian body."

Moved by the Rev. W. H. CHANNING, of London, seconded by the Rev. J. E. ODGERS, of Kendal:

"That James Yates, Esq., be elected President, and the following Gentlemen Vice-Presidents, of the Society for the ensuing year:—Rev. R. Brook Aspland, M.A.; H. S. WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

Six hundred and fifty Mormons sailed from Liverpool on Saturday for the Salt Lake, by way of New York, a large proportion of whom were women.

It is stated that the Irish Church Commissioners will not be able to present their report before the end of this month or the beginning of the next.

Communications have been going on between the Pope and the Emperor of Austria respecting the late changes which so materially affect the position of the Church in the dominions of the latter. Roman officials express a confident belief that His Holiness will refuse to sanction the abrogation of the Concordat, or to treat it as an accomplished fact, but will abide by the advice, which he is said to have given to the Emperor, to repudiate his recent engagements as soon as ever events afford him the opportunity.

The Calcutta correspondent of the Bombay Guardian gives the following account of the public worship of the Brahmo-Somaj, which he had attended the night before:—

"The 'progressive Brahmos,' of whom Baboo Keshab Chunder Sen is the leader, have only occasional services; the older section have their regular meetings for worship every Wednesday evening. The place is in a crowded native street, with nothing outwardly distinctive; up two stairs, and then you are ushered—we were most politely so—into a long narrow apartment filled with wooden benches. In the middle a place was raised off; the floor partly marble, partly carpeted. On the left side of this enclosed space was a marble seat on which two men, Brahmos, sat cross-legged, with little stools before them on which lay prayer-books, hymn-books, &c. Opposite this marble erection on the other side was a wooden erection, pulpit, call it, within which stood a professional singer, and behind him a harmonium at which presided the eldest son of the great leader of the older Brahmo-Somaj, Baboo, Debendernath Tagore. Prayers in Bengali—extracts from the Upanishads in Sanskrit—a very short sermon in Bengali read, or rather intoned unmusically by one of the ever-sitting Brahmos; hymns again, sung only by the singer helped by harmonium and drum, and then a sudden winding up, when all poured rapidly out, chatting familiarly. Such was the whole that I saw and heard. I believe that before I entered there had been a short recitation of a kind of creed in which all joined. I am much interested in the Brahmo-Somaj, and have a high opinion of the motives animating the leaders of both the older and newer section; and what I say is said in nothing of a fault-finding spirit. But the whole thing appeared to me very, very cold. Certainly in the public worship there is nothing to attract. Even the fact of the audience sitting the whole time—more than an hour and a half without standing, kneeling, or any change of posture, was a proof that little consideration has been paid to mere Ritual. Still there was quiet attention—in some cases, I suppose, devout attention. The audience exceeded 100. No women present or near. There was no inscription, no emblem, idolatrous or other, in the apartment."

Cardinal Andrea is the eighty-fifth cardinal who has died since the accession of the present Pope.

The following petition to the House of Lords is in the course of signature by clergymen only:

"Your petitioners are deeply convinced that to maintain the present Established Church in Ireland, as the National Church of that country, is an injustice which legitimately offends the majority of the Irish people; and your petitioners, therefore, humbly pray your Lordships to adopt such measures as may appear best suited to remove the cause of offence."

Among those who have signed the petition are Archdeacon Sandford, Dr. Temple (Rugby), Pro. Maurice, the Master of St. John's College, Cambridge, Dr. Butler (Harrow), Revs. W. Rogers, Stopford Brooke, J. L. Davies, W. H. Freemantle.

The General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland, at Belfast, after a lengthened discussion, has passed a resolution, on the motion of the Rev. Dr. Cooke, forbidding instrumental music in divine worship.

A discussion in the same Assembly on endowment resulted in the adoption, by a majority of 30, of Dr. Dill's resolutions, which express regret and alarm at the decision of the House of Commons, declare the unwavering adherence of the Assembly to the principle of an ecclesiastical establishment, and protest against the threatened withdrawal of the regium donum. The numbers upon a division were 180 for Dr. Kirkpatrick's amendment, which declared that general disendowment of all religious sects was to be preferred to the endowment of error, and 210 against it. The majority was made up by the votes of the ministers, who declared 134 for the amendment and 182 against, while the elders voted 46 for the amendment and 28 against.

The munificent gift, by Mrs. Hillyard, of £20,000 to the Stockwell Orphanage, has in the course of a few months been supplemented by upwards of £10,000 more. Four houses have been completed, and the foundations of four others laid, which will give accommodation for 250 children. The cost of two of these has been subscribed by the Baptist Churches through the kingdom as a token of esteem for Mr. Spurgeon, and are to be occupied by orphans of Baptist ministers. The first stones were laid on Whit-Monday, in the presence of about 5,000 friends; and at the tea-party which followed, £1,200 were presented to Mr. Spurgeon to pay for the two testimonial houses.

The Guardian states that a litter of fox cubs has been discovered beneath the pulpit of Wharham Percy Church, in Yorkshire. This is not so bad as foxes lying in the pulpit, as is sometimes the case.

It appears that by the bill to stop all further payments out of the Consolidated Fund to the West Indian Clergy, the country will ultimately save rather more than £20,000 a year.

In the Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland, one of the chief cases brought before it of discipline, was an overture from Knapdale, in Argyleshire, anent the sinfulness of one Peter Clerk, who was an offence to of his minister by persistent indulgence in "promiscuous dancing." The Rev. Mr. Fergusson inveighed strongly against this wanton pastime, raking up old Acts of the Church, and declaring that it was "inhibited among dangerous and ensnaring practices by the Longer Catechism;" and likewise, that it was a sign of "irreligious moderation," by which, it is supposed, he meant Broad Church theology. Nor was the mischief confined to the aforesaid Peter, but was spreading through the country, and "the people are on tiptoe to find if any sanction is to be given to this pernicious evil." Sad to say, the Assembly, though it did not give its approval to "promiscuous dancing," did not testify distinctly against it, and the offending Peter was acquitted on a legal quibble. Protests were also made against "professors" riding to church in cabs, satisfying themselves with only one sermon a day, and going in late to service, or, as one minister quaintly put it, "instead of praise waiting for God in Zion, keeping God waiting in Zion for praise."

The most important question discussed in the Assemblies was that of Presbyterian union. In theological creed there is very little difference between the Established Church, the Free Church, and the United Presbyterians. The great subject of dissension is as to the relations between the Church and State. The United Presbyterians are staunch voluntaries, while the Established Church, of course, is for keeping up connection with the State, and till lately the Free Church seemed desirous of doing the same too. But now a considerable majority of this are in favour of surrendering the Establishment principle, or, at least, making it an open question, for the sake of bringing about an amalgamation with the United Presbyterians. A strong minority, however, resist the proposal. This coquetting has had the effect of rekindling the old love of the Establishment for its quondam partner; and one of the sittings of the General Assembly was devoted to a discussion of the law of patronage, with a view to smoothing the way towards a reconciliation, and an anti-patronage motion was lost only by a majority of 4. Thus, while the Free Church is wooing the United Presbyterians, the Establishment is trying to win back the Free Church to its embraces. What the result will be is not clear. Some think it will end in a breaking up of the Free Church, the majority coalescing with the United Presbyterians, and the minority rejoining the old Establishment.

A list of the patrons of the charges in the Church of Scotland has been published, from which it appears that, excluding the Crown, trustees, and Town Councils, the rest of the benefices are in the hands of 252 individuals, of whom 169 have one, and some 10, 20, or, as in the case of the Earl of Zetland, 31.

At the annual meeting of the Evangelical Continental Society, the Rev. A. Herschell, in describing the present position of Protestantism in Bohemia, where John Huss and Jerome of Prague began the Reformation with such great success, said that the result of the cruel massacres which Popery instigated had been that, out of a population of seven millions, there were now only 170,000 Protestants. Until very recently they were not allowed to hold any synodical meeting, nor their Church admitted to have any existence by the law of the land, yet notwithstanding these odds against them, they amounted to the number which he had stated. They laboured, however, under great difficulties. The most favourably situated parish among them was scattered over an area of something like eight miles, and the people had to come eight and ten miles to a place of worship. There was one pastor to 1,200 persons, and out of these there were not less than eight hundred in regular attendance every Sunday, which showed how great was their thirst for the Word of God.

An imposing deputation from two Irish Protestant Defence Associations waited upon Mr. Disraeli on Monday, to lay before him resolutions in reference to the proposed disestablishment of the Irish Church. The policy recommended in these was the reservation to the Established Church of all its present endowments, the augmentation of the Regium Donum, and the refusal of any aid or countenance whatever to Roman Catholics. There were several Presbyterians on the deputation, whose presence is accounted for by the second of these recommendations. With an utter disregard of his famous denunciation of the Church which he now professes to support as essential to the stability of the Throne, the Premier, in his reply, boldly went in for "No Surrender," and spoke of "a party of politicians who have seized a favourable opportunity of carrying their revolutionary designs into effect;" as if he were a very Orangeman of Orangemen. His statement was declared by the Marquis of Downshire, who headed the deputation, to be "perfectly satisfactory." We are much mistaken if it will be considered so by those who love what is honest and just.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

The Times correspondent, in describing the funeral of Cardinal Andrea, after mentioning that "Cardinal Antonelli wept as he blessed the bier," says, "it is impossible not to think of crocodiles whilst reading this last line."

The English Independent has the following:

"The spontaneous combustion of a Bishop's manuscripts is, perhaps, a new thing under the sun, so new as hardly to find credence. Nevertheless, the manuscripts of his Lordship of London are stated to have taken fire of their own accord on their way in a van from St. James's-square to Fulham Palace. It would be interesting to know in which of the papers the first spark was kindled, in which lurked those cineres dolosi that, originally laid for the purpose of combining all sorts of Church principles in one light, but disappointed of that effect, shot forth their despairing and expiring flames as they passed St. Paul's, Knightsbridge."

If we might hazard a conjecture on the subject, we should say that the cause of the mischief lay in some charge which contained an excess of brutum fulmen.

At one of the meetings of the General Assembly of the Established Church of Scotland, Dr. Norman Macleod, who received a most enthusiastic welcome on his return from India, gave a description of Brahminism, which exercises such a powerful influence over the teeming millions of that country. He said:

"It was the most wonderful system that existed or had existed in the world. In coping with it they had to deal, not with a barbarous race, but a race whose very blood was the same as our own,—a race whose religion was expressed in one of the most subtle, one of the fullest, most exquisite, most accurate, and most musical languages that ever existed,—a race that had its poetry when earth was young, whose magnificent poems that still awakened the astonishment of the reader were probably as old as the days of Moses—a race that had its philosophy during teeming centuries, that had astronomy long before it was known to the Greeks, that solved questions in algebra and mathematics before these engaged the brain of Western Europe. This system of religion permeated every order and class of native society. The day that the missionaries of the Cross overturned the tremendous citadel of Brahminism they would have done a work revealing the power of Christianity such as never was witnessed in the world before, and, as far as man could see, never could be seen again. To undertake this work would require the church of Christ in all its branches to unite and to gird on all its armour; and missionary societies and churches must set about it in a very different manner from what had hitherto been the case. His conviction was that every system, except the education system, had utterly failed of destroying Hindooism, and that this system alone, whatever converts they might make, or whatever missionaries they might ordain, was calculated, above all others, to destroy the fortress of Hindooism."

In a speech last week upon the Irish Church, the Bishop of Carlisle, who is of the Evangelical party, thus referred to the Ritualistic faction;

"If there is any danger to the Church of England, that danger arises simply from traitors within our walls. I speak advisedly when I say traitors within our walls. I am perfectly aware there are many people think it uncharitableness to imagine there are traitors in our camp. It is impossible, I confess, for me to think anything else. There are many misguided men who may be utterly unconscious of the work they are doing, but there are others who are deliberately carrying out the designs of Rome within the borders of the Church of England."

In returning thanks for the presentation referred to in "What Doing," Mr. Spurgeon, after remarking that it was the Episcopalians who were advancing Roman Catholicism in this country, said:

"A friend of his wrote to him the other day, stating he was surprised that he, as a Baptist and Nonconformist, was taking the part he was in the Irish question by advocating the disestablishment of the Church. He wondered at the time how long his friend's ears were, and how it was that he failed to see that by the disestablishment the general body of Protestants would be brought face to face with Roman Catholicism, and that Protestantism would be strengthened. But whilst it was their duty to oppose error, they had no right to commit an injustice. If he saw a man knocked down in the street and robbed, he would help him whether he was a Protestant or a Catholic; and as he believed that the Irish Church was an injustice to nine-tenths of the Irish people, so he would relieve them of that injustice; but Martin Luther himself did not love Protestantism and the doctrine of justification by faith more than he did. He was a Baptist from conviction, and became one through being sent to a Church of England school. In asking him his catechism they asked him the usual question, 'What is your name?' and he replied 'Spurgeon.' When they asked him his Christian name he said he had not got one, for he was not a Christian. They told him that he had the name his godfather and godmother gave him, but he replied he had no godfather or godmother. They then said he had not been baptised rightly, but he replied he was sure he had, as his grandfather christened him in the big china basin in the back parlour, and as he had done lots before he must have known how to do it properly. He did not know at that time that there were any other people in the world who were Baptists besides himself, and it gave him great joy when he found others held similar opinions to those which his early thoughts ripened into."

The other day "S. A. Walker," a Bristol rector, wrote to the Times to bear testimony to the character of the pestilent firebrand Murphy, and stated that his "father was murdered for being a convert." The Pall Mall in referring to the rev. gentleman's letter, suggested that he might as well complete his testimony by supplying some particulars of the alleged "stoning to death" by the priests, and at the same time express his opinion as to the propriety of circulating "The Confessional Unmasked," which the highest legal tribunal had declared to be an obscene publication, which it is the duty of the police to destroy. In reply, Mr. Walker sends a letter, from which it appears that his only authority for the story about the "stoning" is an "impression" that it was related to him by Murphy and Murphy's friends; and as for the pamphlet, while owning that it is so bad that "regarding it from a magisterial point of view, he cannot see how any protector of the public morals could do otherwise than condemn it to the flames," he yet argues in favour of its circulation on the ground that the iniquity of the Catholic priesthood ought to be exposed, and that this can only be accomplished by a public revelation of the obscenities of the confessional. "That is to say," as the Pall Mall remarks,

"Mr. Walker, believing that one section of the population, that belonging to the Catholic Church, is being corrupted and depraved by certain obscene works, would, by way of antidote, disseminate the poison indiscriminately among all classes of the community."

Referring to the reappearance of Father Ignatius "in his usual pantomime, in which he plays so conspicuously the part of clown," the Freeman says:

"Every one who has heard him will be able to account for the kind of popularity which he has gained in the city. His addresses, which are always extempore, are noisy and vapid; his language is declamatory, and often coarse; and his manner—as we think—unpleasant, and at times repelling. Of course, his ferociously strong language gives him a certain amount of influence among weak-minded hearers, who enjoy his 'hits' in proportion to their severity, and his 'points' in proportion to their absurdity. We remember hearing him describe Mary Magdalen as 'a filthy street-walker,' Augustine, of Hippo, as 'a nasty rake,' and the saints in heaven as 'the abominable host of God's elect'—abominable, he argued, because many of them were once the lowest and vilest sinners."

A Church and State meeting was held at Taunton on Saturday, at which Archdeacon Denison, who never minces matters, eased his mind of the following:—

"Nobody would deny the omnipotence of Parliament—its power to do right or wrong; it did wrong every day, and it might commit the sin of disestablishing the Church, but that did not make it a moral right. He refused absolutely to make any distinction between the Irish Church and the Church of England. This was an assault on the whole principle of establishments. He affirmed that the United Church of England and Ireland was a great blessing, and had always been a blessing. It was a divine trust; and had any one a right to give up a divine trust, a thing he had received from God? No, he had not; and it was a sin upon any man's soul to dare to do it. It was a great national gift, and if they took it away they did dishonour to Christ and made the Government of the country a godless Government. Mr. Gladstone was working the greatest mischief which was ever worked to this country. Of all the sophistry he (the Archdeacon) ever heard, and he had heard a good deal, he never heard so much out of any man's mouth as out of Mr. Gladstone's. A revolution was going on within their own houses and about their own doors, and they must be up and doing, or the chances would be that many of them would have to fight with the sword before this matter was done with. He did not believe that the people of England would believe Mr. Gladstone when he said he did all he was doing in friendship for the Church of Ireland. It might be said—

'Perhaps it was right to dissemble your love, But why did you kick me down stairs?'

They would not have such folly, sophistry, and nonsense as were talked in that place at Westminster. They might say what they liked, but they would not persuade honest Englishmen that this was not a robbery and a rapine of the most solemn trusts given to man. He believed the people of this country would say to Messrs. Gladstone and Bright, 'You shan't lay so much as your finger on the Established Church of England and Ireland. We will not have our constitution in Church and State touched.'

Writing on the education question in the Sword and Trowel, Mr. Spurgeon says:

"Since the sectarian system has in England most evidently failed to reach the needs of the millions, a purely secular system will be established, and will be thrust upon us whether we will or no. There will be a great outcry about the divorcing of religion from education, but we shall not join in it, partly because it is useless to cry over spilt milk—the thing must be, and there is no preventing it; and yet more, because we think we see our way to a real great gain out of a small apparent loss. Children are to lose the religious training which they received in National and British schools; we admit that there may be cases in which the loss will be appreciable, but we think they are few and far between. The lads of the village might generally carry in a hollow tooth all the religion they receive at the charity schools. Do not they learn the Church Catechism? Yes; but that is not religion; it begins with an assertion of baptismal regeneration, maunders about behaving one's-self lowly and reverently to one's betters, in a manner suitable for an American negro previous to the late war; and has not a fraction of the simple Gospel of Jesus in it from end to end. It will be highly beneficial to the morality of youth to dispense with this miserable farrago, in which the false of superstition and the true of law are hopelessly jumbled. The present religious teaching of our week-day schools is, as we believe, as nearly as possible a sham, and a most mischievous sham too."

In a notice of the Life of Bishop Lonsdale, just published, the Pall Mall remarks:

"In an age of model cottages, model farms, and model things in general, it would be surprising if we had not a full supply of model Bishops. Unfortunately, at the same time, though we suffer under no lack of examples of episcopal perfection, people are very far from agreed as to the standard by which the prelatial model is to be estimated. There is the Bishop of Salisbury, for instance. In the eyes of a good many women, and not a few men, Dr. Hamilton comes as near to the reproduction of the apostolic type as the conditions of modern life and the riches of the Establishment will allow. Others, again, venerate the more aggressive, pushing, and political Bishop of Oxford as the only true model of a 'ruler of the Church' in these times of rebuke and blasphemy. Then there is the Bishop of London, very active and very practical; he too has his band of worshippers, though, it is said, they are not many. The Low Church Bishops, it need hardly be said, have each of them their devoted admirers, and, whatever they may do within their fortunate dioceses, it is reverenced by those who believe in them as so many proofs of their right to the title of scriptural and model prelates. The two most recently appointed Bishops, again, promise to attain high distinction as models; but as yet it is not easy to foretell whether Bishop Selwyn or Bishop Clifton will most thoroughly satisfy the aspirations of those who think that energy, activity, and a gift for governing on clerical principles are the special virtues which constitute episcopal greatness. Lastly, there are the two English Archbishops. A good many critics discern in Archbishop Longley an absolute archiepiscopal perfection, and protest that he is even a more faultless model than Archbishop Howley himself. But what the admirers of Archbishop Longley think of Archbishop Thompson it is not easy to understand. It is just possible, of course, that there may be persons who venerate this last-named prelate as a model, and after his late speech at St. James's Hall, amid the rapturous applause of his clerical audience, he may come some day to share the veneration of the faithful with his brother prelate of Oxford."

For the Pall Mall itself, it is very much disposed to look upon the late Bishop Lonsdale as coming near to its notions of a model Bishop. One of his great merits was that he had no views:

"In this respect he far outshone Archbishop Howley. Dr. Howley was one of the most non-viewy of men; but then it was from an excess of personal caution that he abstained from warmly espousing the opinions of any party in the Church. He dreaded committing himself; and flourishing as he did—if the career of any so cautious a personage can be called a flourishing—in the midst of the hot Tractarian warfare, it must be admitted that he was eminently successful in never burning his fingers. There is a characteristic story told about his reply to a certain zealous country parson, who was dining with a large clerical party at Lambeth, which illustrates the skill with which the Archbishop parried all unwelcome questionings. 'What is your grace's opinion of the 'Tracts for the Times?'' called out the indiscreet and innocent ecclesiastic aforesaid, who was seated next to Mrs. Howley, seizing upon a momentary lull in the conversation to ask the query which he fancied the Archbishop would be delighted to answer. The silence was at once more profound than before, and those who knew the Archbishop and his household smiled pleasantly at the quiet reply which greeted the ears of the astonished rector. 'Ask Mrs. Howley,' said the Archbishop, 'what she thinks of them.'"

For a united Church, the way in which the two great parties in the Establishment blacken each other is somewhat remarkable. Here are a couple of specimens of the way in which the Church Times, the organ of the Ritualists, speaks of the Evangelicals and their doings:

"It is deplorable that the law cannot lay by the heels the pious bigots of a more respectable station in life who instigate his (Murphy's) atrocious proceedings. They are to be found at prayer-meetings and on Evangelical platforms, holily un-Christian, unctuously fanatic. A month at the treadmill would teach them to be a little more charitable."

"The fact is, modern 'Evangelicalism' is nothing but a series of devices for saving the clergy trouble. It is the pastor's business to have daily service; but your 'Evangelical' advocates family prayer, which means 'every man his own chaplain, and don't bother the parson.' Again, it is his business to read the Bible to his people; but your 'Evangelical' asks them to subscribe for Scripture-readers. Again, it is his duty to catechise the young; but your 'Evangelical' gets lay people to hold Sunday schools. It is his business to baptise children; but your 'Evangelical' sells the sacrament at a tariff which he knows must be largely prohibitory. It is his business to be perpetually celebrating the Holy Eucharist; but your 'Evangelical' celebrates at most once a month, and then he administers the sacrament by railfals. Lastly, it is his business to offer his services as director to all his flock; but your 'Evangelical' scoffs at direction altogether, and so gets rid of at least three-fourths of the toils and cares and perplexities of his office."

Mr. Spurgeon, in the course of an interview with Mr. Gladstone, asked why Mr. Sinclair Aytoun's motion against Maynooth was opposed, and he thus states the result:

"I fear that Bright and Russell have a hankering after endowing the sects—Rome among them; but Gladstone will make a clean sweep of them all, save only the reserve of vested interests. I went last Friday and saw him personally, and feel reassured. I prophesy that the money will go in schools and that grants will be made proportionate to the number of each body, and this is the bottom of the objection to a resolution which forbade the giving of any of the funds to Catholic institutions."

In recommending the Presbyterian body of Ulster to take the Sustentation Fund of the Free Church of Scotland as the model for its future voluntary support, Dr. McCosh said, to secure to every Presbyterian minister £100 a-year would require £56,000—twopence a week from every communicant.

With regard to the Suspensory Bill, the Times says, while there can be no doubt as to what the Lords ought to do, one cannot be sanguine that they will do it. The practical leader of the Ministry in the House of Lords—the Lord Chancellor—is devoted to the maintenance in its integrity of the Irish Establishment, and the “inspiring genius” below the gangway [Lord Derby] took the earliest opportunity of proclaiming his opposition to all schemes for dealing with it. It is still more unfortunate that the most liberal of the Bishops have announced beforehand their hostility to the bill, though the essential distinction between the English and the Irish Churches—that the one is and the other is not the church of the people—must become so apparent on reflection that it may induce some members of the Episcopal Bench to abandon their first hasty conclusions. But, if the bill is to be carried, we must trust to the good sense of that large section of the House of Lords which is free from ecclesiastical prepossessions or the trammels of party. What would be the position of the House if the bill were rejected? The Lords would appear before that tribunal to which an appeal is to be so soon made, not merely as the antagonists of the popular House, but also as the champions of privilege against justice.

Dr. Massingham, in a lecture in Salford, explained that he was only quoting the words of another when he said that “hanging was too good for Mr. Gladstone.” So far from wishing him suspended by the neck, he would be one of the first to care for his personal safety; and the only suspension he wished was that he might be suspended from office, and suspended from misrepresenting him (Dr. M.) as an elector for South Lancashire.

INDIA.

THE Rev. C. H. Dall, American missionary to Calcutta, now in London on his way homeward, preached on Sunday last, in South Place Chapel, on Progress in India. He spoke of the Hindoo character as one which, during his dozen years' residence there, had more and more fascinated him, inducing him to give to it yet more of his time, “and perhaps the whole of life this side of heaven.” Their need of Christian teaching was great: the adoration of 33,000,000 gods and goddesses woefully weakened worship by perplexingly multiplying its objects, and even those who abandoned idolatry had very defective views of religion. They had no conception of God as a Friend and Father; their prayers are all deprecatory: “Do not kill us, do not poison the wells.” Human brotherhood they openly denied, regarding all who were not Hindoo as vile.

It was Mr. Dall's firm belief that wherever Hindoos had adopted a belief in the fatherhood of God or the brotherhood of man, they had learned it from Christianity. That increasing society, the Brahmo-Somaj, numbering some 50,000, was the result of half a century of Christian missions and books. The missionaries had gathered into their schools clever and impressionable young Hindoos, who had readily adopted their faith in Jesus. Yet these disciples had refused to accept their teachers' theories about Him so steadily as to make many worthy missionaries abandon their posts in despair. A leader of the Brahmo-Somaj had defined to Mr. Dall its aim as being “to develope for India a gospel truer to Jesus than that of the missionaries.” All religion, said they, is life, all life is growth, therefore Hinduism must grow or perish. They held public worship both in Bengali and in English before audiences sometimes numbering 2,500. They were fond of Unitarian books of devotion, such as the “Altar at Home,” and all of them who could afford it possessed the writings of Miss Cobbe and Theodore Parker. Such books as these they reprinted and circulated.

The Hindoo mind was more reverent than the English or American, and had a grasp of the Invisible which we, with our cold faith, might well envy. In the passive virtues, too, it far excelled us, and delighted in the gentleness of Jesus. Indeed the absence of moral force was one of its main defects. A member of the Supreme Council, a Knight Commander of the Star of India, had said to Mr. Dall, “You will never find me differ from any man's opinion. I am too prudent.” Their highest hope was to sink into the Supreme Being at death, and cease to exist personally; their greatest misfortune, to be born again into the world. Hindoos of high intellectual distinction had pressed Mr. Dall to recommend them for Government appointments, and when asked “Would you have me tell a lie to serve you?” would reply with all simplicity, “Why not, to help a friend.”

They were ever ready to adore. “All is God,” said a Rajah to Mr. Dall; “worship what you will, you cannot go amiss. This”—striking his hand on a pillar of the verandah—“this is God.”

Mr. Dall is an intellectual and firm-looking man, and we are glad to hear that after visiting his family, he intends to return to his mission, which he has in the meanwhile entrusted to able (native) hands.

CYRIL.

OLD TESTAMENT CHAPTERS FOR THE SUNDAY SCHOOL.—VIII.

SUBJECT: The Hebrew prophets teach that man shall be saved by his own righteousness and condemned by his own misdeeds.

Read Ezekiel xviii. 1—4 and 19—30, and point out that the proverb at the beginning of this chapter, “The fathers have eaten sour grapes, the children's teeth are set on edge,” was a common saying in the country, quoted also by Jeremiah, and in like manner contradicted by him where he declares “Every son of Adam that eateth the sour grapes his own teeth will be set on edge.” The more ancient religious teaching of the Hebrews had led them into mistakes which might have a dangerous effect upon morality. In Exodus xx. 5, it is said, “For I, Jehovah, thy God, am a jealous God, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate Me, and showing kindness unto the thousandth of them that love Me and keep My commandments.” This false view of the Almighty's government Ezekiel uses some strong eloquence in this and other chapters to overthrow, teaching that to every man is given the responsibility of his own actions. “I will judge you, O house of Israel, every one according to his ways, the Lord Jehovah hath said it.”

EVANGELICAL INFALLIBILITY.

IN our last week's Herald we mentioned the adverse utterances that Dr. RALEIGH's noble address from the chair of the Congregational Union had called forth, and especially in the English Independent.

Dr. RALEIGH has replied to the reviewer in the Independent, and the explanations he offers of the passages in his speech about “Plenary Inspiration” and “Christian Dogma,” interest us as affording a glimpse of the mental conditions under which alone a large and thoughtful mind can still hold the orthodox doctrine. Such a mind, it would seem, must see these doctrines through a haze which softens down and hides their sharp details, just as the haze of the summer air softens down and hides the sharp outline of road, and rock, and wall upon the mountain side. We do not complain that Dr. RALEIGH's explanations are no explanations to us, and convey no clear ideas to our mind, because we assume them to be the real truthful expression of his own form of thought.

In one point, however, Dr. RALEIGH is very clear. It is in his indignant protest against the Evangelical infallibility assumed by his reviewer. “My reviewer takes ground,” he says, “which I cannot take, which I regard in fact as logically destructive alike of Protestant liberty and rational faith. He says I have ‘made a somewhat vain expenditure of needless concessions, in order to win men who ought to be openly encountered with the demand for submission to Divine authority.’ I can only stand in astonishment on reading such a sentence. What is the Divine authority here? And where does it lie? In the book? or in one's own particular interpretation of the book?”

I may be wrong, but the writer really seems to say the latter, at least by implication. For suppose some of the men thus challenged should say to him, ‘We take the book, but we give it our own interpretation, which differs considerably from yours. Are we submissive to Divine authority?’ As I understand, he would answer, ‘No; you must take certain explanations along with the facts; you must take the Epistles to the Romans and Galatians in a certain sense, ‘on peril of perdition.’ If all the persons—from the Pope to the Plymouth Brethren—who make just such a demand were put into a circle, the circumference of it would be considerable.”

And what does the reviewer reply to this rebuke? Reiterate the claim to infallibility in substance, in Dr. RALEIGH's words, “The Divine authority lies in the book, and also in our particular interpretation of the book.” He says, “That which cannot be known to be a Divine doctrine has no Divine authority.” And, conversely, if there be a real authority in Apostolic doctrine, it must be because the Apostles' writings are intelligible, and certain pretended “interpretations” of them of very small account indeed. That is, in plain words, “What you call our interpretation of the Apostolic teaching is its clear, intelligible meaning; all other pretended interpretations are of very small account indeed.” In another passage the reviewer says: “The original teachers of Christianity plainly declare that no liberty of speculation about dogma is left to mankind, but that all men are by God himself required to accept a certain definite explanation or dogma respecting them,”—i.e., the facts of Christianity.

We are much obliged to the reviewer. He has brought out into the light a self-deception which is seldom exposed to light, but which lurks, a deceiving spirit, in the darker corners of the Evangelical mind. We see now the explanation of the astounding arrogance, bigotry, and intolerance of which so many otherwise excellent men can be guilty. They first assume the infallibility of the Apostolic writings, and then identify their own interpretation with the original intention and meaning of these writings—blind all the time to the fact that it is their interpretation, and nothing else! And so assuming that they are in “absolute communion with Apostolic infallibility,” they virtually claim infallibility for themselves. It is true they repudiate this claim, and assert that it is not for themselves but for Apostolic authority they claim the infallibility; while all but themselves see that it is their own interpretation which they set up as this authority. When will men who pretend to education, acquire a little of that most valuable of all knowledge—self-knowledge, and learn to detect some of the tricks their own minds play them.

It is refreshing to turn back again from the narrowness and hardness of the reviewer to the speech of Dr. RALEIGH itself. Very beautiful, it seems to us, is that passage especially, where, in touching on the various agencies that run on in the same line as religion, in instructing man, he comes to the prevalence of a spirit of social universal sympathy as one of the most signal, and at the same time one of the best, characteristics of the present age. He says, “It would seem that even Humanity herself—that fair, sweet mother and mistress of the world, whose face has never yet been fully seen, whose presence in many parts of her own house has never yet been felt—is now beginning to show herself, and to move up and down among her children with regal grace and motherly tenderness. She is looking especially, and with a sorrowful and loving eagerness, after those who have been neglected, or who have wilfully wandered and fallen. Like the symbolical woman of the Gospels, she has lighted her candle and is sweeping the house, and looking diligently until she finds the pieces that are lost. Not one in ten only, but more than half the number have been missing. Now she is finding them—one after another—here and there: some covered with dust which she can almost blow away, some with a dimness on them which has touched the metal, some deeply tainted; but the 'lost' are being 'found,' not here alone, but the world over."

OLD ENGLAND.

Old England is my home and pride,
I love her best of all beside,
Whate'er the name, where'er it be,
My island kingdom by the sea:

And this is why I love thee best—
In thee my fathers lived and rest.

In dear Old England I was born,
Among her golden fields of corn;
Those fields! What other fields can be
One-half so sweet and dear to me?

And this is why I love thee best—
By them my fathers lived and rest.

And though my dwelling now is made
Amid the busy marts of trade,
And thus a stranger forced to be
To thy sweet lanes and woodlands free,
Still, above all, I love thee best,
England, my fathers' home and rest.

Thou hast thy faults—and who has none?
Yet, wert thou spotless as the sun,
Scarce dearer than thou art to me,
With all thy failings, couldst thou be,
England, for this I love thee best—
Thou art my fathers' home and rest.

FLOWERS FROM PERSIAN GARDENS.—VI.

I SAW some handfuls of fresh roses tied up with grass on the top of a cupola. I said, What does this worthless grass to be sitting thus in the rank of roses? The grass wept, and replied: Be silent! The generous never forget their companionship: tho' I have no beauty, or colour, or odour, am I not the grass of this garden? I am the servant of the munificent Majesty, nourished from of old by His fostering bounty. Whether I have any virtue, or whether I have it not, still am I hopeful of the mercy of my Master. Although no valuable stock be mine—no wealth of worship—He knows the remedy for His servants' case, when all other support faileth.

A pupil said to his instructor: "What am I to do? for people incommode me with the frequency of their visits to such a degree that their conversation produces a great distraction of my valuable time." He replied: "To every one who is poor, lend; and from every one who is rich, borrow: they will not come about you again."

On the monument of Balzram Gur (a Persian king) was written: The liberal hand is better than the strong arm. Hatim-Tai (an Arabian chief proverbial for his generosity) lives no more; but to eternity his great name will remain renowned on account of his liberality. Distribute in alms the tithe of thy wealth; for the more the husbandman lops off the exuberance of the vine, the more it will yield of grapes.

An African mendicant, in the Mercers' Row at Aleppo, kept saying: "O wealthy sirs, if you had justice, and we contentment, the practice of begging would go out of the world. O contentment, do thou make me rich! For without thee there is no such thing as riches."

The treasure chosen by Lokman was patience: without patience, there is no such thing as wisdom.

One of the Kings of Persia sent an able physician into the service of Mohammed. He remained some years in Arabia, but no one came to consult him or to ask for his medicines. One day he presented himself to the Prophet, complaining that he had been sent to heal his people, but that in all that time no one had paid him any attention. The Prophet replied: It is the custom of this nation not to eat till compelled by hunger, and to withdraw their hand from food whilst they have still an appetite. The physician said: This is the reason that they are so healthy. So he made his obeisance, and departed.

CHURCH CURIOSITIES.—X.

At the May meetings there are many things said which, whether exactly in place or not at them, would most fitly find a place under this heading. We offer one or two specimens from the speeches of the present year.

OVER THE WATER.

In speaking at the meeting of the Primitive Methodist Missionary Society, Dr. Landels, of London, said:

"I am a sort of representative of catholicity. I was brought up a Presbyterian; as a boy I caught the fire of Primitive Methodism, when Mr. Lister and others of your ministers came into Bedfordshire; and I have since become a Baptist; so that I represent at least pretty well three phases. I have this to say, however, that my very first speech of any kind was delivered at a Primitive Methodist tea meeting. I do not say what kind of a speech it was; but there was a very good brother there, a local preacher, who thought pretty highly of his own powers, but who, however, was such a preacher that nobody but himself could tolerate him; and he comforted me after my speech by saying, 'Well never mind, you did quite as well as I did the first time.' I believe my second speech was delivered on a Primitive Methodist platform. Well, let that pass; but the first sermon I ever made was preached at a Primitive Methodist camp meeting; and I have done as much walking on a Sunday as some of your Methodist preachers, and preached three times besides occasionally; so that I know something of the labours as well as of the success and the triumphs of Primitive Methodism. I have got a little way from you now, and sometimes they say, 'You know, there is only the water between us.' So there is; but then I have gone through it, and you cannot expect me to come back. We may join hands across it, very well, as we do to-night; but if we are to stand on the same side, of course you must come across to us; we cannot come to you."

Dr. Landels, in referring to the financial part of the meeting said:

"I was glad to hear that definition of Methodism, so sound in its doctrine and so practical in its works. What was it? Justification by faith, sanctification by works, a penny a week, and a shilling a quarter. I heard the other day of a caricature of three parsons; one of them was an Episcopalian, and he was standing and saying, 'As it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be;' another was an Independent, or Baptist, and he was saying, 'Let all things be done decently and in order;' and the third was a Methodist, he was leaning over the pulpit and saying, 'Now, brethren, we will proceed to make the collection.'"

SAMBO'S SIMILE.

In an exceedingly racy speech at the same meeting, the Rev. W. Jackson, of Leeds, related the following incident, which he said had pleased him much, and which he made use of to show that it is not every one that holds up his head high, and makes a dash in the country that contributes most interest and influence to a community: "Some time ago, just before the abolition of the slaves in America, one of those slaves was passing near a plantation and he looked gloomy and haggard. Well, his master met him and said to him, 'Sambo, why do you hold your head down? You should hold up your head as I do.' 'Massa,' he said 'was you ever through a field of corn when it were ripe?' 'Yes,' he said. 'Well,' continued Sambo, 'if you examine the ears, some of them hang down?' 'Yes.' 'And others stand straight up?' 'Yes.' 'Well, if you examine those that stand straight up you will find that they have nought in them, and if you examine those that hang down you will find they are full of the ripened corn.'"

KEEPING ON.

Showing how persistency in the right resulted in success, Mr. Jackson gave the following illustration:—"It is said that in a certain church—an Independent church, I believe—some years ago, a pastor died. The people kept up the weekly prayer-meeting, and they did right. Well, there was a venerable old sire, but poor in this world's goods, and they allowed him in deference to his piety and standing in the society, to conduct this weekly prayer-meeting. He had a great love for one hymn in the book, and he stuck to it. It began, 'I have no cottage in this wilderness.' He gave it out on the first, second, third, fourth, and fifth occasions. There was a very wealthy gentleman belonging to the church, and one day he said to his good lady when he got home, 'Old James has given out now that hymn some three or four weeks running, "I have no cottage in this wilderness. No foot of land do I possess," and I think we have had enough of that one hymn.' 'Well, now,' says the lady, 'we have a nice little cottage, and a garden detached from the rest of our property, and if you have no objection, we will give Old James that.' 'Well,' he said, 'I will go again just to see how he comes on.' He went again and Old James stuck to his text. By the next Wednesday evening he had been presented with the cottage, and he and his venerable dame had got nicely settled into it. All the members of the church went to hear whether he would stick to his text or not. He went and got the book, gave out the same page, the same hymn, but he said, 'We will begin at the second verse.' Now, if we shift at all, Mr. Chairman, it must be in the same path, and nearer home."

THEY SAY, LET THEM SAY!

The same minister, with a view to show that it was of no use listening to what people had to say, but that the thing was for a man to speak out what he felt to be good, said: "One gets on to a platform and delivers a vigorous, hot speech; one of his hearers says to a neighbour, 'What do you think about that?' 'Why, more sound than sense.' Another speaker, with a logical mind, profound and critical and abstract, splits it up, analyses it, and makes a sort of post-mortem examination of it. One of his hearers says 'He is one of the driest chips I ever heard.' I never was so tired in my life.' Another comes up with a warm speech, but with more of connection and interest and sentiment. Of him they say, 'You are a pretty good speaker.' 'Yes,' answers one, 'but don't you see he knows it.' Another comes, and is neither so profound or critical; neither is he so noisy, but he delivers a brilliant address, and they say of him, 'Yes, it is good, but I think I have read it somewhere.' Thus do some persons use all their force and power in detraction. Let us go on steadily, for if we are to pay attention to everything that is said we shall be doing nothing but changing our tactics and rearranging our plans."

MUCH IN A COMMA.

WHEN Henry Brougham was created a peer, he took for his motto "PRO REGE, LEGE, GREGE." The John Bull of that day cleverly suggested that it ought to have run thus, PRO "REGE," lege "GREGE."

ALEXANDRIA.

In one of his letters to the Liberal Christian, Dr. Bellows thus describes his entrance into Egypt:

Our ride to the hotel plunged us in five minutes into the very heart of Oriental life. The streets seemed thronged with pictures out of all the Eastern story books and all the illustrated travels we had ever read. Mustaphas and Selims and Ali Babas, were as common as Smiths and Joneses in New York. The people appeared to be playing charades—so dressed up in shawls and outlandish slippers, in flowing robes and gay vests and jackets that looked wholly ornamental. And there were the veritable women in veils, nothing but their eyes showing, whom we had so long been waiting to see! But we could not stop to look at them, for a file of loaded camels, just as ugly, patient and strong as they had looked in the circus-show, came by, engaged in their legitimate business, carrying great loads of stone, in coarse nets, or packs of boxes and barrels, and sticking out their noses level with their eyes, as they smelt their way through the crowded streets. Donkeys ambled about, with their great saddles on their little backs, carrying heavy men, whose bare feet almost touched the ground, and each followed by a brown imp in a loose white gown, with a fez on his head and a pair of roguish eyes in his brows, and a sharp stick in his hand, who is the donkey's shadow and tormentor. Cobblers on their hams, sat in real Arabian Night's style, pursuing their trade in the open streets. Dates were passing from the scales of the fruit merchant into the double hands of the careful purchaser, who often examined each date before he admitted it and chattered about the weight and the price. Bananas, mandarins (the Malta orange), almonds, figs, tomatoes, green peas, new potatoes, and various other fresh fruits and vegetables in the market stalls, upset our notions of January, and proved to us that we were in latitude 30°, which, on the Eastern hemisphere, means 25°. But although palm groves, and the wild fig and the tame, the cocoa tree, the banana and other strange plants were constantly peeping over enclosures or throwing their shade upon us, and although minarets and horse-shoe arches and domes that swelled out above their base lines, were showing themselves in every street vista, I could not turn my eyes from the fascinating costumes and visages of the people. Nubians, black as night; Syrians, with Jewish features; Arabs, tall and thin; Armenians, of more European aspect; Turks, stout and handsome, were mingled in one crowd—with garments more diversified than their complexions. All the colours of the rainbow stained the street, as white, blue and yellow turbans, over the invariably red fez, with silken scarfs of all brilliant hues about the neck, and sashes as gay about the loins, divided flowing trousers of white, brown, red, yellow, green, and all intermediate hues, from vests embroidered in gold, and jackets of cloths as various in dye. The Albanian, who carried an amazing armament of weapons in his belt, seemed the only belligerent in the company. The shops appear to be small booths, where the tradesman squats and waits for his customers, usually with a grave Mahomedan apathy. The grocers' and butchers' shops show no very strange difference from our own—only I notice that fish, dried and prepared in various unusual methods, is common, and that great black jams of "caviare" (the spawn of stock fish) are common. There is a manifest taste for spicy and strong things, pickles, and sauces, and biting flavours, as we come to the border of the East.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

THE forty-third anniversary was held on Wednesday, in Whit-week, at Little Portland-street Chapel, Langham-place. The day was one of the finest of the season, and at twelve o'clock the chapel was filled with a congregation comprising most of the Unitarian ministers, and many of the principal laymen of London, and a large number of friends from all parts of the country. The following were present at various parts of the proceedings on the two days:

George Buckton, Esq., of Leeds, president; Sir John Bowring, LL.D., F.R.S.; James Heywood, Esq., F.R.S.; Alderman J. Clarke Lawrence; Messrs. H. Bicknell, S. Shaen, S. Sharpe, W. J. Lamport, James Yates, M.A., F.R.S.; the Revs. T. Madge, J. J. Taylor, vice-presidents; W. C. Venning, Esq., treasurer; the Revs. R. B. Aspland and Robert Spears, hon. secretaries; the Rev. Dr. Bellows, of New York, president of the National Unitarian Conference of America, and his son, the Rev. H. Bellows; the Rev. C. H. Dall, of Calcutta; the Revs. Dr. Sadler, J. Martineau, H. Ierson, L. Lewis, H. Solly, T. L. Marshall, T. Hunter, J. C. Means, J. Marten, J. P. Ham, J. Heywood, J. Taylor, M. C. Gascoigne, M. D. Conway, W. H. Channing, T. Crowe, T. Rix, J. Phillips, C. Corkran, of London; and the following ministers, representing, as it will be seen, almost every part of the country:—M. Austin, Cirencester; S. Bache, Birmingham; Goodwin Barnby, Wakefield; W. Riche, Hastings; F. Bishop, Chesham; W. Blazely, Rotherham; T. W. Braithwaite, Horsham; J. A. Briggs, Headon; T. B. Briggs, Dover; B. L. Carpenter, Bridport; P. W. Clayden, Nottingham; C. C. Coe, Leicester; J. Cropper, Wareham; H. E. Dowson, Hyde; J. Freeston, Roodale; E. R. Grant, Portsmouth; D. Griffith, Cheltenham; W. Hargrave, Newport; E. S. Howse, Bath; W. James, Bristol; R. C. Jones, Bexhill; E. Kell, Southampton; J. F. Kennard, Billingshurst; A. Lunn, Chatham; R. B. Macellian, Maidstone; H. McKean, Oldbury; C. C. Nutter, Banbury; W. J. Odgers, Bath; J. E. Odgers, Kendal; I. Payne, Northampton; J. Shannon, Liverpool; R. Shaen, Royston; R. Shelley, Yarmouth; J. W. Smith, Ipswich; J. D. H. Smyth, Norwich; W. J. Smyth, Godalming; J. O. Squier, Cullumpton; J. C. Street, Newcastle-upon-Tyne; E. Talbot, Tenterden; T. Timmins, Bridgewater; A. W. Worthington, Mansfield; W. Shakspeare, Ilkeston; and R. Yelland, Ringwood; Messrs. L. Aspland, LL.D., Cowell Stepney, M.A., J. Anderson, B.A., J. Warren, LL.B., E. Lawrence, LL.B., W. D. Jeremy, M.A., D. Martineau, E. Mappin, R. Troubridge, W. N. Coupland, J. T. Hart, N. M. Verue, F. Collier, D. A. Gibbs, V. Collier, T. Smith, J. Hoggood, R. Shoorbridge, W. Ponder, O. Vidler, W. Sharpe, A. Simmons, R. Dunn, W. S. Cookson, J. T. Preston, A. Lawrence, A. Preston, E. T. Whitfield, E. Nettelford, J. T. Hart, F. Nettelford, E. Warren, H. Abraham, E. Enfield, Basil Martineau, I. M. Wade, S. S. Taylor, J. S. Lister, R. Bartram, J. Troup, E. Smallfield, A. Tozer, C. Bowring, and H. Ridge, of London; and Messrs. Leyson Lewis, Maidstone; C. J. Darbishire, Rivington; M. Andrews, Belfast; R. Pinnock, Newport, Isle of Wight; R. Moore, Bath; J. Munn and E. Mace, Tenterden; I. R. Mott and T. Prime, Birmingham; T. Avison, Liverpool; J. Armstrong, Manchester; A. Martin, Evesham; J. Anthony, Much Hadham; J. F. Ewan, Norwich; R. Tribe, Rochester; H. J. Morton, Leeds; C. Jecks, Norwich; E. Brace, Glasgow; E. Clephan, Leicester.

The Rev. J. C. STREET led the worship; after which, the Rev. Dr. BELLAWS, of New York, delivered in an admirable manner one of the most able and vigorous discourses ever preached before the association, from the words:—"For God who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ."—2 Corinthians iv. 6.

Taking for his subject the organising element in Christianity, with especial reference to the difficulties it encounters in a free theology, he examined, first, what Christianity has owed and still continues to owe to its positive institutions, churches, ministers, worship, &c.; and, secondly, what it owes to the diffusion of its spirit, embodied in political, social, and individual life, as distinct from any ecclesiastical and dogmatic tendencies. These two influences it is the aim of liberal Christianity to reconcile. Pure Theism had shown its utter inadequacy to meet the permanent wants of humanity. The great fact of mediocrity had proved attractive and powerful even in its most monstrous theories and perversions, and it was still a fundamental truth that the human race sees in Christ a revelation of God, and the means of access to Him. He welcomed the freest criticism and interpretation; but after all that science and critical theology could do, he felt confident that Christ is the sole instrument through whom a pure and lofty Theism can be organised and brought to bear upon society. This statement had both a positive and negative application. It unites us with all who receive the mediation of Christ, whatever be the form, and accompanied with whatever theological errors. It proclaims the Christian Church one and indivisible, the Holy Catholic Church, of which the Romanists are but a branch, like ourselves, if, indeed, we may not claim to be the trunk. But while uniting, it separates us (not finally, it might be hoped) from all who add to this condition their human creeds and interpretations as equally essential, and so the Christian Church is divided into two classes, whose differences descend deeper than the controversies between Catholics and Protestants—the body which sets itself upon the simple idea of God revealed in Christ, which organises faith and worship in external institutions, and the body which is founded upon external creeds and dogmas. It could not be denied that the greatest portion of Christendom is still in the creed-bound churches; and they have still power enough to make a great battle and win many a victory. Those who think the Roman Church dead or dying, do not remember its enormous hold upon its adherents, and the immense influence of the whole system on the mind and imagination. That ancient faith is not going to surrender in our days of less vehement Lutherans and less vigorous Calvinists. The Greek Church is also full of the new and ambitious blood of Russia, and threatens to plant the Greek Cross wherever Russia extends her influence, and will intensify even Roman fanaticism. It was only an instinct of ecclesiastical affinity which led the Anglican Church, at the present day, to cultivate alliance with the Greek Church. The preacher then referred to the second body—the uncreed Christians who believe in Christ and Christianity, but not in the dogmas and systems which have grown up around them; who are resolved to hold on to their Christian faith, while they are equally resolved to know all that is to be known and learn all that is to be learned from other sources of truth and wisdom. Composed as this body is of considerable portions in all Christian communities, and especially of those sects which have denied the doctrine of the Trinity in England and America, there is a vast and imposing future before it if it prove itself equal to the organisation of its forces. The problem is, union in the broadest faith of the Gospel combined with perfect individual liberty. Germany is full of the adherents of Liberal Christianity. America has lost half of her population from organised Christianity, and simply because the popular sects are powerless to keep them or recover the lost sheep to the sheepfold. The Unitarians of England in the presence of a powerful State Church, an immense majority opposed to them, and the predominant influences of society, have maintained a noble position, and have borne testimony not for themselves alone, but for an immense constituency with them. But the largest fruits of Unitarian Christianity are to be gathered in America, for there alone the field is comparatively open; the soil is not occupied by old prescriptive institutions. In America it is evidently supplying the crystallising force to a million of people, and doing much to show its competency to really organise the raw material of a new Christian era. The preacher here gave an interesting account of the new missionary operations in America, and the readiness of the people at large to hear Liberal Christianity preached in public halls in many of the chief cities both of the Eastern and Western States. The new interest in missionary operations is not merely a clerical or a mere sectarian interest, but the fruit of calm conviction on the part of Unitarian laymen, that the people cannot live and prosper without Christianity and organised institutions; and that the Gospel must be made credible and acceptable to minds wholly alienated or indifferent. After giving a brief account of the National Unitarian Conference, the preacher said that, in regard to England, he could not say what was their position and duty. It sometimes seemed in America as if the Broad Church were doing the work of liberal Christianity, and if it held the same essential principles, it had great advantage in its prestige and its organisation. England had more than once proved its power of change without revolution. But such possibilities should not diminish their zeal and attachment to positive Unitarian convictions. In America they never had half so much encouragement to labour for our cause as now. They were fully in earnest in their endeavour to stamp liberal Christianity on the whole American Church. He could not say that the future belongs to our denomination, but he felt confident that it belongs to our principles. In conclusion, Dr. Bellows tendered an emphatic expression of the sympathy with which he was charged by the National Conference, and the American Unitarian Association, and, indeed, by all American Unitarians. After a fervent appeal from the preacher, a collection was taken on behalf of the association, which amounted to £63. 16s. 11d.

THE BUSINESS MEETING.

After a brief interval, the meeting for transacting the business of the association was held; GEORGE BUCKTON, Esq., president, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN said: In opening the proceedings of this meeting for the business of the association, to report to you what your committee have done during the past year, I need not detain you with many words of mine. Your society has now been in active operation in its present form and constitution since 1826, and it is impossible to look back over the last forty-two years without being struck by the great changes which have taken place during that period in religious thought, and asking what is our position in the great movement around us. Now-a-days we have from far off distant land, from our cathedral aisle, or our village church, opinions which have been thought out and earnestly spoken, with but small success, for many years of anxiety and pious trust. I will not press the question, but whence come the utterances of a Voysey, a Stanley, or a Colenso, but from the same deep insight which actuated our earnest forefathers, who bore the heat and burden of their day in the history of our religious liberty? In our hands has been placed the trust of at least keeping trimmed and burning the light in our charge, and though ours may be, as a friend of ours has put it,

"A lonely light on lonely hill," and that ours are

still we must do the work we see before us to the best of our ability, and be well satisfied to see it done by others as well. We must be willing to yield the palm to those more successful in placing the truth before the world, and in humble submission thank God for thus rebuking our shortcomings. If we look around us we shall see we have still a great work to do. There never was a time when the world seemed so on the point of awakening to the consciousness that the foundations of the old dogmas were being taken from under them, and that the links which bound them to their old beliefs have proved faulty. Still, all the more does it devolve upon us to stand firm to our posts and proclaim that though creed after creed, test after test, and the record of the Pentateuch, or the Book of Revelation, be swept away, still there is God's truth, which we may ever help to teach the world; and if for no other reason than this, this society, which has for so many years kept this endeavour clearly before our world of thought, deserves our warmest interest and support. To many of us who may look within the walls we may have built around our ideas of a true church, it may at times appear hard to welcome those with views or theological opinions at total variance with our ideas of Unitarianism, men whose thoughts have led them to standpoints which our drift of circumstances has not drawn us to; but amidst all the variety of religious thought exercised and permitted amongst us, we are in reality so much at one that we are sure nothing but a clearer understanding of each others views and motives is required to bring us into closer co-operation. Since last we met even, great changes in thought have taken place, and great influences are working in the world which will produce great effects, whether for good or ill depends on the earnest active interest of all of us. Since last we met the great principle of the nation being responsible for the education of its people has been acknowledged; the injustice of upholding, in mockery to a people in great majority opposed to it, an Established Protestant Church in Ireland has been fully expressed; a liberty to interpret the words contained in the Book of Common Prayer has been granted, such as to leave within the walls of the Church men whose outspoken words will rally round them others who are in earnest, and who hitherto have been but formal members of that Church, but now are entering into that spirit of liberty which is the parent of energetic action. A deeper spirit of earnestness is working. We may expect many throes and struggles before old things pass away, but the thing will be if we are all faithful to our trust. With this spirit let us all unitedly continue the effort of this association, and carry on with renewed zeal the work which a larger opportunity than we have heretofore had lays before us.

The Rev. ROBERT SPEARS, secretary, read the annual report, a long but very interesting one. The past year was spoken of as one of more than usual activity, both in the society and in our churches; very large grants of book tracts had been made; interesting accounts were given of the work being done in Madras by Mr. W. Roberts, and more extended plans were alluded to for mission work in India. The approaching tercentenary of the establishment of Unitarianism in Transylvania; the death of Pastor Coquerel, and the prospects of liberal Christianity in France; the work doing by our American churches; the action of the association in regard to matters relating to civil and religious liberty were all successively and most interestingly treated, a tone of encouragement and hope breathing throughout the report.

The treasurer's report followed, read by W. C. VENNING, Esq. The total receipts were £3,092, but of this sum £2,200 was from legacies, only £503 being subscriptions; and the legacies were shown, on the other side of the account, to be invested, leaving only about £700 for the work of the association.

After the resolution for the adoption, &c., of the reports, moved by S. SHARPE, Esq., and seconded by Rev. S. BACHE, came the vote of greeting and thanks to Dr. Bellows, moved by Mr. Martineau. Our friends will, we are sure, be glad to have his speech and Dr. Bellows' reply at length.

The Rev. JAMES MARTINEAU said: Mr. President, I am charged with a very serious responsibility, for I am asked to express the sentiment and feeling of this congregation towards the eminent and powerful preacher who has addressed us so effectively this morning, and I feel that whilst his voice is still, as it were, ringing in our ears, and whilst the thrill of his utterance is still upon our hearts, there is a kind of profaneness in the attempt to interpret the impression which those words produced upon us all. Nor do I like, in the presence of that distinguished friend, to say precisely all that I would say were he not here. Happily, the committee of the association have coupled our expression of gratitude to him with a more general sentiment, a sentiment of affection and respect and gratitude towards the great country from which he comes, and especially towards those who are of "the household of faith" in that country with which we own ourselves to be allied. I will therefore quickly pass on to that subject, and only say with regard to the discourse this morning, that so far as my own impression goes, there could be nothing more seasonable, nothing more wise, and nothing more skilful than the treatment of many delicate subjects which were alluded to in that discourse. I believe I may say that although there might be particular parts in regard to which some of us would have expressed ourselves with a slight difference, yet in the essence every person present would be completely at one with the preacher. In marking out our position as lying between the two great extremes of the present day, the extreme that tends to sacerdotalism on the one hand and preserves the old mediæval superstitions, and the extreme on the other hand which flings itself entirely loose from every species of ecclesiastical organisation and ecclesiastical power, Dr. Bellows showed as much skill and wisdom as he did delicacy. I thank him most cordially for that wise address, and believe that in doing so I am but expressing the sentiment of this assembly. (Applause.) Happily this is only one of innumerable obligations which we are proud and delighted to acknowledge to our brethren across the Atlantic. America has for a long time returned us blessing for curse; for we must remember that New England was created, was called into existence by the persecution of Old England; and New England, on the other hand, has for a long time taught us lessons of wisdom, thought, and piety, which show at least that the religious allies we have there have forgotten those old grievances, and are ready to teach their old parent the lessons she has been too slow to learn. In this respect our country has performed a part which we sometimes find performed in our own families and in private life. It is not unfrequently the case that we find within the circle of perhaps a cold, indifferent, latitudinarian family there may arise among the young people some fervent, glowing spirit, full of a divine enthusiasm, determined to go into a life of self-sacrifice, of which the parents have never dreamed, and that the scheme is worked out with fidelity and devotedness—with a fidelity and a devotedness upon which the parents often look with a kind of pathetic reverence from a consciousness that, though right in itself, and calculated to place the next generation in a higher position, it is a thing which they are themselves unable to follow. So it is with a young country. Full often a young country startles the dull ear of the older land from which it has sprung by the tone of a richer thought, by the music of a sweeter piety, by the inspiration of a more glorious hope. The only difference is this, that in the case of the private succession of generations, alas! the lesson full often comes too late, when it is impossible for the parent to look with more than joyous tears upon the improvement which the younger generation promises to bestow. But it is, happily, different in the case of countries. We know that the humanity of nations never, never dies; it is for ever young, and for ever fresh—fresh from generation to generation as the cheek of a young child; and so, therefore, there is no inspiration that is so new but that, even in the most ancient country in the world, it may find a response. Happily, therefore, we are in a condition to learn lessons from those who are nationally descended from us. For my own part, I remember the time—it was a susceptible time, when I was myself a student—when the first impression was produced in this country by the writings of Dr. Channing. I remember reading with earnestness the first sermon of his that came over printed to this country, and taking it to my study. I shall never forget the impression produced by that, the eagerness which it awakened within me to know more of that great and noble heart, and the determination to devote myself more than ever to the sacred service in which there was such a leader. This, I believe, was the effect on many men of my own standing and age at that particular period. Well, sir, ever since, may I not say that a wind of salutary and invigorating influence has continued to blow from the West, and to bring ever fresher and sweeter influences to this Old World, sometimes soft and sweet as the pieties of a Henry and a Mary Ware, and at other times, it may be, setting in with a stiffer breeze and bringing clouds charged with the thunder and the lightnings of a Theodore Parker's eloquence; but whether in such a softness as to foster fresh flowers of Christian grace, or on the other hand, in such force as to sweep away the dust and pelt at the sins of our own Old World, still purifying the moral atmosphere and enriching the surface of our spiritual soil. We have but to-day an instance of the continuance of this grand and healthful influence. I cannot ask our friend, Dr. Bellows, to report to America, in adequate terms, our deep sense of his own personal services, and the impression which he leaves upon us to-day; but we may ask him to tell our friends there how gratefully and variously we own our obligations to their great writers and to their great actors. I say how variously, for be it observed, precisely the same movements of thought and feeling have been occurring on both sides the Atlantic, and every type of intellectual and religious excellence in America has its response, if not its counterpart in our country. Whether it is the Conservative scholarship of a Norton, or the speculative boldness of a Frothingham, or the evangelical devotion and charity of a Freeman Clarke, or the manly thought and social breath of a Dewey, or the balanced philosophy of a Hedge, or the tender and pious sentiment of a Bartol and an Alger, or the apostolic earnestness of a Gannett, they all speak to the hearts of some or other of us, and win our reverence and admiration. Our lives, though separated by space, are spiritually connected and spiritually parallel. I believe there is not a throb in the religious heart of that country but finds its response here. Let anything come here with the imprimatur of favourite American names, and it is speedily caught up. We are all of us, in spite of our physical separation, members of one common church, and we are affiliated in one common work. We greet with gratitude, and joy, and sympathy, whatever awakens and deepens our own religious life here, and we are thankful to have such a messenger as Dr. Bellows to carry back this expression of our thanks and obligations. (Applause.)

The resolution, which was seconded by the Rev. R. L. CARPENTER, having been carried amid loud applause,

Dr. BELLWS said: Mr. President, ladies, and gentlemen,—I assure you that I receive with much sensibility in my own name, and still more in the name of very many Unitarians in America, the very kind and hearty welcome given me by this resolution and by the voice of your distinguished representative who has moved it. I receive it with a sensibility which it would be in vain for me either to express or to conceal. I think it would be almost impossible for you here in England to understand the varied emotions that come over the hearts of American citizens—that is, American Unitarians—when they stand upon the soil and feel themselves touched by the hand of their mother, returning as it were to lisp again some of their infant sensibilities in the presence of that benignant power which gave them existence, which has fed them by its literature, led them by its example, made them in the rich inheritance of their recollections and affections all that they are. (Applause.) I have been striving with myself for a whole year to keep out of England, simply because I felt hardly strong enough in mental and physical health to endure the force of my own sensibilities as I should touch a country whose life and whose greatness I feel in every vein and every nerve of my body. Well, here I am, and here I am not only in my own person, but as the representative of a body of people who have been doing in America, I will not say in a humble way, but in a large and proud way, the work which you are doing here in England under difficulties that we have never had to contend with. (Hear.) As I stand here in your little Thermopylae, as it were, and see the noble three hundred that are fighting against the whole host, I feel really as if we ourselves have comparatively easy victories to achieve over an enemy only too ready to lay down its arms. I say I do not feel any complacency as I stand in the presence of those who have had to contend with social difficulties, the world's cold shoulder, the shadow of an Established Church, and the prejudices of a people whose thoughts have been from childhood turned in another way, and who have been led to believe that the path you were treading was the path of ruin. Now, I honour all the little you seem to do, knowing how much it has cost, and how great it is in its future results. And let me say that the Unitarians on the other side of the water do not feel any sense of superiority—very much short of that—when we come to compare all that our best men have done with all that your best men are doing. There is a magnifying glass somewhere in the midst of this great ocean which divides us that I daresay makes our great men seem very large to your kind eyes, but I am very sure it makes your great men seem very large to our eyes, be they kind or not. I do not know that I have ever had greater pleasure of a personal kind than in finding myself praised in your presence by one whom we all praise so profoundly and with such sincerity on our side of the water. To be praised by those who are so deeply and worthily praised, and to remember that they are sincere, cannot but give a thrill of delight even to the humblest. I will not, after having occupied so much of your time to-day, indulge myself here now with what it would give me only too great pleasure to do, going over all our joys and victories, and our trials and sorrows, comparing them one by one with yours, and telling you how much reason you have to take heart and courage when you know what hosts of gracious promises we are seeing opening in our own country, and how we feel that we are working for you, and know that you are working for us, and that we all have a future, which, if we prove faithful, will be one of the most glorious ever granted to faithful devotees of duty and truth. I came not to report to you disasters, or discouragements, or defeats, but to speak of glorious triumphs and great hopes. Therefore, I say to you, returning to you the profound thanks of my own spirit and the grateful affections of American Unitarians, you have only to go on as you have been doing, and as much better as you can, writing the books which you are continually writing and sending to us with the theological criticism which we love and value so much, and giving us the example of your interest in philanthropic and noble enterprise, and we will try to imitate you in all that is good and do as much better as we can, and we shall hope in the future to see nothing but a noble emulation between you and us. Let me say as to any supposed ill-feeling, that there is enough ignorance on both sides probably to produce it, but it is not in the minds and hearts of the good and true. We are sensitive to your criticism. What do we care about what France or Germany says respecting us, but when England says anything we can understand it, and perhaps it would be better sometimes if she were a little more careful of what she did say. Then again we are sensitive to the disapprobation of our good mother. We are good children and don't like to be scolded, and blamed, and misunderstood, particularly by her; but if I know the community from which I come, the Unitarian denomination, the intellectual life of America, I know that the genuine sentiment of all that is leading, and noble, and statesmanlike, there is one of the most profound sympathy and one of the intensest desire to move shoulder to shoulder with England through all difficulties, were it against the whole world. (Applause.)

One of Sir JOHN BOWRING's usual spirited speeches succeeded, in moving the third resolution for a petition to Parliament in favour of the Irish Church measures introduced by Mr. Gladstone. After which, Alderman J. CLARKE LAWRENCE moved the resolution for accepting "the invitation of the Unitarian Bishop of Hungary and of the Consistory" to their 300th anniversary at Torda, and appointing Rev. J. J. Tayler as a deputation. This was seconded by

The Rev. R. B. ASPLAND, who said he had no doubt that during this interesting festival week many of their friends in Hungary were thinking of them. There were many warm and grateful friends there. Many of the students who had come to this country to receive the completion of their education were in every respect men. The Hungarians were at this moment celebrating in their several congregations the interesting 300th anniversary of the establishment of the Unitarian Church, but there would be the Consistorian celebration of it in the month of August, when there would be an aggregation of all the churches in Hungary, and that would be a very solemn meeting. The Rev. John James Tayler had consented to go to Hungary as the representative of this association, and it was due to him (as his generosity might not be so well known to all as it was to the members of the committee) to state that he had declined to accept the offer which the committee had made to reimburse him for the expenses he would be put to; therefore he would go to Hungary as the representative of the association, but at his own charge. (Loud applause.) When we remember that for 300 years a Unitarian Church had existed in that interesting country; that it had done battle against persecutions enough to crush a much stronger church; that it survived in its integrity; that its zeal burnt as brightly to-day as at any period of its history, he was sure we must all feel both admiration and gratitude. (Applause.) In this country we could boast of little more than a century (if indeed so much) of Unitarian organisation. It was only 200 years since the first Unitarian congregation was formed within this great city, by John Biddle, in one of the chapels of St. Paul's, and therefore the churches who were about to celebrate their tercentenary anniversary were much more ancient than our own. He concluded by reading the address which it was proposed to present.

The Rev. JOHN JAMES TAYLER expressed his cordial acceptance of the trust reposed in him. He said he could only suppose that the circumstance which had in a manner singled him out to be the representative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association was that, in connection with Mr. Martineau, he had had some share in the training of the very promising young men who had come over to England to complete their theological and philosophical education. There were many circumstances, to render the gathering at Torda a matter of exceeding interest, and he looked forward to it with very great pleasure.

Interesting addresses followed from the Revs. W. JAMES and J. C. STREET, on the resolution for the continuance of the mission work in the north, and for the endeavour to raise an Indian Mission.

Various proceedings of a more merely business character succeeded; one, setting the committee at liberty to spend, to the amount of £500 a year if necessary, their invested legacies and donations—a step felt to be very desirable in view of the press of objects now urgently needing the support of the association; another, making some formal alterations in the rules with the appointment of officers; and a vote of thanks to the president, which every one felt to be most thoroughly earned by the close attention which he has given to the working of the association throughout the year. W. J. LAMPSON, Esq., of Liverpool, was appointed the president for the ensuing year.

THE COLLATION

took place on Thursday afternoon, at the Crystal Palace, in the large dining-hall. More than 400 ladies and gentlemen were present. GEORGE BUCKTON, Esq., presided. Upon the removal of the cloth, after "The Queen," proposed from the chair, and "Civil and Religious Liberty all the World over," given in an eloquent address by Sir JOHN BOWRING.

Alderman J. CLARKE LAWRENCE proposed "The British and Foreign Unitarian Association." He said it followed somewhat happily the sentiment which had preceded it, for from the first period when the association was formed its members had been noted as the firm supporters of civil and religious liberty, in all periods and in all countries. Forty-three years had passed since the association was formed, and if it were possible to collect from various parts of England representatives of congregations which had been formed and sustained by the association, there would be presented an argument for its support greater than any words that could be uttered. He was afraid they sometimes forgot the object which called them together, and that meeting in that place year after year, and greeting one another pleasantly, they forgot the responsibility that rested upon them as members of a body whose usefulness they were willing to recognise. They had heard the previous day, in eloquent tones which even now must thrill through the hearts of many present, the stirring language which told them of the necessity of association in these above all previous times, and he believed a greater truth was never uttered than that if they really did desire to see liberal opinions progress—if they desired to see that with the advance of civil liberty there should be the advance likewise, not merely of religious liberty, but of the duties which necessarily followed upon the exercise of religious liberty—they one and all must come to the conclusion that a duty rested upon them to fully and fairly consider in what manner they could best promote the association of persons in whom lived the sentiment of religious liberty as it did in the hearts of many whom he now saw before him. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association was the only general association of the kind that we had in this country. And was there any one who looked back upon its past history who could venture to say that it had received the support, or a tithe of the support, it should have received from the professed friends of civil and religious liberty? If they valued association at all, and if they valued the only association, the only general association that we, as a religious body, possessed, he maintained that it was a duty devolving upon every individual member of the Unitarian body throughout this country to do all that he or she could do to support, maintain, and extend it. If from the various districts that support which the association ought to receive, if from the 300 societies which were stated to exist, there was received anything like an adequate support, how different would be the result of the operations of each year's proceedings of the committee. They had heard year after year from the excellent secretary, Mr. Aspland, various accounts of the proceedings of the association. For how many years had the name of Aspland been connected with the association? (Applause.) This year the association had connected with it a name not so well known, but wherever known appreciated and loved. The name of the Rev. Robert Spears was valued wherever the services he had rendered were known. He was quite sure that it was not necessary for him to detail the various operations of the association.

OUR LONDON ANNIVERSARIES.

[Instead of attempting to condense the proceedings of the various meetings (which may be read very fully in the Inquirer), we are glad to be able, by the kindness of a correspondent, to give the following general sketch of them.—Eds. U. H.]

LONDON, JUNE, 1868.

Now that our week of "religious dissipation" is over, and one has time quietly to look back upon it, aye, and to begin to look forward to the next, it has occurred to me that you would like to hear a short account of the meetings from one who has attended most of them. I suppose it arose from the circumstance that there was not the same exciting interest in special questions as at the two last anniversaries of our denomination, that there were fewer of our most noted friends from the country than usual. One missed the familiar faces of the Revs. Charles Beard, John Page Hopps, J. Lettis Short, James and Robert Drummond, Crosskey, Gordon, Mr. New, and many others of those whom we have almost always hoped to see at these various gatherings. No doubt good and substantial reasons can be given by these gentlemen for their absence, and I do not for one moment attribute it to a falling off in interest in the various associations, which have just been commemorating their different anniversaries.

THE GENERAL BAPTIST MEETINGS.

I was not able to be present at the meetings at Worship-street Chapel, but I am informed by one who was, that the sermon delivered by the Rev. E. R. Grant, of Portsmouth, from the text, "Be not weary in well-doing," was an earnest and well chosen utterance, pointing out that a firm trust in God's providence should comfort us, even if the results of our labours appear but small and incommensurate with the pains taken to secure them.

At the meeting of the Assembly, and also at the evening meeting, somewhat one-sided discussions relative to Church Establishments took place, all the speakers, with I believe one exception, being in favour of the abolition of State Churches.

THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

One very interesting feature of this general Baptist anniversary was the presence of two ministers of the orthodox section of the general Baptists—Rev. James Harcourt, of the Borough-road, and Dr. Underwood, president of Chilwell College, near Nottingham, the latter of whom took part in the service, offering up the general prayer. At a subsequent part of the meeting, a resolution was unanimously passed appointing the Revs. J. C. Means, Samuel Martin, and J. Marten a deputation "to convey to the approaching General Baptist Association at Derby (the general gathering of the new connexion of Baptists which succeeded about a century ago on account of the Unitarian tendencies of the original body), the expression of our interest in their Christian welfare, and our desire for the interchange of friendly offices between the two parts of the general Baptist body."

The name and fame of Dr. Bellows attracted a very numerous attendance at the 43rd anniversary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, held at the Portland-street Chapel. To say that the sermon was universally admired would be untrue, but that it gave great satisfaction to a very large majority of those present is undeniable. I will not attempt to spoil it by giving a hash of the leading thoughts expressed; you will doubtless read and appreciate it when it has been published in its entirety. At the close, the rev. doctor made an earnest appeal on behalf of the association, and one of the largest collections which has been made for it for many years past, was the result.

At the business meeting the chair was taken by George Buckton, Esq., of Leeds, who, if not possessed of eloquence, seems to be filled with something far better, I mean earnestness. He has been one of the best presidents during his year of office that the association ever had, having, as Mr. Spears informed us at the meeting at the Crystal Palace, travelled up from Leeds in order to attend every committee, on 13 different occasions, of the association.

The report, which was somewhat long, spoke of the doings of the association in helping various churches in our denomination in Great Britain, India, and Transylvania. Reference was made to the approaching tercentenary festival of the establishment of Unitarianism in the latter country, and it was stated that the Rev. J. J. Tayler had consented to attend as the representative of the association. Interchange of communications still continued to be made with our friends in America, Italy, Germany, and France.

Several donations have been made to the association during the past year, amounting altogether to over £2,000. By the way, I am glad to see that there is a balance in hand. If my memory does not mislead me, I think that last year, when a statement was made in the committee's report that the "Yarmouth re-marriage case" had not been overlooked, it was greeted with marks of approval. It is impertinent to ask whether anything has been done in the matter, and if not, why not? There is an item of £23. 17s. 3d. charged for law expenses in this year's account; has this anything to do with it?

The thanks of the association were conveyed to the preacher by the Rev. James Martineau, in a speech breathing great cordiality and sympathy with our American co-religionists, while at the same time no unnecessary depreciation of our own shortcomings was made. The sentiments were reciprocated in a speech of corresponding tone, and we may feel assured that, if our transatlantic brethren become acquainted with the doings at the meeting, it will tend to a better and clearer understanding between ourselves and them. The other speeches were not above the ordinary average, and the proceedings, which had lasted for more than five hours, terminated with the usual complimentary votes. Having regard to the extreme heat of the weather, it would have been well if some provision for the refreshment of those present could have been made. In this respect, the difference between the meeting this year and that of last year, at Brixton, is noteworthy.

THE LONDON DISTRICT UNITARIAN SOCIETY.

The committee of the London District Unitarian Society, which has hitherto held its annual meeting on the Friday in Whitsun-week, determined this year to see whether they could not get a larger number of country persons present at their anniversary by holding it on the Wednesday. In this respect the meeting was no doubt a success. A larger number were present than usual; but, having regard to the calibre of the speeches, I cannot congratulate the society on the result of their experiment. Nor is this to be wondered at; most of those present had been at the service and subsequent meeting of the British and Foreign Association, added to which the day was excessively hot, and a high state of temperature is, as you may well know, not conducive to the conception of very brilliant ideas. As usual, the gathering was held at Radley's Hotel; and here let me give expression to the repeated complaints that I hear on all sides with regard to this place of meeting. I believe that this society and the Sunday-school Association would get more attendants at their meetings—both annual and otherwise—if they were to move to some other more suitable spot where better accommodation can be obtained. I have repeatedly heard persons say that they have gone away feeling very unwell after a meeting held there. If the windows are kept closed, then the room gets insufferably hot, and a disgusting smell of cooking pervades it; and if the windows are opened, then people shiver with the draughts which enter, not forgetting the noises which, in a neighbourhood greatly favoured (?) with barrel-organs, are a constant source of annoyance to both speakers and listeners. A large number of friends refuse to come to either the tea or the breakfast, because they say that the things provided are—well, to put it mildly—not nice. I do not consider myself a fastidious person, but I must say that I greatly sympathise with the complainants. It is not as if there were no other places to be obtained, but a strong conservative feeling seems to influence the committees. They say, "The meetings always have been held at Radley's, and therefore they had better keep to the old place"—a sort of argument which reminds one of that used by a member of some local parliament, on a debate as to the propriety of mending the town pump. "The pump always had been out of repair since he could remember, there always had been a difficulty when he was young to get water out of it, and he saw no reason why they should make any change now."

The chair was taken by J. T. Hott, Esq., in the unavoidable absence of the president, James Yates, Esq. It appears by the report that on the general fund of the society there is a balance of £57. 7s. 11d., and on the funds of the lay preachers, or, as it is now called the Lay Preaching Union, a balance of £39. 6s. 2d. due to the treasurer. Part of the legacy of £500 left by the late James Silver, Esq., has been invested, and the other part applied towards the reduction of the debt. From what I could gather of the report of the committee, it seems that although the society has met with some disappointments, and in some instances failed to meet with the success anticipated, yet on the whole the prospects are favourable. The Lay Preaching Union's report was as rose-coloured as ever. There are 44 laymen belonging to this union, and during the past year 31 of these have conducted 230 services at 14 stations. It would be interesting to know, perhaps, how far the congregations at these stations are composed of persons in the immediate neighbourhood, and how far they are made up of friends from other London Unitarian congregations, none of which are, as far as I can learn, full to overflowing. I have heard it whispered that the union, and the society with which it is affiliated, are attempting too much, and that the field of their operations is too wide; but then you know that people will say these things of the most prosperous society. One good thing they have done has been the printing and dissemination of sixty thousand leaflets containing a statement of our principles, from which good results have in many cases arisen. They have also distributed 6,000 tracts. Six stations are now regularly supplied with preachers, and the promoters of the Sunday evening services at the St. John's Square Chapel, Clerkenwell, belonging to the Free-thinking Christians, are indebted to the union for help. The expenses at this latter place are, however, entirely defrayed by private individuals. Of course great opposition is made to the efforts of the unionists; but they have reason to believe that in many instances a better feeling has arisen with regard to Unitarian principles, where formerly nothing but contempt for them existed.

The reports were adopted by the meeting, and ordered to be printed, subject to the approval of the Rev. T. Rix, who is to be satisfied that no further errors as to the mission at Stratford, which he stated had crept into print of late, should be published to the world at large, and to the readers of the Inquirer in particular. The other resolutions were of the usual nature, commending the society and its connective institutions, the appointment of officers and vice-presidents, &c. The speakers were the Revs. R. B. Maclellan, A. Lunn, A. W. Worthington, J. C. Street, R. Shelley, W. H. Channing, J. E. Odgers, F. Bishop, C. H. Dall (American missionary to Calcutta), W. Blazebey, and Messrs. E. Clephan, and J. T. Preston.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

The breakfast of the Sunday-school Association was better attended than usual, and was held under the presidency of W. J. Lamport, Esq., of Liverpool, who, in addition to his kindness in acceding to the wishes of the committee in taking the chair, has increased the funds of the society by a donation of £10.

The report of the treasurer showed that after paying off the balance of £26 due to him on last year's account, there remained a balance in hand of £29. 18s. As, however, I understand this account was made up to the end of last December, this balance will be considerably diminished, if not totally absorbed, in defraying the expenses of a new work recently published by the association, entitled "Lessons from the Epistles and Lives of the Apostles," by the author of "Morning Lessons."

The report of the committee naturally referred to the various charges which have of late been made against Sunday schools, and equally naturally they have come to the conclusion that the want of success does not arise so much from any fault in the system as from the inadequate supply of teachers. The returns from 179 schools show 22,102 scholars on the books, with an average morning attendance of 12,889, and an afternoon attendance of 15,805. For these there are 3,464 teachers on the books, but their average attendance was not given, though it appears from the broadsheet—copies of which were distributed about the room—that the average morning attendance is about 1,521, and in the afternoon about 1,747, or one for every nine children. Referring to the question of teaching writing and cyphering in the Sunday school, the committee thus state the result of their inquiries: "If a line be drawn across the country—say from Shrewsbury to Lynn—the schools north of that line in which writing, if not arithmetic, is taught, will be the rule; south of it they will be the exception. In Scotland it is not found necessary to teach these things on Sunday, nor in Wales either, apparently, to any extent." An increase in the sale of the society's publications has taken place, partly owing to the improved nature of the books published, and to the extended knowledge given of them, which has been caused by the transmission of boxes containing specimens of the works issued, some of which, by the way, the secretary hints, are standing still in unknown whereabouts. A handsome donation of £50 has been received from Mrs. M. E. Tayler, of Hook.

In proposing the resolution adopting the reports, the Rev. J. J. Tayler dwelt upon the importance of the Sunday school being essentially a religious institution, although in cases where there was no other means of imparting secular instruction, he would not oppose it on any Sabbatical grounds. The work of the Sunday school and the instruction afforded by the pastor of a congregation really formed part of one and the same work, which, instead of being superseded, was more than ever important at this day. It was said that the Sunday school was the nursery of the church. If this were so, he was convinced that when the church was actuated and guided by that deep and fervent religious life which ought to actuate it, then that religious life would express itself in a voluntary overflow of real and good work which would not render the experience of the want of teachers any longer a complaint in their schools.

Mr. Martineau, also, in supporting the resolution, spoke in favour of religious instruction simply in the Sunday school; it was impossible in the short time devoted to the work of the Sunday school to give much time to the intellectual training of the children; this should be the work of the day school, and the state of society would always remain rotten and unwholesome until their Sunday schools had some day-school instruction, which should be increased until all their Sunday schools were finally set at liberty to devote the hours of the Sunday to the awakening of the moral and religious affections of the children. The publications of this society were greatly improved, both having regard to their use by the scholar as well as by the teacher. If he could carry out his own idea he would have no book used at all, but let the teacher go to the class with his mind fully prepared to give the lesson orally.

The other resolutions, which were of the usual formal character, were moved by the Chairman, and seconded by Mr. Clayden and Mr. Street; the Rev. J. Freeston returning thanks for the welcome accorded to the representatives of the other kindred societies. In doing so, he took strong ground against the attempt to press the exclusion of secular teaching from the Sunday school. He suggested the establishment of a teachers' manual containing outline lessons of a moral and religious nature.

Samuel Sharpe, Esq., then introduced the subject of "Raising the education in Sunday schools."

"He said his remarks applied more especially to London, where the children had generally learnt to read or write. In their schools the children came to read the Bible. They felt that they were treated like babies. They could read the Bible just as well as their teachers, and no wonder that they got listless over it. He could wish that the teacher was always competent to carry on the higher teaching Mr. Martineau and Mr. Taylor so ably alluded to, but they had to do with circumstances as they existed, and at present it was not so easy to get teachers who could carry on that high work. He recommended the adoption of a plan of teaching Greek or some other language to the scholars. He referred to one school in London which, feeling the difficulty of keeping children in the school, had, for the purpose of winning them to be attentive when learning their lessons, introduced the use of the French Testament. It was taught in four classes, morning and evening, and the result was that elder scholars had come back into the school who had otherwise quitted, and said, 'If you will give us this interesting information we will come and join your school.' This was religious instruction, and was winning them back to the high moral aim of which they had been speaking. In the same school they had two classes teaching the Greek Testament, and, to show how much it was valued, ten children had paid down their money to buy a copy, and were learning it very busily. Some of the teachers and also members of the congregation had joined the school in consequence of this going on. In another school three teachers were teaching the Greek Testament, and some twelve children trying to learn. Other schools had French and Latin classes, and were attended by children who came on purpose to receive this instruction. The scheme, of course, met with many objections. It was said it was not fit for their station, and that they brought in a class of children for whom the school was not intended. He thought that great benefit would be derived from mixing children of different classes, and they would both be the better for it. Then it was said that a little learning was a dangerous thing, and that a smattering of knowledge was objectionable; but the reply was that everything must have a beginning. Some said it was of no use to the children, but he did not know why. Most of those present had learnt foreign languages, and even if they forgot them in after life they were all the better for them, and why should not these children have the same advantages? There were some arguments of worth which might urged against it, and Mr. Martineau and Mr. Taylor had been beforehand in some of them. It was said that it would be better to confine them to moral instruction in reading the Bible. But then he returned to the facts of the case, which were not to be contradicted, namely, that the children were tired of reading the Bible; they were listless over it; they left the school too young, and it was proposed to shorten the school hours. His proposition was not to interrupt any other teaching; there would be as much time given to the other subjects, and there would be as much moral and religious influence exercised for good, even if their time was occupied in reading the Bible in a foreign language. The gist of his argument would be that they should allow and recommend the teachers of the classes to teach the children to read the Bible in any language that the teacher and his pupils wished for, and that by admitting that into the school they would produce a higher moral and religious result than by excluding it. If they could introduce a small knowledge of the Greek Testament into their Sunday schools, it would certainly be carried on in day schools afterwards, and the object so much desired by Mr. Taylor of obtaining a learned ministry would be promoted. Mr. Taylor and Mr. Martineau were carrying on an excellent work in educating ministers in the Unitarian body, but they would work in vain if the congregations did not wish for it. The one practical reason that would weigh against his recommendation was that if the children in the Sunday schools were taught these things, those persons in the congregations who felt themselves of a higher station would really have to brush up and learn something themselves. (Laughter and applause.) When such a plan was recommended, he had heard the remark made, 'What a bother, I shall have to learn it myself.' (Laughter.) He believed that was the one difficulty standing in the way of his recommendation." (Applause.)

The remarks of Mr. Sharpe appeared to create some surprise to many of our country friends, but those who know that gentleman, and are acquainted with the persistency with which he advances these ideas, were not so startled, though perhaps not more convinced.

Mr. F. Stephens, of Norwich, was disappointed at what had fallen from Mr. Sharpe; he had hoped for something more practical, and he proceeded to give an account of what was done in his, the Norwich school. At the close of his remarks, the chairman intimated that other speakers must confine their utterances to ten minutes, but, at the request of the meeting, made it five.

Mr. James Heywood was struck with the novelty of the idea, and should suggest its being carried out at Kensington.

The Rev. H. Solly thought things had come to a pretty pass when it was said that children were reading the Bible listlessly, and thought there must be something radically wrong with the teacher if such were the case. He did not sympathise with the suggestions made by Mr. Sharpe; he would have the instruction made more lively.

Rev. C. H. Dall considered we should try to reach the imagination and affections of children, and should imitate Christ in teaching them in parables.

Rev. R. Shelley considered the greatest difficulty in carrying out Mr. Sharpe's plan would be experienced in getting teachers capable of doing it.

Mr. Bartram suggested that if we had at last found the panacea for all the ills that Sunday schools were heir to, in order to make the publications of this society more interesting to the children, they had better henceforth publish them in a foreign language. His idea of the Sunday school was that it should lead up to and develop itself into the church. He had known instances where the children had come for the French class alone, caring nothing about the school, and going in another part of the day to other Sunday schools. Our aim should not be a mere desire to appear well in the annual returns, but to develop the moral and religious feelings of the children, which he did not believe would be done by the means suggested by Mr. Sharpe.

The Rev. J. C. Street and Mr. Stannus supported the views of the opener of the discussion, and Mr. Wade spoke of the individual liberty of the teacher to be allowed to teach whatever he thought best—a question totally apart from that under discussion. Mr. Sharpe shortly replied. It would have been gratifying to have heard Mr. Martineau and Mr. Taylor speak upon the suggestions made by Mr. Sharpe, as their remarks were rather in an abstract form.

THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN ASSOCIATION: THE GATHERING AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

We were not favoured with our usual Whitsuntide fine weather at the meeting at the Crystal Palace, a sort of Scotch mist and heavy rain alternating. The collation was nevertheless well attended, over 400 persons being present. George Buckton, Esq., was president, and after the usual loyal toasts called upon Sir John Bowring to propose the toast of "Civil and Religious Liberty all the world over." This he did in a very vigorous and, moreover, a short address, but with the inevitable reference to Buddha which characterises nearly all the worthy knight's utterances. Alderman J. Clarke Lawrence proposed the toast wishing success to the association whose forty-third anniversary they were then commemorating, and in doing so made an earnest appeal for aid to the funds, which met with a prompt response, for before the meeting closed £310 was promised in the room, Mr. Mappin heading the list with £50. The Rev. R. Spears acknowledged the toast. The Rev. H. Ierson proposed the health of Dr. Bellows, in a long speech, in which, unfortunately, he managed to create a feeling of disagreement among those present, which in one case, when he alluded to the proceedings against Mr. Eyre, called forth a mingled storm of cheers and hisses, mingled with cries of "question," "shame," "sit down," and others of the like nature. Surely, too, there is no need, now that the American struggle is virtually over, to rake up old sores, even though the rev. gentleman's predilections may have been in favour of the North. It is a wholesome rule that at social gatherings of this sort, when men of different opinions meet upon common ground, anything of a controversial nature should be avoided. The speeches at this meeting were all too long; in fact, several of the proposed speakers had to withdraw their names as such; it should be borne in mind that people do not go to these dinners to be bored with long-winded utterances.

"Man wants but little here below,

should fix itself on the minds of those who are privileged to address the assembled guests. Of course I must always except the speech of our American brother, who was by turns humorous and earnest, and always eloquent. The Rev. J. C. Street gave an interesting account of the doings of the pitmen at Choppington, and the customary complimentary toasts were given and duly acknowledged.

Taken as a whole, the meetings were a success, although, as I have pointed out, there were some points upon which improvements could be made.

INTELLIGENCE.

BOLTON.—The Whitsuntide school proceedings were inaugurated by a special service in Bank-street Chapel, on Sunday afternoon, at which the scholars of both schools were present, as well as a number of their parents and teachers. The service was conducted and an address delivered by the Rev. J. Worthington. On Friday afternoon, the scholars and teachers, 600 in number, marched in procession to a field, kindly lent for the occasion by Mr. Robert Heywood. On Saturday, upwards of 400 went to Windermere. Out of this number, 120 were from the Sunday School, Ainsworth; 80 from the Mawdsley-street (Independent) School, Bolton; and 45 from the New Connexion School, St. George's Road; the remainder being made up from the Bank-street and Commission-street Schools.

GORTON.—On Whit-Thursdays, the scholars and teachers walked in procession to the residences of several members of the congregation, returning to the schools for tea, and spending the remainder of the day in the field surrounding the chapel, in various games. On Friday, most of the elder scholars and teachers, accompanied by many parents and friends, went to Chester. The schools are in a very prosperous condition.

HULL.—The annual sermons on behalf of the Sunday schools were preached on Sunday last by the Rev. Charles Howe, of Dewsbury, when the attendance was good, and the collections were very satisfactory.

MANCHESTER: ROCHDALE-ROAD.—On Whit-Wednesday, the teachers, scholars, and friends went to Lilly Lane Farm, Moston; on Thursday, to Styal, near Handforth, in luries; on Friday, to Queen's Park, returning for tea in the schoolroom. Above 200 sat down to tea. The certificates and prizes for regular attendance and good conduct were awarded by the Rev. Samuel Robinson. On Whit-Saturday, the teachers and elder scholars went to Hassop, for Chatsworth, and were highly pleased with their trip.

SHEPTON MALLET.—On the 3rd inst., a social tea meeting was held, when about sixty persons were present. After the tea, a public meeting was held in the chapel, the Rev. J. A. Brinkworth, the newly settled minister, presiding, when a variety of topics were discussed at great length. Altogether a most pleasant evening was spent, and the determination was strong in those present to do more than they had hitherto done to promote the great interests of Christian truth and righteousness.

CORRESPONDENCE.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

E. H.—We have given so much space to the subject of your letter, as you will see, that we are obliged to decline it.

UNITARIAN OR FREE CHRISTIAN?

To the Editors.—Some interest attaches to the views enunciated by two of your correspondents on the subject of the Unitarian name; and impressed as I am with a conviction of the gravity of this question as it affects, and will affect the prosperity of our denomination in the progress of our churches, I venture to point to some reasons which, growing from many experiences, have intensified a long ripening opinion upon the subject.

It cannot be denied (and your correspondents' letters bear witness to it) that there is much misapprehension on the point of what is really meant by the term "Free Christian" as applied to the churches of our body. If there be any reason for a distinctive name to any church, its adoption must be a consequence arising out of the existence of some particular quality in that church, for which it desires to be distinguished. It follows, then, that the name should either represent the character of the place, or to some extent the principles of its people, else why the necessity for the name? Does, then, "Free Christian" express either the character of our faith or the nature of our freedom? To call a place "Christian" would simply mean Christ's, and to call it "Free Christian" within the borders of a land filled with Christian churches, must by implication mean "freer than those from which it is so distinguished." The standpoint, it appears to me, of all argument upon the subject is here, for the words to a non-Unitarian must certainly appear to have a distinctly different meaning from that which it is the intention of the Unitarian to convey by them. The Unitarian, conscious that he enjoys a larger measure of religious freedom than most of his fellow-Christians, is led (as I interpret it) to adopt for his chapel the term "Free Christian," simply because he is absolutely free from the necessity of doctrinal subscription, from tests of faith, and from religious conditions of congregational membership. This to many of our brethren seems a sufficient reason for the adoption of the term. But it is, unfortunately, often overlooked that those who are entirely ignorant what principle it is in our church which constitutes this perfect freedom may not so interpret the words.

To those who know nothing of our principles the "Free Christian" name must undoubtedly convey the impression that our freedom consists in an unlimited measure of theological licence, if not of absolute doctrinal uncertainty. If there be any intelligent Unitarian who could expect it to be otherwise in those who are strangers to our faith, I would assure him that there are many places of worship (and some in this town) which have endeavoured to become distinguished by names almost equivalent to "Free Christian." There are, for instance, here, a class who call themselves "Free Gospelers," another adopts the name of "Free Methodists," and a third that of "Free Grace Givers." Now to the Unitarian friends of the term "Free Christian," it becomes a question how they would define or interpret the religious character of, or the amount of Christian freedom possessed by, each of these congregations, as far as it is implied in their respective names. Is it not impossible to do so? Then equally impossible is it for strangers to our faith to define our character or the extent and nature of our freedom by the name "Free Christian." To show how far these names are justified by the sects alluded to, I may state that the first are simply and purely Tractarian, the second propound a theology as dogmatic as that imposed by the liturgy of the Church of England, and each of them demand a test of congregational membership. It may be seen from these illustrations that it becomes a question whether it is either judicious or expedient that the name "Free Christian" should be adopted by our newly rising places of worship.

It may also be fairly asked, what justification there is for abandoning a name which, though doctrinal, is clearly adapted to us, and the adoption of which was forced upon us by the existence of other doctrinal names to which the meaning of our own is distinctly opposed? It appears to me that there is far more honour in bringing men to a perfect consciousness that Unitarian Christianity means free Christianity, than to preach or declare simple Unitarianism, after abandoning the Unitarian name and adopting another under which to declare it. In the first, the beauty of our faith would be made to shine fully out; in the latter it would be lost, for under the banner of "Free Christian" a man should naturally expect a free communion; but the praise is ours if, under the Unitarian name, and by fidelity to our cause, we demonstrate to all the simplicity and beauty of our faith as well as the nature and truth of our freedom.

It may be likewise asked, should we in any way enhance the value of our religious principles, or improve their estimation in the minds of others, by adopting the "Free Christian" name? It seems to me that, so far as those principles have been made known in the works and teachings of our most illustrious men, their grandeur, beauty, and effect would be materially impaired if they were distinguished under any other name but that of Unitarian. Was not the effect of Channing's works upon the Trinitarian portion of this nation more profound and deep by his masterly declarations of truth and freedom under the Unitarian name? Would it have advanced the Unitarian cause if he had given to the world these grand expositions of liberty and truth under the name "Free Christian?" The same remark applies to the works and teachings of other eminent names, and can be illustrated with equal appropriateness by the name of your useful weekly journal, for if a particular name is properly applicable to a church, it should be equally suitable to all the literature pertaining to it. But who will for a moment maintain that the term "Free Christian Herald" would better express the character of your paper or the views propounded by its editors and supporters? Under the title of "Free Christian," would not the journal bear the same evidences of Unitarian principles that it does now?

Originally a Trinitarian, but from the results of personal research a Unitarian, I have endeavoured, with the recollection of past impressions, to look upon this question from at least two points of view, and I must confess that, though even now more largely read in Trinitarian than in Unitarian theology, I feel that the beauty and purity of our faith is best expressed by the Unitarian name, even though regarded as a dogmatic name; for to me that name shines forth filled with associations of all that is beautiful, liberal, and true in the history of the past; and if we desire to be in fellowship with those who have so far carried that faith onward, and to whom we are in some measure indebted for our religious freedom, let us proclaim it under the same standard, and by satisfying inquiring minds and anxious hearts everywhere prove that Christ's faith is our faith, and his freedom our freedom. Having so worked to this end, then indeed shall our church and its ministers be worthy of a loftier distinction than either the former name or the latter.—Yours faithfully, T. E. STEPHENS.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

AN APPEAL FOR INDIA.

At the last Annual Meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, in June, 1867, the following Resolution was agreed to:

"That it be an instruction to the Committee to consider how they can best meet the present religious wants of India; and that if they see their way to advance the knowledge of pure Christianity by the establishment of Missions or by a large distribution of books, this meeting pledges itself to assist them in raising any additional funds which may for any or all of these purposes be required."

It must be obvious to all our friends that such an effort as this indicates, would entail an expenditure which the present funds could not bear, and yet the Committee are anxious to meet the wishes of the members of the Association. We may say that during the past year we have had most assuring statements made to us of the prospects of success for Unitarian Christianity among the two hundred millions of India, if we enter heartily into this cause; and also that Christianity is the only hope for higher civilisation in India, and that our form of faith is the only one that can possibly succeed among that people. The English Unitarians have at present only one distinctively Unitarian Chapel and minister of religion in that great country, at Madras alone. During the past few months we have had considerable correspondence with the Rev. W. Roberts (a native), of Madras; and Miss Carpenter has informed us that Mr. Roberts is doing a good work, and would be able to do our cause more useful service if he could be freed from his secular labours by a stipend from us. Our Appeal for India, therefore, is intended to aid Mr. Roberts, and to promote a more general diffusion of Unitarian Christianity by an efficient Missionary or Missionaries in that country. We need not remind our people that as India is under the British rule, and that we are the recipients of some of the temporal advantages of this connection, we owe the people of India some effort and sacrifice to convey to them the Gospel of Jesus Christ.—Yours very faithfully,

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

The Roman correspondent of the Pall Mall Gazette says:

"On the 4th, Baron de Meyenberg, envoy extraordinary from the Emperor of Austria, proceeded to the Vatican for an official audience. The Baron had a long interview with the Pope, and though great secrecy is preserved, I am enabled to state that the Holy Father refused to sanction the abrogation of the Concordat and the other religious measures of the Reichsrath."

An Indian paper reports the occurrence of an atrocious case of suttee at Sheolee, in the Cawn-pore district, by the widow of a Brahmin. The ceremony was gone through formally, and almost ostentatiously. She was escorted to the funeral pile by a procession with music, and was then and there burned to death, the torch being applied by her own son. About seventeen of the more prominent actors have been arrested, and will probably be made a severe example of. The conduct of the police seems also to be deserving of severe punishment, for although the intention to perform the suttee was known in the neighbourhood some days before it was carried out, they took no steps to prevent it.

Just as Austria has got rid of the Concordat which gave the Roman Catholic clergy a right equivalent to that of the censorship, the Government of Bavaria, which has boasted somewhat of its independence of ecclesiastical supremacy, is permitting the encroachment of the clergy upon civil rights. The Archbishop of Munich has been indulged with the seizure of a newspaper of that city which had traced the decline of agriculture in Bavaria to the idleness fostered by the numerous holidays and pilgrimages of the church.

The second report of the Ritual Commissioners has rather an intricate appearance, but when reduced to its elements its effect may be stated in a reasonably simple form. Twenty-three of the commissioners unite in recommending that the use of incense and lighted candles should be restrained by enabling any five resident parishioners who shall be householders and declare themselves members of the Church of England, or any three such parishioners in places where the population is under 1,000, to complain to the Bishop of the diocese if any innovation has been made on previous practice in these respects. The Bishop, upon such application, is to forbid the practice, and is to have power to enforce his orders in a summary manner. There is to be an appeal from the Bishop to the Archbishop; and they are to have power, if any legal question shall arise before them, to state a case for the opinion of the Privy Council. The Bishop of Oxford and Mr. Harvey Goodwin qualify their signature to this report by a note, the effect of which is that their object in concurring in the report is that offences may be removed by strengthening the hands of the Bishops, and that the ritual of the Church may be regulated by living authority. Sir Robert Phillimore, Mr. Hope, Mr. Hubbard and Mr. Gregory, more logically, as it appears to us, add that, holding the views of the Bishop of Oxford and the Dean of Ely, they feel themselves precluded thereby from signing the report. The Dean of Westminster and Mr. J. D. Coleridge qualify their signatures by a note to the effect that their reason for signing is that they think that the proposal of the commissioners gives "an effectual and sufficient remedy" in cases in which the parishioners object to the use of incense or candles, but that they are of opinion that variety on such matters should be allowed if the parishioners like it. Lastly, Lord Beauchamp and Mr. Perry refuse to sign the report at all, and each of them gives a long statement of his reasons for not doing so.

The Freeman gives an interesting sketch of the work of one of the earliest pupils of Mr. Spurgeon's college:

"Mr. E. G. Gange, a few years ago, was invited to supply the pulpit at Lake-road Chapel, Landport, Portsmouth, at a time when the place was nearly empty and the church was reduced to some seventy members. The chapel soon became crowded. Great spiritual success followed the preaching of the Word. A new chapel and commodious schoolrooms were erected, at a cost of about £7,000; the chapel will accommodate 2,000 persons; all the sittings are let and the building on the Sabbath evening is always crowded; the church now numbers 600 members. The schoolroom, like the chapel, is overcrowded. Between 600 and 700 children attend the parent school; and there are, we believe, five branch schools in lively operation. A Bible-class containing about eighty young women has for a long time been diligently carried on, and the young men of the church supply a number of preaching stations in the surrounding villages."

The dispute in the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church of Ireland on religious endowments is, it seems, not yet at an end. It broke out again the day after the passing of the resolution of regret and alarm at the prospect of the disestablishment of the Irish Church, when the Rev. Mr. Berkeley read a long protest, on the part of the minority, setting forth reasons for objecting to the resolutions which were adopted by the majority. The reasons were not very strong or very broad, chiefly dwelling on the dreadfulness of the idea of error, that is, Popery, being endowed along with truth.

More than usual interest was imparted to the annual meeting of the Palestine Exploration Fund by the presence of Lieutenant Warren, who has recently been conducting the explorations in the Holy Land. In opening the proceedings, the Archbishop of York said that though Lieutenant Warren's discoveries were not calculated to change the face of history, they were exceedingly important in their results. The secretary reported that there had been a large increase in the number of subscribers, but the income limited the society's explorations to the immediate neighbourhood of Jerusalem. Lieutenant Warren had discovered an immense network of reservoirs and aqueducts, and had demonstrated that the account of Josephus as to the height of the city walls was no great exaggeration after all. He had arranged to return to Jerusalem in the course of a few days, and he hoped to make a more permanent residence there. The treasurer reported that the income during the past year had been over £5,000, of which £3,000 had been expended in Lieutenant Warren's explorations. There had also been a large expenditure in photographs, but the sale of those photographs had been very limited. Lieut. Warren described at considerable length the nature of the work he had undertaken in the Tyropeon Valley, Moriah, Akse, and the west side of the Kedron Valley. The discoveries were mostly underground channels, passages, fountains, aqueducts, and matters relating to the topography of the city. Few works of art had been found, though some of the excavations had been carried to a depth of 60 feet and 80 feet. He had met with great difficulties in consequence of the jealousies of the natives employed under him, but he had been able to overcome them by an admixture of opposing sects and parties.—Mr. A. H. Layard, M.P., said that at present we had scarcely any specimens of Jewish art, and though we might expect that some discoveries of art works might be made, we must not expect such extensive discoveries as had been made at Nineveh.

A very bold step has been taken by Mr. Ben-Oliel and his friends at Addiscombe in consequence of the refusal of the Archbishop of Canterbury to license him to officiate there. Mr. Parnell, a resident in the neighbourhood, has undertaken the erection of a church at a cost of £8,000, the whole expense of which he will bear, and in this church Mr. Ben-Oliel will conduct the ministrations of the Church of England (of which he is a regularly-ordained priest) in spite of the Archbishop's prohibition, although in the diocese of Canterbury he will be compelled to occupy the status of a Dissenter. Much excitement prevails in consequence of this extraordinary state of things in Addiscombe and its neighbourhood. The new church will be dedicated to St. Paul.

The Archbishop of Armagh has convoked the synod of that province without any authorisation from the Crown. The act, of course, is illegal, and punishable.

Mr. Brewin Grant's "anti-Ritualistic" campaign turns out, says the English Independent, "as might be supposed, to be a stump on behalf of the Irish Church. Possibly he may convince the audiences he addresses that he represents 'the more observant English Dissenters;' but he will find it very hard to convince them of his own sincerity. He best knows the proper market for his eggs; but not even this accession of talent to Mr. Disraeli's company will suffice to keep the concern going beyond the present season."

The Society of Friends have held their yearly meetings in London and in Dublin. From the statistical returns made to the Irish Assembly, it appeared that there are in Ireland 2,898 members, making, on the whole, a net increase of 48. The number of settled "meetings" is 327. There are 265 recorded ministers, and about 400 unrecorded. The 265 are distributed in 129 meetings, leaving 198 without any. The 600 are found in 170 meetings, about 80 of which have no recorded ministers. More than 100 meetings never hear a voice, except when strangers happen to call. There are 636 elders distributed in 165 meetings. The distrains for church-rates, tithe-rent charge, and other demands, were 210 for an aggregate amount of £1,902. The amount of distrains in Ireland was about £280. Upon the English statistics it was remarked that the resignations were fewer than in any year since numbers have been reported, that, whereas between 1800 and 1850, there was a yearly loss of from 100 to 200, there was now a small gain, and that the Sunday services attracted more strangers in Lancashire, Yorkshire, and Durham, than in any other counties. These facts and figures gave rise to conversation on the state of the society. The conservative friends gave warning against innovations. Mr. J. Forster was afraid that the reading of the Scriptures in meetings for worship was gaining ground; and, much as he valued the Bible, he could not attend a meeting where it was systematically read. Mr. J. J. Dymond regarded the increased reading of the Scriptures as a proof and fruit of increased vitality. Mr. C. Wilson said it would split the society. Complaints of unsound doctrine, of "serious heresy," were made in reference to the Lancashire Quarterly Meeting, where, as Mr. J. Forster said, "the poison was spreading," and that, as another added, "for years." Pamphlets had emanated from Manchester "opposed to the general faith of Christendom." A report, by many deemed false, had got into circulation, to the effect that many of the Canadian Friends are Unitarians.

The John Bull says that the writer of the Church and State articles in the Globe "is reported to have been an ex-Dissenting minister, now a mere Erastian." The English Independent hints that the Rev. H. Christopherson is referred to—a man, we believe, who fancied he was never properly appreciated by Dissenters.

The living of Ditcheat, Somersetshire, has been held by five rectors of the same family in succession. The dates of their institution are as follows:—Thomas Leir, 1699; Thomas Leir, 1730; Thomas Leir, 1781; William Leir, 1812; and William M. Leir, 1861.

On Sunday last, the Rev. J. Llewelyn Davies delivered a sermon to his congregation in London, in which, while pointing out what seemed to him the advantages of a connection between the Church and the State, he spoke strongly against the maintenance of the Irish Establishment.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

A REMARKABLE article in the Civiltà Cattolica, which may be regarded as the official doctrinal organ of the Papacy, speaks in a manner which "liberal Catholics" must find it difficult to reconcile with the views they profess of the relations of the spiritual and temporal powers. If the basis of society be shaken, it says, in the present day, we owe it to the doctrine of the independence of the civil power; a doctrine whose birth was contemporaneous with Protestantism, and which is even admitted by certain Catholics, who may be sincere indeed, but are very insufficiently informed. A temporal prince may be sovereign in a certain sense; but it by no means follows from thence that his sovereignty is not subordinate to an authority of a higher order, such as the spiritual power. Non est potestas nisi a Deo. Gallicans and Royalists pervert the sense of this text, and apply it to the independence of the civil power. But such an error is refuted by the words that follow: Quæ autem sunt, a Deo ordinate sunt; and which (according to the article in question) the Doctors of the Church and the greatest theologians have interpreted in the sense that there must be two powers, the civil and ecclesiastical; that there must also be relations between these powers. But it would be absurd to suppose that the ecclesiastical power should be subservient to the civil, because that would be to reverse the natural order of things:

"Nothing remains, therefore, but the contrary rule, which is, that the temporal power be subservient to the spiritual, just as the body is to the soul. It is necessary, therefore, that he who possesses even sovereign power to govern temporarily should be directed by the Roman Pontiff, who is placed by God at the head of the Church, and appointed supreme master and guardian of the truth and of the immutable rules of justice."

Then, addressing "liberal Catholics," the same journal assures them that "they will gain nothing by interpreting the decrees of the Holy See after their own imaginations," and exhorts them to "put a stop to heterodox laughter at such attempts," by "adopting the Catholic doctrine without commentary." It then goes on to declare, once more, that the Roman Pontiff have pronounced "all liberty of public worship, liberty of the press," to be "madness, poison, pestilence," that "nothing of the kind could exist which was not in itself an immoderate, pernicious, and deadly thing." How will liberal Catholics take all this? For our own part, we imagine they will accept it as easily as our Broad Churchmen swallow the articles and creeds.

The Pall Mall Gazette has the following fair hit at Mr. Hepworth Dixon's off-hand writing about American religious matters in his "New America:"

"We recorded last week a stray piece of news which probably attracted little attention in England, but which, if it fell into the hands of a quick American writer, might be made the basis of a very interesting work. As it is very short we may venture to repeat it:—'Six hundred and fifty Mormon emigrants sailed from Liverpool on Saturday for the Salt Lake by way of New York. A large proportion of the emigrants were women.' Any American bookmaker who wished to do a clever thing had only to go to Liverpool after reading this paragraph and there make inquiries about the Mormons. He would probably be referred to Wales, and if he pursued his journey thither he would soon discover that he had hit upon the large training-ground of Mormondom. He would find that we rear the followers of Brigham Young, and that America gets the credit of them. A thrilling picture of the frightful state of social life in Great Britain might be drawn from the presence among us of strange sects. Wales is a great deal nearer to the heart of England than Salt Lake or Oneida Creek is to anything which deserves to be called 'American,' and an enterprising traveller, gifted with a lithe and sinewy style, might easily delude a portion of his countrymen into the belief that the Mormon nursery in Wales can be safely taken as an example of the relations which exist between the sexes all over the country. If he did this, and did it well, he would deserve to be considered a very 'smart' man, for—to use a common phrase—he would have paid us back in our own coin. We send shiploads of Mormons to America and then write books to prove that Mormonism is the natural fruit of the loose principles which prevail in America."

The Guardian does not like the Duke of Buckingham's recent letter to the Governor of Natal, directing him "to use all the influence which legitimately belongs to him," to prevent the consecration of a new Bishop in the place of Dr. Colenso.

"This despatch is an order to the Governor of a colony to interfere in a religious dispute agitating a religious body within the colony which is not established by law, and stands, according to the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, in precisely the same situation as any Non-conformist society, 'no better, but no worse.' To 'prevent' a person from being consecrated to a purely spiritual office in this society the Governor is to use 'all the influence which legitimately belongs to him.' He is not to be content with administering the law—which is his proper business; he is to use 'influence,' and Her Majesty's Government, their 'views,' their 'apprehensions,' and regrets, are dragged into the internal politics of a religious community which in the eye of the law is exactly on the same level with the Baptists and Unitarians. Is it possible to involve the Queen's name and authority in a contest more undignified, unbecoming, unwise? Is it possible to place the Crown, or the Government in a more thoroughly false position? We can understand a church or society established by law; we can understand a church or society which is voluntary and unestablished. But a religious community which is neither one thing nor the other, and in which the Government, imperial or local, contributing nothing to its support and exercising within it no legal authority, is to enforce its views by 'influence,' and by making use of the Queen's name, is a thing which we do not understand; and Churchmen in Natal, if they think with us, would rather worship God in a hovel or on a hill-side than submit to this feeble and ridiculous tyranny. All this arises from not accepting, fully, frankly, and at once, the consequences of the principle that the Church in the colonies is a voluntary religious association, with which the Sovereign, as such, has no more right or business to meddle than with any other religious association—consequences which the principle draws inseparably after it, and which must necessarily be admitted in the long run."

A correspondent of the same paper is in trouble about the violence which might be done to the religious feelings of the son of the late King Theodore, of Abyssinia, by his being put under the care of a Presbyterian!

"Dr. Wilson is, I believe, the eminent and successful head of the Missions of the Free Church of Scotland in the Bombay Presidency. Is it fair to the boy to subject him to a religious training so entirely alien to that to which he has been accustomed as that of the Scotch Presbyterians must necessarily be? The Abyssinian Church, we all know, has, amid many superstitions, and in the utmost depth of degradation (which I am not at all concerned to palliate), retained her hold on many fundamental principles of Christianity, which are lightly accounted of by the Presbyterians. I allude, of course, to the whole sacramental system. Does the right of conquest confer upon Sir R. Napier the authority to subject the faith of this poor lad to such a violent wrench as it must undergo to conform itself to the platform of the Free Church of Scotland?"

We confess it is a relief to us to find it hinted on so good authority that the Anglican faith is so near akin to the Abyssinian! We should hardly have liked to put it so strongly ourselves. However, the matter is understood to be set at rest for the present, by the Queen having directed the lad to be brought to England.

The names of Mr. S. D. Waddy, the barrister, Sir Francis Lycett, the brothers McArthur, and some other Wesleyan gentlemen, are connected, in conversation, with an approaching meeting at Oxford for the foundation of a lecture like the Bampton—preliminary, as is reported, to the formation of a new college in that university on the passing of Mr. Coleridge's University Bill.

The Correspondant has an article by M. de Montalbert in which he speaks of the Church of England as an "historical phenomenon whose days are numbered;" and after telling us that religious life has expanded of late years in France, in a way that history will record with astonishment, he goes on to prophesy, somewhat inconsistently with this statement, that a revolution is preparing "to which the crises of 1830 and 1848 will appear child's play."

"A thousand symptoms, as clear as daylight, demonstrate that this future revolution will have for its watchword an explosion of irreligion which will form a most striking contrast with the principles and manners of the Republic of 1848 from the first days of its existence. The suppression of political life has produced in certain strata of French society a development of sensualism, materialism, and even atheism, of which the eighteenth century itself offered no example. To believe that this state of feeling will not react in the most energetic manner upon the social order, and by consequence upon the religious order, is to put oneself outside of common sense and the natural logic of things. To those who would not admit the nearness or possibility of a new revolution, one may observe that under the Imperial rule a simple change of reign or of system may produce in what relates to the church the same effect as a revolution."

The Guardian ventures on the following remark, pointing in the direction of Prayer-book-revision:

"It must be admitted that our stereotyped eleven o'clock morning service, the accidental and fragmentary combination of three services, and coming at an hour that is neither morning nor midday, holds its ground rather by traditional custom than upon any principle; and might well be changed for the better."

At the meeting of the Evangelical Continental Society, the Secretary related the following anecdotes:

"One of their colporteurs was set upon by three or four gentlemen, who, pretending not to know what he was, said, 'You are a dealer in spectacles.' His reply was, 'Yes, sir, I have some capital ones; the fact is, the blind can see with them. Must a man not be stone-blind who, in the nineteenth century, goes to church to look for a man who can pardon his sins? Now, if you buy my spectacles you will see it's all madness and folly.' In Belgium the majority of the converts from Romanism received their first impressions in connection with services in the cemetery. A priest, on one occasion, wanted to shut out the Protestant minister and bury the corpse of the Protestant in a corner set apart for suicides. The Mayor arrived, took the spade, and marked out the grave in the cemetery, and watched the grave opened and again filled up. The priest said, 'Now you have done a nice work; who do you think will consent to be buried in a cemetery which has been desecrated in this way?' The Mayor, who was a Catholic, replied to this—'It is a nice sunny spot; just reserve the next place for me.' 'No,' said an older man present, 'I think the honour will be mine; I am likely to go home sooner."

In speaking at a meeting called to promote the election of Mr. Gladstone to the Chancellorship of Edinburgh University, Dr. Guthrie, the eminent Free Church minister, said:

"I have spent days in the same house with Mr. Gladstone, and I think it is becoming me, as a Christian minister, on this public platform, and before this public assembly, and with the reporters before me—differing as Mr. Gladstone and I do on certain matters that each think of importance—to say that I know no man living, of any church, or of any denomination, in whose hands I could more trust the interests of any cause, being confident that he would bring to those interests all the honesty and integrity of a man of the highest Christian principle and the most sterling conscientiousness."

"THE COMEDY OF CONVOCATION IN THE ENGLISH CHURCH."—I.

A CAUSTIC pamphlet with the above title, edited by Dr. Chasuble, wittily criticises and exposes several weak points in the Establishment; and as it may not have come under the notice of some of our readers, we propose to give them a slight taste of it in this and another article.

The first scene is laid in the Jerusalem Chamber, and those who take part in the proceedings are Deans Blunt, Pliable, Primitive, Pompous, Critical; Archdeacons Jolly, Theory, Chasuble; and Reverend Doctors Easy, Viewy, Candour; and Reverends Athanasius Benedict, Lavender Kidds, the Prolocutor, and the Professors of History and Theology.

Dr. Easy first rises to propose the question of which he had given previous notice: "Would a clergyman openly teaching that there is no God be liable to suspension?"

Archdeacon Jolly thought not, because "what the Church of England especially prided herself on was the breadth of her views. No view could be broader than the one just stated, and therefore none more likely to meet with the sanction of the Privy Council, which he apprehended was the real point to be kept in view in the discussion of this interesting question." (Hear, hear.)

Dean Blunt was decidedly of opinion that Breadth and the Privy Council were kindred ideas.

Archdeacon Theory remarked that "as infallibility is a state of certainty which does not admit of error, so fallibility is a state of doubt which does not admit of conviction. Now the Church of England in proclaiming her own fallibility did so with a peremptoriness which elevated this part of her teaching, and this alone, to the dignity of dogma. For whereas in propounding other Anglican tenets, she so adjusted her definitions of doctrine as to leave the choice of possible and opposite interpretations to the discretion of her members, when speaking of this, the fundamental maxim of her whole theological system, she rose for the moment to the authority of a teacher, and consented to put on the robe of infallibility in order to promulgate with greater force the dogma of her own liability to err. It was therefore clear we ought to deny the Church's infallibility, and that we ought to doubt what the Church teaches. They had no choice about the matter, it was their duty to doubt, and no one who did not doubt every doctrine of his Church could be said to comprehend her nature, or be animated by her spirit. In answer, therefore, to the question, 'Would it be heresy in an Anglican to deny the existence of God?' he replied that it might be heresy to deny the fact, but that it was the plainest of all duties to doubt it."

Dr. Viewy accepted the ingenious, and perhaps too rigidly scientific, observations of his learned friend, as a valuable protest against that narrow and Romanistic theology which some were anxious to introduce into the Church. He gave an interesting sketch of his own difficulties when first ordained, by reason of his bishop being Low Church, "he might say very Low Church," and his rector being a Puseyite. The case was not uncommon, but he had a principle which afforded an escape from this embarrassing position; he applied it thus:—"Manifestly more obedience was due to a bishop than a rector, yet a certain quantum was due to a rector if only because a bishop had appointed him. It became, so to speak, a question of proportion rather than of theology, and was soluble not by the Thirty-nine Articles, but by the rule of three. He therefore preached Low Church doctrine on the Sundays, and High Church doctrines during the week, without abating a single tenet of either. He was bound to admit that this practice occasioned some excitement in the parish, and led to the popular conviction that, however excellent his teaching might be in detail, there was a want of unity about it regarded as a whole. Having, however, explained his reasons to his flock, they at once applauded the delicacy of his conscience, while they ceased not to question the value of his teaching. But unhappily both bishop and rector died about the same time, and were replaced by men of exactly opposite views; it therefore became his duty to invert the order and proportion of his teaching, so that he was thenceforth a Puseyite on Sundays and an Evangelical on week-days. This simple matter, so equitable in itself, created such discord that he was entreated to resign his cure. At first he ventured to suggest that either the bishop or rector should resign instead of himself, since their dissensions, not his disobedience, was the source of all this confusion; but the proposal did not meet with the cordial acquiescence which he had a right to expect from either of the parties concerned."

Later on Archdeacon Chasuble rose to maintain that the gift of infallibility was not "lost to the Church, but only suspended." He gave a luminous exposition of the "branch theory," and contended that as the Church of England was, though not the Church, yet a branch of the Catholic Church, he being a member of one was also a member of the other.

Dr. Candour thought it would not be difficult to show that, if the archdeacon was a Catholic without Catholicity, he was also a branch without a trunk. It was as if his venerable friend addressed the Roman Church thus: "I admit that my Church is not and cannot be the Church Catholic, and that she is not a Church at all, except in a political or national sense, but I contend that in spite of her defects she is a branch of the universal communion. However earnestly you may repudiate the connection, I choose to belong to you whether you consent or not. I will not resign my communion with Rome, though I know that you rank me with the aliens outside, and I must positively refuse to enter her communion though you affectionately entreat me to do so. In a word, I will belong to you in spite of your rejection, and I will not obey you in spite of your invitation." This was the way in which the branch spoke to the trunk. Was it really a branch? If so, on what part of the trunk was it grafted? He had indeed heard of a well-known clergyman who, in answer to the inquiry how they could establish their connection with the Catholic Church, suggested, "May there not be underground suckers?"

Seeing the difficulties that arise out of the Cathecism as it at present stands, one of the characters proposes that it should be recast according to the spirit of the age, so that in reply to the question, "How many sacraments are there?" the answer should be, "Two only as formerly necessary to salvation, but one of them not so necessary now as it used to be."

UNITARIANS.

We take the following sketch (which, though it contains a few blunders, is fairer than most representations of us) from the Christian World:

When Lord Hardwicke's Marriage Act became law, the Unitarians in England were a small sect, and had not a single place of worship. It was not till 1779 that it ceased to be required of Dissenting ministers that they should subscribe to the Articles of the Church of England previous to taking the benefit of the Toleration Act, and even this small boon was twice thrown out in the Upper House by the King's friends and the Bishops. In 1813, however, one of the most cruelly persecuting statutes which had ever disgraced the British code received its death-blow, and the royal assent was given to an act repealing all laws passed against those Christians who impugn the commonly-received doctrine of the Trinity; but, even as late as 1824, Lord Chancellor Eldon doubted (as he doubted everything that was tolerant in religion or liberal in politics) as to the validity of this act, and hinted that the Unitarians were liable to punishment at common law for denying the doctrine of the Trinity. Yet the Unitarians have a remote antiquity. They can trace their descent to apostolic times. They were an important element in the National Church in the days of William and the Hanoverian succession.

"Dr. Parr," says Mr. Barker, "spoke to me of the latitudinarian divines with approbation. He agreed with me in thinking that the most brilliant era of the British Church since the Reformation was when it abounded with divines of that school;"

and certainly Unitarians may claim to be represented at the present day in Broad Churchmen within the Establishment, and in divines of a similar way of thinking without. They have been much helped by their antagonists. No man was less of a Unitarian than the late Archbishop Whately, yet, in a letter to Blanco White, he candidly confessed, "Nothing in my opinion tends so much to dispose an intelligent mind towards anti-Trinitarian views as the Trinitarian works."

As a sect, the Unitarians are a small body, and at one time were much given to a display of intellectual superiority as offensive in public bodies as in private individuals. They were narrow and exclusive, and had little effect on the masses, who were left to "go to the bad," if not with supercilious scorn, at any rate with genteel indifference. There was in the old-fashioned Unitarian meeting-houses something eminently "high and dry." In these days, when we have ceased to regard heaven—to quote Tom Hood—as anybody's rotten borough, we smile as a handful of people sing:

"We're a garden walled around, Planted and made peculiar ground;"

yet no outsider a few years ago could have entered a Unitarian chapel without feeling that such, more or less, was the abiding conviction of all present. "Our predominant intellectual attitude" Mr. Orr confesses to be one reason of the little progress made by the denomination. A Unitarian could no more conceal his sect than a Quaker. Generally he wore spectacles; his hair was always arranged so as to do justice to his phrenological development; on his mouth there always played a smile, half sarcastic and half self-complacent. Nor was such an expression much to be wondered at when you remembered that, according to his own idea, and certainly to his own satisfaction, he had solved all religious doubts, cleared up all religious mysteries, and annihilated, as regards himself, human infirmities, ignorance, and superstition. It is easy to comprehend how a congregation of such would be eminently respectable and calm and self-possessed; indeed, so much so, that you felt inclined to ask why it should have condescended to come into existence at all. Mrs. Jarley's Waxworks, as described by that lady herself, may be taken as a very fair description of an average Unitarian congregation at no very remote date. Little Nell says, "I never saw any waxworks, ma'am; is it funnier than Punch?" "Funnier?" said Mrs. Jarley, in a shrill voice, "it is not funny at all." "Oh," said Nell, with all possible humility, "It is not funny at all," repeated Mrs. Jarley; "it's calm, and what's that word again—critical? No, classical—that's it; it's calm and classical. No low beatings and knockings about; no jokings and squeakings like your precious Punch's, but always the same, with a constantly unchanging air of coldness and gentility." Now it was upon this coldness and gentility that the Unitarians took their stand; they eliminated enthusiasm, they ignored the passions, and they failed to get the people, who preferred, instead, the preaching of the most illiterate ranters whose heart was in the work.

In our day a wonderful change has come over Unitarianism. It is not, and it never was, the Arianism born of the subtle school of Alexandrian philosophy, and condemned by the orthodox Bishops at Nicea; nor is it Socinianism as taught in the sixteenth century, still less is it the Materialism of Priestley. Men of the warmest hearts and greatest intellects belonging to it actually disown the name, turn away from it as too cold and barren, and, in their need of more light, and life, and love seek in other denominations what they lack in their own. The Rev. James Martineau, a man universally honoured in all sections of the universal church, confesses:—"I am constrained to say that neither my intellectual preference nor my moral admiration goes heartily with the Ebionites, heretics, or productions of any age. Ebionites, Arians, Socinians, all seem to me to contrast unfavourably with their opponents, and to exhibit a type of thought and character far less worthy, on the whole, of the true genius of Christianity. I am conscious that my deepest obligations, as a learner from others, are in almost every department to writers out of my own creed. In philosophy I have had to unlearn most that I had imbibed from my early text-books and the authors in chief favour with them. In Biblical interpretation I derive from Calvin and Whitby the help that fails me in Crell and Belsham. In devotional literature and religious thought I find nothing of ours that does not pale before Augustine, Tauler and Pascal; and in the poetry of the Church it is the Latin or the German hymns, or the lines of Charles Wesley or Keble, that fasten on my memory and heart, and make all else seem poor and cold." This is the language of many beside Mr. Martineau—of all, indeed, to whom a dogmatic theology is of little import compared with a Christian life.

Unitarianism has no creed, yet briefly it may be taken to be the denial of a Trinity of persons in the Godhead, or of the natural depravity of man, or that sin is the work of the devil, or that the Bible is a book every word of which was dictated by God, or that Christ is God united to a human nature, or that atonement is reconciliation of man to God.* Furthermore, the Unitarians deny that regeneration is the work of the Holy Spirit, or that salvation is deliverance from the punishment of sin, or that heaven is a state of condition without change, or that the torments of hell are everlasting. It may be that the Broad-Churchman entertains very much the same opinions, but then the Unitarian minister has this advantage over the Church clergyman, that he is free, while the latter is not. He has not signed articles of belief of a contrary character. He has not to waste his time and energy in sophistifications which can deceive no one, still less to preach that doctrine so perilous to the soul, and destructive of true spiritual growth, and demoralising to the nation, that a religious, conscientious man may sign articles that can have but one sense and put upon them quite another. Dean Stanley, for instance, boldly proclaims not a clergyman believes the Athanasian Creed. Why, then, it may be asked, do they repeat it?

*As we need hardly say, Unitarians hold this to be the true Christian doctrine of the Atonement, but deny that God ever required to be reconciled to man.—Eds. U. H.

In our day we have seen something of an Evangelical alliance, that is, a manifestation of the great fact that people are yearning after a Catholic union, and are caring less and less for denominational differences. The Unitarians all speak and write of the orthodox as of a body of Christians perfectly distinct from themselves. Yet there is an approximation between them, nevertheless. Unitarianism, as it becomes a living faith—as it leans to the theology of the sweetest singers and most impassioned orators of the universal Church—becomes in sentiment and practice orthodox; while orthodoxy, as it grows enlightened, and bursts the bonds of habit, and, laden with the spoils of time, gathers up the wisdom and the teaching of all the ages underneath the sun, sanctions the Rationalism and the spirit of free inquiry for which Unitarianism has ever pleaded, and its martyrs have died in our own and other lands. Actually, at the meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Society an effort was made to get rid of the title altogether, and to call themselves instead a British and Foreign Free Christian Association, on the plea that the Christian Church consists of all who desire to be the children of God in the spirit of Jesus Christ, His Son, and that, therefore, no association for the promotion of a doctrine which belongs to controversial theology can represent the Church of Christ. To this Unitarianism has attained in our time. This is the Unitarianism of Foster, and Shaw (?), and Ierson, and Martineau. The only representative of the Priestley school in London is Dr. Cromwell. Unitarian theology is always coloured with the philosophy of the hour, and consequently it is now spiritual and transcendental instead of material and necessitarian.

As regards London, the statistics of Unitarianism are easy of collection. In their register we have the names of fifteen places of worship, where Holy Scripture is the only rule of faith, and difference of opinion is no bar to Christian communion. In reality Unitarians are stronger than they seem, as in their congregations you will find many persons of influence, of social weight, of literary celebrity. For instance, Sir Charles Lyell and Lord Amberley are, I believe, among the regular attendants at Mr. Martineau's chapel in Portland-street. In London they support a Domestic Mission, a Sunday-school Association, an Auxiliary School Association, and a London District Unitarian Society.

THE APPEAL FOR THE INDIAN MISSION.

We looked with considerable interest to the recent meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association for some decisive utterance on the subject of the Proposed Mission to India. It seems to us that the explanations and authoritative statements which have been given during the last year or two ought to overcome the hesitation with which the subject has been hitherto approached. Every testimony that has reached us seems to point plainly, if facts have any meaning, to the duty of trying to bring our grand, simple views of religion to bear upon the mind of the rising generation of India. The orthodox missions themselves have borne witness again and again to the enormous extent to which the progress of European knowledge and ideas is rendering the old Hindoo superstitions effete and powerless. They perceive the danger of the whole population gradually falling into atheism or indifference to the whole subject, and they try, with a genuine earnestness which we think has often been underrated, to arrest the tendency in this direction and to win them to Christianity. They do not, however, succeed. Even by their own showing there are no hopeful signs of any real and thorough success. The Hindoo mind seems hopelessly impervious to such ideas of religion as are the best that the orthodox missions had to give them. They cannot swallow the Trinity. They ridicule the teaching of total depravity. They pick to pieces the scheme of vicarious satisfaction. Missionary after missionary has described the tendencies of the native religious movements towards thoughts which we cannot help recognising as strangely similar to our own Unitarian faith, and their testimony is none the less valuable because given reluctantly and interspersed with very sincere regrets. Now does not this state of things make any call on us? We are a part of the nation that has given them the civilisation that is disintegrating their old faiths, and that has hitherto set Christianity before them only in forms calculated rather to repel than to attract. If we know that all those doctrines which have made Christianity a byword among cultivated Hindoos are not Christianity, but a perversion of it, is there no duty lying upon us to let the truth be known in its simplicity? Is not this alike our duty to the truth, and our duty to those who need that truth? We think that it is. We do not for a moment mean to assume that the responsibility of converting India rests upon us. All the signs of the times there seem to indicate that native leaders of the native mind are springing up here and there who will be able to speak with a power that no advocate from a foreign and dominant race can ever hope for. Any great movement of the life of India towards spiritual religion will probably be in the main the work of such men as KESHUB CHUNDER SEN, who has been called the St. Paul of India. But is there no work for us in relation to such men, and to the societies which he and his followers are forming? Would it be no help to them to be in friendly religious intercourse with communities to whom these new views of theirs are not the uncertain territory of daring, and, in such a country, necessarily lonely thought, but the strong, massive rock of well-reasoned convictions, and of a faith that counts its advocates through all the Christian ages? Is there no part of their work in which we may help them by seeing, with a clearness hardly possible to them, some of the moral results to which they must carry on their faith, if it is ever to do any real regenerating work? Take, for instance, the question of caste. The testimony of the deepest thinkers even among the Hindoos themselves is clear as to the necessity of the old distinctions of caste being ignored and overthrown. But their testimony is equally clear as to the enormous difficulties of this task, and would it be no help to those who are striving against these deeply-rooted prejudices to find themselves in brotherly sympathy with whole communities of cultivated Europeans, to whom these distinctions are nothing? Entirely apart from any question as to whether we are likely by any missionary effort we can put forth to win over any considerable number to avowedly Unitarian Christian Churches, surely there is a plain duty to try whether we cannot at any rate give some effective support and help to those who, under difficulties of which we can hardly conceive, are doing whatever work of religious revival is at present going forward in India.

We hope that such considerations as these may induce our friends to give a somewhat more hearty response than has yet appeared to the appeal which the British and Foreign Association have recently made. In any case this ought to be said:—we had better do the thing heartily or let it alone. Mere dabbling in a great work of this kind is of no manner of use. We cannot help regretting to see that many of the subscriptions that have been proffered are for such short terms as to be practically almost valueless. What kind of idea of missionary work, in a great field half the size of Europe, is that which would propose to offer a tentative support for two, three, or four years? If this thing is to be done, and done it ought most assuredly to be, let it be done after the fashion of churches that believe in their faith, and are resolved at least to deserve success by the spirit of their labour for it.

STARS.

How pretty is each little star,
Each tiny twinkler, soft and meek!
Yet many in this world there are
Who do not know that stars can speak.
To them the skies are meaningless,
A star is not a living thing;
They cannot hear the messages
Those shining creatures love to bring.
Hush! listen! ah! it will not do;
You do but listen with your ears;
And stars are understood by few,
For it must be the heart that hears.
Look up, not only with your eyes;
Ah! do you hear a tender sound?
To hearts familiar with the skies,
The stars are nearer than the ground.

"SEVEN HOLY FATHERS."

THE following humorous sketch, by the authoress of "From Rome to Mentana," gives a good idea, as we can testify, of the want of respect which is often shown for the head of the Catholic Church in Italy.

At seven a.m., we found ourselves at the Florence railway station, en route for Rome. The astonishment of the clerk at the ticket-office, when I asked for tickets for Rome, was amusing to behold.

"Per Roma! Signorina, non avete paura?" (Are you not afraid?)

"No," said I quietly, "Sono Inglese!" (I am English.) An explanation which all over Italy is accepted as a sufficient reason for utter fearlessness.

We were encumbered with the usual number of boxes, so truly called by the Italians "Incommodita," and when registering these, a porter asked me "for where, Signorina?"

"Rome," I replied.

"Ah, Roma," he answered, "going to the Holy Father there?"

"Not at all," I said.

"Oh, yes, but you are; go along to Paradise with the Holy Father, and you will be sure to get there."

"You mistake," I said, seeing that he took me for one of the hated race; "I am English, not French."

"Ah! that makes all the difference," said my impudent young friend, amidst the laughter of all the bystanders. "In that case, you stay here, and let the Holy Father go to Paradise by himself."

There was nothing for it but to join in the laugh, and the first box was lifted off the counter, and on to the weighing machine.

"Santo Padre, numero uno," cried the porter. "Santo Padre, numero uno," repeated a second porter at the weighing machine; and so it went on through six boxes, till at last we arrived at one of so enormous a size that we had named it Noah's ark.

"Ah! grosso vecchio Santo Padre (great, fat, old Holy Father), shouted the porter, as he hauled it on to the weighing machine. "Grosso vecchio Santo Padre, numero sette," chorused Porter No. 2; and the numbers and weights were given to the clerk in the bureau as "seven Holy Fathers, weight 136 kilogrammes."

By this time the whole of the station was in a roar of laughter, including the booking-clerk, who handed me out the registration ticket, with 47 francs to pay, saying, "Seven boxes, Holy Fathers, Rome," and I fully expected to find it so written on the ticket; however, it was not.

Meanwhile Porter No. 1, a merry, black-eyed young Italian, had ascended to the top of Noah's ark, and standing on one leg, like the celebrated statue of John of Bologna, with his right hand raised and his fingers closed in exact imitation of the Pope in the act of benediction, solemnly made the sign of the cross over the luggage, saying, "Ah, benedizione, i miei bauli" (ah! blessings on you, my boxes), an evident parody of "blessings on you, my children," which the Pope is supposed to say, whenever he raises his hand in blessing the bystanders.

"Now that luggage will be sure to go safely," and the luggage was carried off to the train, amidst the shouts of all around—a singular instance of the utter disrespect in which the Papal authority and the priestly office is regarded, even in Central Italy.

TO PHILÆ.

IN one of his interesting letters to the Liberal Christian, Dr. Bellows thus describes an excursion in Egypt:

Starting in the freshness of the morning, our party, accompanied by at least fifty donkey boys, dromedary leaders, pedlars of Nubian wares, and a long tail of supernumeraries whom it was impossible to drive off, directed our way across the sands and rocky mounds of the desert to the little village opposite Philæ. Nobody can adequately describe the shoutings, pushings, haulings, and general hubbub of one of these starts on an Egyptian pleasure-excursion. The hope of "backshish" inspires the whole Arab community, and the Howadji is attended by the expectant looks and outstretched hands not only of the crowd who start with him, but of all the people in all the little hamlets he passes, of all the wayfarers he meets. Naked babes, who can say nothing else, are sure to articulate "backshish" with fearful distinctness. It is the whole English vocabulary to most of them, and the helpless indignation with which it is listened to by most travellers, to whom it grows a most disagreeable sound after a short experience, seems to give it a special charm for the Arabs, who half jocularly, half maliciously, use it as a means of amusement or of torment, even when they expect to realise no money from their petition. The endless variety in the costume of the company, where rags of all colours stream in the wind, the representatives of all ages and all races adding to the peculiarity of the scene; the contrast of big men straddling diminutive donkeys, and little boys mounted on huge dromedaries, while yellow dogs howl and gnash their teeth from the roofs of houses or the gates of mud-enclosures; the growl of the dromedaries, the asthmatic wheeze of the donkeys, the guttural jargon of the Arabs, all mixed in a Babal of sounds; the donkey boys beating and pinching the patient little asses; the caravan shifting every moment its shape, now huddled all together, now stringing out in long files, as here a "Howadji" tumbles off his donkey and rolls in the sand, or a saddle turns and lets a lady down; the outlandish look of the strangers in their extempore turbans, their hats being uniformly bound up in linen folds with a long tail floating in the wind—all this makes a start for a temple in Egypt, a very odd and amusing spectacle, and sometimes a very annoying experience. I found six miles on a dromedary neither so bad as I expected nor so pleasant as it might be. Sitting a little on one side of the hump that holds the saddle in place, with both feet hanging over the left shoulder, and holding on by the knobs that are placed before and behind the saddle, I soon got adjusted to the swinging motion of my beast, and after trying first the walk and then the trot, settled down into the amble, which was about as easy as a hard horse. A string in the dromedary's nose, and a pair of reins fastened about his cheeks, furnished the means of guiding him, but I had enough to do to hold on without indulging my love of driving, and resigned myself to the leading of my Nubian boy, who ran almost the whole distance without once being out of breath, or showing the least sign of fatigue.

THE FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH, BAYSWATER.

A MEETING was held on Friday week at Lindon Hall, Lindon Grove Bayswater, to inaugurate the transfer of the Kensington branch of the Free Christian Church from Newton-street, Kensington, to this larger place of worship. The commodious building in which the meeting assembled was formerly the residence of Mr. Creswick, R.A.; and his large studio, capable of holding about two hundred persons, has been prepared for the services of the Free Christian Church in question, the minister of which is the Rev. W. H. Channing. The spacious and elegant room, newly painted and decorated with great taste, was adorned with a profusion of flowers and evergreens. Among the visitors were James Heywood, Esq., F.R.S., Sir John Bowring, F.R.S., the Revs. J. J. Taylor, James Martineau, R. B. Aspland, T. L. Marshall, T. Hunter, R. Spears, C. H. A. Dall, H. Solly, R. Shaen, R. Shelley, F. Bishop, and M. C. Conway; Messrs. F. Dillon, B. Donkin, William Shaen, T. Avison, and Charles Holland, of Liverpool; H. Fordham, Royston; while among the invited guests was Dr.

Bellows, of New York, president of the United States Sanitary Commission.

In the course of the evening a series of short speeches were made, without formality—by Dr. BELLINGS, who hoped that his voice would never be unheard when he was asked to express sympathy with any movement that united, or attempted to unite, religion and liberty, which was the great problem for all thoughtful and earnest men throughout Christendom to-day, and who wished great joy in their new enterprise; and by Revs. J. J. TAYLER, JAMES MARTINEAU, Sir JOHN BOWRING, &c. We have only space to record the Rev. W. H. CHANNING's interesting statement on the principle of the society.

The Rev. WILLIAM HENRY CHANNING, the minister of the congregation, after returning thanks for the kindly sympathy of his brethren and of the assembly, said: We call ourselves a Free Christian Church, and however humble our beginnings, our hope and aim are to prove ourselves helpers in building up the Church of Universal Unity. By the name of "Free Christian" we mean to show forth our conviction that the Christian religion is appointed by Providence to be the bond of communion for universal unity—the unity of man around the earth, the unity of humanity on earth with humanity in heaven—the unity of man universal with the living God; and it is our belief that only by the free development and exercise of human powers can this divine end be fulfilled. In unfolding the significance of this name, "Free Christian," he would begin by quoting the words of one of the leading statesmen of Great Britain—of a man who, though he holds no position of political trust, yet, by moral influence and through wise foresight, is exerting an influence which places him in the foremost rank of the statesmen of this generation—Goldwin Smith:—"The only cry in which I am ready to join is a cry for freedom of religious thought, and the entire abolition of all State interference with the conscience of man in matters of religion. I think the time for raising this cry loudly and resolutely has arrived, if the faith of the people is to be preserved." And not only in Great Britain, but throughout Europe and Christendom, and from all Christian communions, is this cry rising for freedom of the church within the State from the checks and constraints of worldly policy. But by the name of "Free Christian" much more is meant than mere emancipation from outward oppression. The name stands as the symbol of inward freedom—intellectual, spiritual, and social freedom. It means freedom in theology; that, by widest research through all religious systems, critical study of most various creeds, and reverent yet fearless discussion of the highest problems involved in man's nature, relations, and destiny, we may come to see clearly the revelation of the Divine character and will to man—the manifestation of God in humanity. It means freedom in holy aspiration; that we may be made one, in prayer and penitence, in hope and longing, in consecration and devotedness, in love and joy, with the saints of all ages, until we learn by experience, as they learned, to enter into the liberty of the children of God, and to become evermore filled from His fullness. It means, finally, freedom to embody in personal and social life that law of love which is the real reign of heaven on earth, which is the real indwelling of the living God in human societies, and which is gradually transforming the laws, institutions, manners, and characters of men throughout the leading nations. And here (said the speaker) let me quote the words of a man who, while he lived, was the true type of what we mean by a "Free Christian"—Baron Bunsen. He says: "Religion, that is, prayer, is the converse of the soul with the Creator, the pulse-beat of the Infinite Being in man; while the political organisation of the community is the practical attestation of the religious sentiments, the fulfilment of the vows uttered in worship." Thus might the Church indeed become, as it ought to be, as it will be hereafter, the "Divine Conscience of the State." This, then, in outline is what they meant by a Free Christian Church. We are longing, working, waiting for the blessed time—steadily, however slowly, coming nearer—when freedom of thought and freedom of spirit shall be fulfilled and perfected in the freedom of loving life throughout communities and nations.

WEST RIDING UNITARIAN MISSION SOCIETY.

ON Wednesday, the 10th inst., the fifty-third anniversary of this society was held at Wakefield. The proceedings commenced at twelve o'clock with service at the Westgate Chapel, the sermon being preached by the Rev. C. C. COE, of Leicester. At two o'clock there was the usual collation in the Music Saloon, to which about 150 sat down, and subsequently the public meeting, presided over by ARCHIBALD BRIGGS, Esq., of Moor House, near Wakefield. Amongst those present were the Revs. J. Kenrick, York; Henry W. Crosskey, Glasgow; J. L. Short, Sheffield; Wm. Binns; Goodwyn Barmby, and P. Cannon, Wakefield; C. C. Coe, Leicester; B. Pilcher, Bradford; J. Thomas, Huddersfield; W. Matthews, Halifax; W. Blazeby, Rotherham; L. Taplin, Todmorden; G. Wooller; Thorne; C. Howe, Dewsbury; W. A. Clark, Pudsey; and T. R. Elliott, Hunslet; Messrs. Josh. Lupton, Geo. Buckton, C. F. Blackett, C. Bulmer, and Dr.

Greenbow, Leeds; Henry Briggs and H. Clarkson, Wakefield; and W. Bould, Ossett.

After a brief address from the CHAIRMAN, on the motion of Dr. GREENHOW, seconded by Mr. BLACKETT, a vote of thanks was given to Rev. C. C. Coe for his services in the morning, to which the Rev. C. C. COE responded.

The report, read by Rev. GOODWYN BARMBY, gave an interesting account of the missionary effort of the district. The average attendance of the Pudsey congregation during the year has been forty-five in the morning and ninety in the evening. There are 108 sittings let. The Sunday schools are in a healthy condition. After a service of above three years, the Rev. W. A. Clarke has recently tendered his resignation. At Dewsbury the proceedings have been satisfactory. The Rev. Charles Howe has succeeded in largely increasing the congregation. The congregation at Elland has suffered from the depression of trade in that place. The Rev. T. R. Dobson, the present minister, has accepted the appointment of pastor of the Sidmouth congregation. At Pepperhill, under many disadvantages, the little flock yet remains faithful, although small increase of numbers has accrued to the fold. The Pepperhill pulpit is chiefly supplied by local preachers. Since the last report, the Rev. J. N. Dresser has been succeeded at Lydgate by the Rev. E. Allen, previously the minister at Padiham. The committee have continued their annual grant of £25 to the Lydgate congregation.—The treasurer's balance sheet, read by Mr. BULMER, showed that the year was begun with a balance in hand of £26. 1s. and the subscriptions, &c., had amounted to £384. There was, however, a balance due to the treasurer of £8 odd, though the income had been about £61 more than on the preceding year.—It would be of very little interest to our readers to give the mere outlines, which is all that would be possible, of the various addresses on the usual business resolutions; Rev. J. Thomas, Mr. C. Bulmer, Rev. J. L. Short, Rev. H. W. Crosskey, Mr. Joseph Lupton, Revs. W. Blazeby, B.A., W. A. Clarke, and C. Howe being in turn called upon. One speech, indeed, was so full of interesting information, that we are glad to be able to give it at some length.

The Rev. J. KENRICK said: We have been occupied this afternoon with the affairs of our immediate neighbourhood in the West Riding. There is a maxim that charity begins at home, but to be fitted for Christian use there should be added by way of supplement that it should not end there. I am about to call your attention to a people by no means wealthy, on the very verge of Christendom, and speaking a barbarous language not heard, I venture to say, on the day of Pentecost. It may seem extraordinary that in so remote a district Unitarianism should be established and about to celebrate its 300th anniversary. In modern times Unitarianism had its origin where you would not look for it—in Italy. It was soon stamped out there by the Papacy, and took refuge in Poland, from whence it was transferred about the middle of the 16th century to Transylvania, where it took such root that in 1568 a conference was held, after which it was decided by the Prince of Transylvania that Unitarianism should be received among the established confessions of the country, the others being Calvinism and Lutheranism. Perhaps some of our friends who are enemies of establishments, may be shocked to hear of Unitarianism being an established religion, but we have to do with their faith only. They continued to flourish; not much in favour, however, with the court or the higher orders, who gradually withdrew. The great misfortune was the incorporation of Hungary with Austria, and from that time they were subject to a series of oppressions which culminated after the great commotion in Europe in 1848 to establish the independence of Hungary. Austria soon set to work to render Hungary completely German and Austrian. The manner in which they attempted it was marked by the insidiousness of the spirit of the Jesuits. They did not directly attack the liberties which the constitution had secured for the Unitarians of Transylvania, but they professed a great zeal for the improvement of education, and told the Unitarians the funds you are able to devote for that purpose are inadequate. You must increase the amount, or we must take the education of the youth upon ourselves. Fortunately, a member of a well-known Unitarian family, Mr. Paget, had settled in Transylvania. He wrote to me to see what could be done to prevent this grievance of having the education of their children taken from them. I appealed to the Unitarians of England, and appeal was also made to those of America, and it may be in your recollection that we succeeded, and assistance was sent to them by which, added to their own noble offerings, the Transylvanians were enabled to meet the demands of the Austrian Government. I need not recall the recent political events which have placed the Unitarians of Transylvania upon a new footing. Deeply as we may regret the carnage of Koenigsgratz and Sadowa, we must remember that by them the liberties of Hungary have been secured, and the ends of the Jesuits foiled. Under these circumstances, the Unitarians of Transylvania are about to celebrate the tercentenary of their religious independence, and they have invited the British and Foreign Unitarian Association to send a delegate to be present at the celebration in August next. The association have voted an address, the bearer of which is to be the Rev. J. J. Tayler, and the Unitarians of England cannot be represented by one who more fairly represents the catholic spirit which animates our whole body. Mr. Kenrick concluded by moving a resolution of cordial greeting to "our Unitarian brethren in Transylvania."

The Rev. R. PILCHER seconded the resolution, which was to be signed by the chairman on behalf of the meeting, and transmitted to the Rev. J. J. Tayler, with a request that he would present it at the same time as the address from the British and Foreign Association.—On the motion of the Rev. LINDSAY TAPLIN, seconded by the Rev. E. ALLEN, it was resolved that the annual collections should be on the fourth Sunday in March instead of the second, as hitherto. This will accord with the change proposed in some other of the districts associated in these simultaneous mission collections.

THE EAST ANGLIAN CHRISTIAN UNION.

AN interesting meeting was held at Great Yarmouth on Thursday, June 11th, to celebrate the first anniversary of this association. The association itself appears to be rather vague and undecided in its character. Disclaiming any sectarian status; declared by the president at the opening of the afternoon meeting to have for its object "to promote closer Christian union among the congregations of the district, irrespective of all denominational distinctions," and inviting the co-operation of all the Nonconformist ministers of the district, the whole affair seems gradually to have edged off, as the day wore on, into an ordinary district association of Unitarians. Mr. Kirkus's speech in the evening was largely on the duty of Unitarians to spread their faith; the Rev. T. L. Marshall "received a cordial welcome as the representative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association," and concluded an excellent Unitarian speech by proposing "The Unitarian congregation of Yarmouth." We thought on first reading of the meeting that it would have to be chronicled in the neutral territory of "What the Churches are Doing," but more careful examination seems to justify us in placing it, after the example of our friend the Inquirer, among the religious intelligence of our own churches.

The meetings began with service in the Old Meeting, the Rev. R. SHELLEY leading the worship, and the preacher being the Rev. W. KIRKUS, LL.B. (Independent). His text was 1 Cor. i. 17. "For Christ sent me not to baptise but to preach the Gospel: not with wisdom of words lest the cross of Christ should be made of none effect."

The preacher referred to the divisions in the Corinthian Church, with which St. Paul said he had nothing to do. Baptism after all was a very good thing as a symbol; but it was not the symbol, but the thing signified by it which is good; and when the symbol ceases to represent a great spiritual reality, then it is bad, even if Jesus Christ himself established it. It might be desirable to suspend even the two Christian sacraments if they became, as they often did become, dead symbols, perverted from their original purpose, and if the love of God was made dependent upon their reception in the narrow ecclesiastical spirit. Then it might again be needful to the Christian minister to say, "Christ sent me not to baptise, but to preach the Gospel." Words, too, are symbols often acting only as a screen to hide from us the truths and realities we want to get at. St. Paul preached the ultimate fact of the love of God saving the world through Christ. The cross of Christ revealed the Eternal Love. He did not elaborately argue whether God could consistently love man in accordance with this theory or that. The cross of Christ was not only the revelation of the love of God to men, but the revelation of a truly human life to men, manifesting the life which men ought to live, especially in the Saviour's example of entire self-sacrifice. Striving to attain the great truths which often lie hid under theological forms of speech, the preacher explained justification by faith, as, being made actually good, being brought from a sinful life to childlike faith and obedience, and the entire trust of the heart in Christ. But this grand truth has been perverted in our theories and dogmas until it becomes almost unmeaning. The fact of the manifestation of God in Christ, and the wonderful spirit of enthusiasm lighting up the hearts of the Apostles was the foundation of the doctrine of the Trinity. Redemption is deliverance from the bondage of unrighteousness and distrust, and Christ, as an actual fact, does set us free, and this simple fact is turned into the dogma of the Atonement. So the dogma of Scriptural Infallibility is a perversion of the simple fact that we do derive precious stores of spiritual instruction from the Scriptures, and that they are the source of our highest knowledge of divine things. The preacher showed the danger of losing the essential truths through the "wisdom of words" which are meant to express them, but which only succeed, as in the case of that wonderful Athanasian Creed, in obscuring and perverting the simple truths. The sermon closed with an eloquent plea for closer Christian union, combined with fidelity to individual convictions, living in brotherly charity, speaking all that we believe, and denying boldly all that we do not believe, and so working as best we may the work of God.

After the service the first annual meeting of the members of the society was held for business, the president, the Rev. J. D. H. SMYTH, of Norwich, in the chair.

The PRESIDENT briefly stated the aim of the society, as already given. Very little had been done during the year, but they hoped, during the ensuing year, to be able to diffuse a knowledge of their aims and principles, and so help their fellow Christians to a better idea of a Christian church than at present existed. It had been resolved at the last quarterly meeting of the committee that the ministers of the district be encouraged to exchange with each other, on which occasion bills were to be printed at the expense of the society, and that the ministers of every town be requested to make inquiries respecting the condition of Sunday schools, and where practicable to establish new ones.

The committee was then re-elected, and Mr. T. Lombe Taylor, of Starston Hall, was elected president of the society. Mr. Sothern and the Rev. J. D. H. Smyth were elected joint-secretaries. It was stated that the congregation at Lynn had been revived, and that now there was a respectable congregation, under the ministry of the Rev. Mr. Bruce. It was reported also that the sum of £20 had been received in subscriptions. Various plans of usefulness were discussed, and after a somewhat vague and desultory conversation, it was at length resolved that the committee for the ensuing year be instructed to prepare some practical plan of action.

After the business meeting, the members and friends of the society adjourned to a collation at the Masonic Hall, which was attended by about fifty ladies and gentlemen, the Rev. R. SHELLEY presiding.

In the evening a tea meeting was held in the same hall, when about a hundred and twenty friends assembled. The Rev. R. SHELLEY presided; and, says the Church and Tory paper, "in the course of an admirable speech, spoke of the principles of Unitarianism in a most impartial and intelligible manner." Sir THOMAS BEEVOR, Bart., in proposing thanks to the preacher, expressed the pleasure he felt at the fact that the East Anglian Christian Union had done Yarmouth the honour of selecting it as the place of its first meeting, and said that although he was not partial to long sermons, it was a considerable period since he had listened to an address, occupying fifty minutes in delivery, with that profit and pleasure he had listened that day to Mr. Kirkus, and he could have attended with rapt delight to the discourse had it been prolonged for another fifty minutes. (Applause.)

The Rev. W. KIRKUS, LL.B., in his response, said that preachers as well as other people are liable to get into ruts and to keep up old traditions that needed revision. He thought if preachers were occasionally cross-examined either before or subsequent to their lectures, if it did not spoil their tempers, it might tend to improve their intellects. He proceeded to remark on the importance of their maintaining and teaching that which they believed to be true. The religious opinions of the Unitarians were regarded by the great majority of Christians with absolute horror and amazement. They wondered how, in a land where Bibles could be purchased at ninepence each, Unitarians could hold the belief they did and teach what they taught. Persons professing Unitarian opinions had been too long content with being just tolerated. It was true that they were not now burned or persecuted, or placed under grievous civil disabilities, but he was afraid that they had taken, as a body, but very little pains to urge upon the acceptance of other people what they believed to be the truth. There were doctrines that he deemed most precious—principles which they thought most true—yet they proclaimed these doctrines and these principles as if they were with bated breath, and they went about as though on sufferance, seemingly pleased if persons not of their way of thinking would notice them in the public streets and shake hands with them. In his opinion the so-called orthodox views of Almighty God were grossly superstitious. People for the most part did not regard God as an Almighty Father who watched over and loved all His children alike; who did not wish that one of His children should perish. Most Christians looked upon the Supreme Being as having a few favourites upon whom He bestowed unlimited blessings, while the rest of mankind were totally disregarded and punished. They did not think that the love of God was free, flowing from this divine affection, but a love purchased and paid for at a great price. But the members of this Union held that the love of God was free and overflowing to every human being. If they (the Unitarians) held certain doctrines they should do their best to spread them. Orthodox Christians covered England with tracts, they employed missionaries, and taught their doctrines with energy and earnestness. But if he (Mr. Kirkus) wished to distribute a tract on his side of the question, he scarcely knew where to find one. He did not know where the literature existed which should accompany what they believed to be Christian truth. Why was it that tracts could be produced by millions on the other side, while they (the Unitarians) could hardly get any tracts at all? Unitarians appealed to people to love God from the highest motives, while the orthodox appealed to lower motives—the threats of awful punishments. But in appealing to the highest motives they as a body did not seem to realise them. People asked them where was the fruit of their teaching, where their progress? They were looked upon as a quiet, inoffensive body, and well behaved, but this (said their opponents) was the most that could be placed to their credit. If they loved and believed in their principles they should propagate them—they should go into the highways and byways, and preach their doctrines. He trusted that the love of God would constrain them as a body to move more, and that success would attend this excellent society which had so recently been formed. (Loud applause.)

Addresses were also delivered by Revs. T. L. MARSHALL, of London; BRUCE, of Lynn; J. W.

SMITH, of Ipswich; R. SHAEN, of Royston; R. DUNNE, T. COOPER; and Messrs. I. M. WADE, GLYDE, and DEAN.

INTELLIGENCE.

AINSWORTH.—About 150 members of the Bury Sunday-school Union met at this place on Sunday, June 14th. After tea Mr. John Spencer presided. Mr. Wm. Freeston, of Heap Bridge, introduced for discussion, "The Preparation of Lessons." The reading of the paper was followed by discussion, in which Messrs. Henry Hall, Thos. Holt, John Mason, George Lord, Thos. Lord, D. Wormald, and the chairman took part. After Mr. Freeston had replied, a cordial vote of thanks was passed for his paper, and to the chairman for presiding.

LONDON: WORSHIP STREET SUNDAY-SCHOOL JUBILEE.—A social tea meeting was held in Worship-street Chapel on Wednesday, the 13th May, to celebrate the completion of the first fifty years of its existence. The Rev. J. C. Means, minister of the chapel, who had been one of the teachers of the school at its foundation, was in the chair, and was surrounded by many of the teachers and scholars of the successive periods of the school's existence. After tea, the Chairman gave a sketch of the early history of the school, which had been established in the spring of the year 1818, very much at the instigation of some cousins of his own, now at rest, who had been interested in Sunday schools, and by some friends who were engaged in an orthodox Sunday school, to which, therefore, the Worship-street school may be said to owe its birth. At that time the helps and facilities which now exist were not yet in being; and they had consequently various difficulties to contend with. Among these was the want of books. Those published by the Sunday-school Union were objected to on account of the doctrines contained in them; and the only introductory book which they could use was Mrs. Mary Hughes's "First Book for Sunday Schools," and that was dear. It was the first Sunday school established among the Old General Baptists and Unitarians of London, which had any permanence. The meeting was after words addressed by the Rev. Henry Jerson, of Islington; Mr. C. L. Corkran; the Rev. John Marten, of Peckham; Mr. Wade, secretary of the Sunday-school Association; and by Messrs. Edward Wright, William N. Green, and Henry Green.—Mr. William N. Green referred with great pleasure to his early connection with the Coles-street school, and to the monthly breakfast meeting at Worship-street. Teachers were in earnest then; they used to get over to Worship-street, perhaps two miles from their homes, by eight o'clock, and then hasten back, after breakfast, to be in time for the opening of their own school. They taught their classes, not once a day or on alternate Sundays, but in the morning and afternoon of every Sunday; and his experience told him that teachers who thus took the entire instruction of a class were more interested in their work, and did it more efficiently than those who were less constant.—The company was about a hundred in number, and in it were some of the first scholars, including the very first who was entered, then a little girl of five years old, now a grandmother. An interesting letter was read from one of the first scholars, now a member of the Society of Friends, recalling gratefully the religious impressions she had received in the school in her childhood, especially from the first address given by Mr. Means to the scholars.

MANCHESTER: STRANGEWAYS SUNDAY-SCHOOL FESTIVAL.—The adoption of the offertory for the entire support of the church and all its institutions having done away with special Sunday-school collections, the day which formerly was devoted to this purpose is still set apart for special services, and it is endeavoured to make it as happy and pleasant an occasion as possible to all connected with the Sunday school—the scholars' festival Sunday. Last Sunday being the day appointed for this purpose, the church was very beautifully decorated with plants and flowers. Large and handsome greenhouse plants were arranged on each side of the wide steps leading up to the chancel, and on other available places, while numberless vases and trays of flowers covered the communion table, or drooped from the mouldings of the architecture, the font being filled with the choicest that could be procured. Altogether, the church presented a very beautiful appearance, and enhanced the pleasure of the day, both to the school children, and also to the crowded congregations, for whose accommodation forms had to be placed along the aisles. The Rev. H. E. Dowson preached in the morning. In the afternoon, instead of the usual school, the scholars walked in procession into Greengate, and there a short service was held in the open place, Rev. B. Herford giving a short address, and the scholars singing their hymns, by which especially it was hoped that many in the dense, poor population of Greengate, might be touched by religious memories and impressions. Afterwards, scholars and teachers all had tea together, and then the evening service took place, the Rev. Brooke Herford giving a "sermon to parents and children."

PRESTON.—In April, 1861, the Nonconformists of Preston, in consequence of attacks made upon them by the late Mr. Hoare, of Staplehurst, Dr. Molesworth, of Rochdale, and the Rev. Canon Parr, organised themselves for mutual protection. The society then formed connected itself with the Liberation Society, and elected the late William Ainsworth, Esq., and the Rev. W. C. Squier, both Unitarians, its president and secretary. On Mr. Squier's removal to Stand, a year ago, he yielded to the urgent wishes of the society that he should continue to act as secretary. His distance from Preston, and his inability to take part in the agitation now going on in the town against the Irish Establishment have, however, compelled him to ask to be relieved of his office. On his retirement from the active duties of a post he had held for more than seven years, the Liberation Society has presented him with Mr. Skeat's "History of the Free Churches of England," as a friendly acknowledgment of his services.

SEATON DELAVAL, NORTHUMBERLAND.—A Saturday night religious service was recently conducted at Seaton Delaval by the Rev. J. C. Street, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, a long and animated discussion ensuing between two of the local Methodist preachers and Mr. Street. Since that time the excitement has been increasing in intensity. He was again announced to preach on Saturday week, at half-past seven o'clock; but on the Saturday morning he received a letter bearing the signature of one of the most active Unitarian friends at Seaton Delaval, informing him with many expressions of sorrow, that the owners had refused the use of the chapel, and advising him not to go out that night at all, but to wait until some inquiries were made, and certain false impressions removed from the minds of the owners. The letter throughout was so ingenious, manifested such knowledge of persons and events connected with the cause, and conveyed such apparently hearty sympathy, that no suspicion was aroused. Mr. Street immediately replied, and sent his letter of sympathy and encouragement in a parcel by train—there being no second post. It arrived, but no one understood it. With the time for service came all the friends, but none of them had written to Mr. Street, and, as he did not appear, a messenger was despatched to Newcastle, leaving behind him several hundred persons impatiently waiting the solution of the mystery. A moment's interview with Mr. Street proved the letter a forgery. A special train was engaged, and at a quarter past nine o'clock he arrived at Seaton Delaval. His reception was most enthusiastic—was indeed an ovation; the chapel was crowded in a few minutes. It was too late to hold a service, but a hymn was sung, and a full explanation of the affair given. At the close a collection was made by the congregation to defray the expense to which the unknown trickster had put them.

STANNINGTON.—On Sunday, June 7th, the Sunday-school sermons were preached by the Rev. Rees L. Lloyd, of Belper. Owing to the long-continued depression of trade, the collections were not so good as on former occasions.

LONDON SUNDAY-SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

To the Editors.—I have read with deep interest the report in the Inquirer and the Unitarian Herald of the annual proceedings at the breakfast of the Sunday-school Association in London. I thoroughly agree with Mr. Taylor and Mr. Martineau, that the aim of the Sunday school should not be intellectual—that is, I suppose is meant, not chiefly intellectual—but moral and spiritual. I am grateful to them for their emphatic enunciation of this important principle. For several years I have been labouring by lectures and other means to impress the same upon the minds of the teachers in South Lancashire; and last Whit-Sunday, when I stood in Cross-street Chapel and looked down upon two thousand Sunday scholars and teachers collected from Manchester alone, I felt this more than I had ever done before. I saw before me not only the vast number present, but I saw, as it were, behind them the still vaster multitude gathered in our Sunday schools week by week over all the land; and, while I deeply and solemnly felt the grand opportunity thus offered of leavening the masses of this country with the spirit of Christ, I was overcome with sorrow and longing as I thought how this opportunity was comparatively wasted; and I determined still more that I would never rest, as long as I had life and strength, until I had succeeded in awakening a deeper feeling of this opportunity and holy resolve to use it in the heart of our church.

And now I wish to say, in reply to the note sounded in London, that we are not necessarily a long way off from the time when the predominant aim of Sunday-school teaching shall be moral and religious. That aim may be realised next Sunday in every school where there is either a minister or any one who can take his place. It must be realised, if realised at all, generally, by the minister doing the work. It will never be realised if it depends on the great majority of the teachers themselves. I know as much now, I suppose, as any one of the Sunday-school teachers in this district, and I feel assured that there is not one in fifty among them who feels competent or willing to take up the work. They are a fine and devoted band of workers, and have, I believe, a real desire to improve the young generation; but they shrink from attempting the work of practical, moral, and religious instruction. It is, I believe, partly from the shyness which Englishmen and Englishwomen have in general to speak of the deepest and holiest subjects. If you get one of our young men, the most punctual in attendance, most active and zealous in all other Sunday-school work, and ask him to undertake the moral and religious instruction of his class, he will say to you—if you can get at his real sentiments—"Well, ask me to teach any kind of knowledge that I know anything about; ask me to teach a bit of grammar, or a bit of history, or a bit of geography, or arithmetic, and I will do it. In trying to teach these things I feel that I am superior to the class—I know something that they do not; but don't ask me to speak to them about moral and religious subjects, for I feel as if I could not do it. There I do not feel that I am sufficiently superior to the class to speak to them with any authority. I am not good enough to talk to them about goodness. I am not religious enough to talk to them about religion. I cannot do it, for I cannot feel that I should be real in trying to do it."

And then, in addition to this moral difficulty, there is the intellectual difficulty, which weighs, perhaps unconsciously, with many. They have found by experience how difficult it is to speak on moral or religious themes as to secure the interest of children. The very attempt is connected with the sense of failure in their minds—with the remembrance of vain efforts to express all their own thoughts, and with the picture of the children becoming dull and restless under their words.

Believing, then, as I do, that the state of mind which I have just suggested prevails widely among our Sunday-school teachers, I am convinced that we shall not get the work of moral and religious instruction done by them. IF IT IS TO BE DONE AT ALL, IT MUST BE DONE BY THE MINISTER, or by some one specially prepared like him for the work.

It will be asked at once—But how is it possible for the minister to do the work? He cannot cut himself in pieces to give instruction to a number of classes at once, and he has neither time nor strength to take them in succession. I believe that in this question there lies the misconception which has hitherto been the chief barrier to the introduction into the Sunday school of its true work—moral and spiritual culture. It is a misconception as to the nature of the work to be done.

Those who have not given special attention to the spiritual training of the young are apt to imagine that it needs a systematic course of ideas addressed to the intellect like a course of grammar, history, arithmetic, or science. Now we shall at once see what a mistake this is if we fix our minds on the object to be attained. The object of instruction in grammar, history, arithmetic, or science is to strengthen, quicken, and inform the intellect; but the object of primary moral and religious instruction is to awaken and train the moral and religious nature—awaken and train it to love goodness and to love God.

I can hardly imagine that any one will dispute this object; for surely all must see that if we can bring the children of our Sunday schools to love goodness and to love God, we shall have taken the most effectual means to make them good and pious. And then, if we ask ourselves again—what it is that will make our children love goodness and God, we shall see that it is not a course of abstract ideas addressed to the understanding as if we were teaching grammar, but rather a succession of impressions—impressions from lovely images both of goodness and God made on the imagination and the heart.

Such a succession of impressions requires very little system, graduation, or connection. We have not to teach the science of theology, but to awaken the sentiment of religion. Though it would not be accurate to say that we have not to teach theology at all, we may say that we have to teach as our basis the very simplest ideas of theology, that God is our father, good and wise, and great and loving; that goodness is to be loved and pursued, and vice hated and shunned—ideas so simple that they require but once stating to be understood, but so important that it is the work of all moral and religious education to make the conscience recognise and the heart feel them.

What is wanted, then, I repeat, is a simple succession of images of goodness and of God addressed chiefly to the imagination, and resting on this simple basis of ideas, and such lessons may be addressed not only easily but most effectually to the whole school.

I have now tried this plan for several years in our own Sunday school, I believe with complete success. I therefore know that it is practicable. The plan is as follows:—The whole school—boys, girls, and teachers—assemble the first thing on a Sunday morning in our large room. We open with a hymn and a simple prayer, and then the minister addresses the whole school. His aim is, at one time, to make the children feel the loveliness of goodness and hatefulness of vice—say, for example, the loveliness of truthfulness and the hatefulness of falsehood; at another time, he seeks to make them feel the loveliness, the goodness, the fatherly love, and tenderness, the holiness of God. But, whatever his aim, he carefully avoids seeking to work it out by abstract argument addressed to the understanding, and presents it by actual example or image to the imagination, taking for his model the parables of the Great Teacher. At the end of the lesson a chapter is recommended to the teachers for reading with their classes, in order that the same thought may be impressed on the mind in the beautiful words of Scripture. A hymn, containing the same thought, is also selected for learning till the next Sunday. The scholars then file off with their teachers into their various class-rooms. The teachers—at least many of them—talk with their scholars, and question them on the lesson, read with them, and explain the chapter and hear the last Sunday's hymn. By this time the bell rings for service in the chapel, and the moral and religious instruction in the school closes for the day. The elder scholars and teachers attend the service. Those who remain in school are instructed or entertained by their teachers, as best may be.

The afternoon is given up to intellectual instruction. The teachers now follow the bent of their own tastes and acquirements, and instruct their classes in the subjects which most interest them, or which seem most needed. Some will prefer theology, including the history of the Bible. Others will prefer profane history or natural science. I have no doubt that if any scholars were found who wished to study Greek or learn to read the French Testament, we could, as Mr. Sharpe recommended, find teachers who would undertake the work.

Here, then, both wants are met. The moral and religious aim is kept predominant, and yet it is found that there is still a sufficient time for the teachers to do their own work, and in their own way, in imparting secular knowledge. And I quite agree with Mr. Freeston that some amount of secular education must be given still in our Sunday schools. I am not sure that at present the attendance, especially of elder scholars, would not be greatly lessened if all secular instruction were discontinued. But I advocate the retention of secular instruction, in the interest of the moral and religious training. I believe my own children and young people get as much religion as is good for them in the morning. To renew the subject again in the afternoon would be to risk effacing the impression then made, and wearying and disgusting them with the subject.

Many will shake their heads still at the idea of lessons addressed simultaneously to the whole school. They will imagine that matter, offered especially in story form to the younger scholars, will be listened to with impatience by the elder scholars. I have never found it so in one single instance. Of course, I do not pretend to address the infants, but children from seven or eight upward. And I believe the elder scholars are as much interested in the lesson as the youngest. Many of these elder scholars are, of course, occasional teachers, and therefore listen in the spirit of teachers.

Ministers will take up the work. I feel sure of this, as soon as they see that it is their work. Wherever there is afternoon service, I have no doubt, if the congregation were willing, the minister would—as the ministers have done in many places—change the ordinary service for adults into one suitable for the children; and where this cannot be done, would find some other portion of the day for a simultaneous lesson to the whole school, of ten minutes or a quarter of an hour. This would entail no more labour than the conducting of Bible or other classes, or even acting as superintendents, which they now often willingly undertake, and it would effect a far more valuable result.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

It is calculated that the family of the Archbishop of Armagh, who is a Beresford, have, in different generations, drawn nearly four millions from the Church Establishment. It is not uncharitable to say that the Archbishop's objections to the whole movement for disestablishment are natural.

On Wednesday week a new Roman Catholic Church, "Notre Dame de France," was opened in Leicester-square, the building having been for a long series of years that in which Burford's celebrated panoramas were exhibited.

At the Methodist Episcopal Conference in Chicago, a resolution condemning the use of tobacco by the ministry was referred to a special committee. The resolution requests the General Conference to enact a law prohibiting the admission to the ministry of any person using the weed.

At a vestry meeting in Berkhamstead, held on Wednesday, the churchwardens' accounts for the past year were unanimously passed, and the late unprecedented strife, resulting from the forced exaction of church-rates, has been succeeded by more amicable proceedings. Many of the Dissenters who not twelve months before had their goods taken for a church-rate, have liberally subscribed toward the restoration of the fine old parish church, in sums from £3. 3s. to £50. In three weeks the Church Restoration Fund amounted to nearly £3,000. The churchwardens issued a notice calling a meeting of the parishioners in the Town Hall on Wednesday evening week, to grant money by voluntary subscriptions for the expenses of the church for 1868-9.

Letters from Vienna state that on the day of Corpus Christi the processions, contrary to custom, did not make the tour of the churches, but took place in the interior of the buildings. The Emperor and all his family sanctioned the change by their attendance. This circumstance, though unimportant in itself, is not thought of a nature to render the disposition of the Holy See more favourable towards the Austrian Government.

The Quaker missionaries who have just returned from the East, have, during the past few weeks, delivered interesting addresses to their brethren on the subject of the missions and schools in Greece, Asia Minor, Syria, Palestine, and Egypt. At Smyrna, Beirut, Damascus, Jerusalem, and other parts of the East, they visited admirable schools and female missions conducted by "the Prussian Deaconesses," who are a Protestant sisterhood devoted to teaching, nursing, and the care of the poor and afflicted. They are mostly German ladies from the celebrated institution at Kaisersworth, on the Rhine, founded by pastor Theodor Fliedner.

Hitherto it has not been the custom with the Society of Friends when they meet for public worship to have any part of the Bible read to the congregation. Whenever it has been proposed to introduce such reading it has been objected to on the ground that it was likely to lead to the employment of a professional minister or reader. But lately the Bible has been introduced into one or two of the Friends' Meeting Houses, though rather in an unauthorised manner. Those who have wished to listen to the Bible have met for that purpose a little before the regular time of meeting. When the clock announces the hour of worship the reading is discontinued, and the usual time spent in the ordinary manner, namely, in listening to prayer, or to a sermon, or in silent meditation.

The New York Times says that it has received a telegram that the Bishop of London has ordered that the President of the United States shall in future be prayed for in all English churches, along with the Queen and Parliament. "This," says the New York Times, "is 'a touch of nature' which will have a great effect." We are afraid it is a mistake, but we hope the President will not suffer in consequence.

On Wednesday week there was a large assemblage at Eton College from the surrounding neighbourhood, to take farewell of Bishops Selwyn and Harper, previous to their departure, on the 2nd proximo, for New Zealand.

A Christian and a literary man, Daoud Pacha, has been added to the Turkish Cabinet. He is a native of Constantinople, and an Armenian Catholic.

There is no longer any room to doubt that church-rates will be abolished this year. The bill passed by the House of Commons was remitted by the Peers to a Select Committee, with the very reluctant assent of Earl Russell and the supporters of the measure generally. Most persons thought that this was equivalent to the defeat of the bill for the year; but the Select Committee have made their report, and though they would have the bill considerably altered, they have honestly accepted its principle. Compulsory rates would, under the altered bill, be wholly and unequivocally abolished, only it is now proposed that, instead of the churchwardens, the incumbent and two householders should have the control of the money raised in lieu of rates.

The Irish Church Suspensory Bill has at length reached the House of Lords, and been read a first time. Lord Clarendon has agreed to take charge of the measure—a circumstance on which Mr. Gladstone and his supporters may well congratulate themselves. Though not a statesman of the first rank, he is a man of great ability, and has had a large Irish experience. The first reading was, of course, unopposed; but both Lord Grey and the Lord Chancellor gave notice of their intention to move the rejection of the bill.

Some curious facts about the crime of "Samadh," or burying alive, as practised in Rajpootana, have just seen the light. The political agent of Serohi furnishes a list of instances in the course of six years that have come to his knowledge, chiefly in the neighbourhood of Motagaon, a border village. The practice is also carried on, we are assured, in the adjoining State of Marwar. Out of nine cases of Samadh reported, eight of the victims were lepers, the other having been sacrificed, no doubt at his own desire, on account of old age and poverty. The Rao of Serohi has issued a proclamation forbidding the practice under the penalty of ten years' imprisonment. His Highness will no doubt do all he can to put his prohibition in force, but there are very great difficulties in the way of carrying out such orders. In many of the cases the persons who dig the pit and cover up the unfortunate wretch, are themselves lepers, and to them death itself would be welcome.

Formerly, whenever a clergyman preached in the presence of any member of the royal family, it was the etiquette for him to write out his text, which was placed in the royal pew for the benefit of the august occupants, whose ears were supposed to be exempt from the task of heeding the preacher at the moment of delivering the extract like those of commoner persons. In these days the clergyman who preaches before the Queen has a better conception of his office, and endeavours as a rule to be unconscious of her presence. At the chapel of the Tuileries there is more parade. The priests who enter, and the fine people who gather there, bow with a cold formality to what they believe to be the Real Presence; but when the folding-doors at the back are flung open, and the splendid messenger there proclaims "L'Empereur!" all, priests and people, turn from the altar towards the imperial tribune, and bow so low there as to convey a painful impression to the mind. There are said to be country churches where the local nobleman or squire is invested with such exclusive quality that no person thinks of going up to the communion table till my lord and family have first partaken.

On Wednesday week, a Congregational Institute was opened at Nottingham, which has cost £5,400. It is for the institution which our Independent friends formed something after the model of the Home Missionary Board; and the object of which is to train a mission ministry, to be divided into two orders—the pastoral and the evangelistic. At each end there is a residence for the professors, the lecture hall being in the centre. The debt remaining is £900, towards which two gentlemen offered £550, on condition that the remainder was subscribed that day.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

Rev. Dr. Isaac M. Wise, Rabbi of the temple at Cincinnati and editor of the Israelite, a learned and liberal-minded Jew, has just completed a work entitled "The Origin of Christianity and a Commentary to the Acts of the Apostles;" and, by a collation of the Talmud and other rabbinical books with the books of the New Testament, especially the Epistles and Acts, numerous new results are said to have been attained in Biblical research.

The chief points, says the Liberal Christian, which Dr. Wise claims to have established are—the real existence of Jesus and the Apostles; the possession of manuscripts in the first century by Jesus himself and the Apostles; the nature of the differences between Paul and the original Apostles; the identity of Stephen and one Rabbi Judah, and of Paul with the Acher of the Talmud; the history of the Apostles, including that of Paul, and the origin of the principal Christian doctrines.

In noticing the death of the Rev. Dr. Robert Vaughan, the well-known Congregationalist, the English Independent says:

"Dr. Vaughan was to a large extent a self-made man. He did, indeed, receive a certain amount of training for the ministry under the Rev. William Thorp, of Bristol, of whom he always spoke with affection and respect; but it was mainly to his own intense love of learning, and his indomitable perseverance, and his force of character, that he was indebted for the high reputation he won. His first pastorate was at Worcester, where he laboured for six years. But it was after his removal to Kensington, where he spent the greater part of his ministerial life, that he became more extensively known. His preaching, though too thoughtful and philosophical to be extensively popular, attracted a large number of hearers belonging to a class not often found in Dissenting chapels. His position as Professor of History in University College, London, contributed to the increase of his influence, and marked him out as a man of scholarly habits and attainments. But, still more, his books earned for him a wide-spread and deserved reputation. First appeared his two historical works, 'The Life of Wycliffe' and 'Memorials of the Stuart Dynasty,' and some years later his series of small volumes on 'Religious Parties in England,' 'Congregationalism and Modern Society,' and the 'Modern Pulpit.' We believe it was these books which recommended him to the committee of the Lancashire Independent College, then anxious to find a president whose name and character should be worthy of the great institution which they had founded. He gave to Lancashire the best service of his philosophic genius, his cultivated taste, his large experience; and Lancashire gave him a hearty confidence and sincere admiration. This is not the place to enter into the circumstances which led to the severing of a connection so honourable to both parties. We believed it to be a mistake at the time, and we have that opinion still more strongly now. But it seemed to Dr. Vaughan that no other course was open to him, and, having presided over the College for fourteen years, he resolved in 1857 to seek comparative retirement, partly to secure the quiet he felt to be necessary to his health, and partly to devote himself to literary work. For a short time afterwards he held a pastorate at Uxbridge, but his time during the last few years has been given mainly to literature. We need not dwell at length on his labours in connection with the British Quarterly Review. Among the books of his later days were his 'Memorial of English Non-conformity,' a bicentenary volume; his history of 'Revolutions in England,' a work which reflects the highest credit on his industry and learning, and on which, probably, his permanent reputation will depend. Nor should we forget his valuable little treatise on Ritualism, his brief but telling exposition of the State Church argument, and his admirable volume of Family Prayers. It was only last autumn that he removed to Torquay to enter on new ministerial labours, which have now been suddenly closed."

The Spectator suspects that Mr. Disraeli knows that for his party the cry of "Disraeli" alone is no longer sufficient—so he raises instead that of "Disraeli and Providence," a combination of watchwords which he feels very justly that it needs a truly "awful dispensation" to render conceivable. In the most cynical chapters of his novels the Prime Minister has taught us what he really means by a Church cry. He should bethink himself that, stupid as the world is, it usually knows how to distinguish roughly between religious acts and acted religion. Mr. Disraeli's speech, on Wednesday, is, to men of the smallest reality of character, one of the grossest satires upon the age. There is scarcely a sentence in which the speaker's real contempt for the audience he was addressing, and greater contempt for the greater audience whom he hoped to reach through them, is not, with almost perfect insouciance, betrayed.

Every expression of representative opinion on the Irish Church has a special interest at the present moment. The Free Church of Scotland is a religious community of importance, and it is, therefore, worth noting that the "Commission"—a kind of special general assembly meeting—of that body has, by 99 to 34, determined to petition Parliament in favour of the disendowment of all the religious sects in Ireland.

The Rock (ultra-Protestant) dreads the advent of the time when the Irish Church will have what Mr. Gladstone promises it, "perfect freedom." It says that whenever the Legislature adopts this course with the Church in Ireland, it will be nothing more than a question of time, and of a very short time, how the same principle can be applied to England also. The two Churches, if Mr. Gladstone should succeed, will very soon "be deprived of legal privilege and position, and invested with perfect freedom." Take away the pressure of the Legislature and the courts of law, and leave the Church of England in "perfect freedom," and it instantly separates into three or four sects.

The North British Review says:

"There is at this present time a desperate rally on the part of the old Tory section of the English Church. They see their ascendancy passing away, and they are banding themselves together for a fierce struggle to regain it. They have chosen their time unwisely. The most marked characteristic of our age is an indifference not only to the Church of England, but, in a measure, to all recognised forms of belief. But while we are thus breaking with tradition and authority, we are keenly alive to truth and justice; we rest our hopes for the future on intellectual progress. And it is at such a time that this Church of yesterday would arrogate to itself the majesty of the Vatican, will spare no effort to maintain in Ireland the greatest ecclesiastical iniquity in Europe, and to banish from our universities all freedom of thought and breadth of culture. Men are beginning to ask how it is that the bulk of the established clergy are always opposed to peace, and freedom, and right; and the question is full of danger."

The Freeman gives an interesting account of a Sunday's work with the "Evangelisation Society."

"Invited by one of the honorary secretaries—a Christian gentleman of great earnestness and practical knowledge—we agreed to take two services at Brentwood. On arriving there, on Saturday night, we learnt that in consequence of Ritualistic practices which have been introduced into the parish church a number of Churchmen had engaged the Town Hall for the purpose of holding simple services for all classes of the people. The Evangelisation Society sends down the preachers, all of whom are laymen, who conduct services similar to those held on Sunday afternoon and evening in St. James's Hall. None of the preachers are known denominationally; their object being the presentation of the elementary principles of the Gospel, in the language of thoughtful people, and divested of the rant and noise that characterise too many irregular services. The Town Hall will seat 600 people, and all classes are represented at the services. On the Saturday evening we found our aid solicited at a mission hall for the poorer classes in the town, and accordingly we addressed a very attentive audience of labourers, in company with two Churchmen, one of whom was a commissioned officer from Warley Barracks. On the Sunday the two services—afternoon and evening—were most respectably attended. In Brentwood there is no Baptist chapel. There is an Independent and a Wesleyan place of worship, and since the commencement of the present special effort, the attendance at the services of the Wesleyan chapel has considerably increased."

The Christian World, in the course of an article insisting that there must be places in a true ministry for men of every rank and degree of culture, makes a suggestion akin to that which has been lately proposed by some in our own body:

"And now a word on another and opposite side of the subject. There are from time to time young men devoting themselves to the Nonconformist ministry who, by reason of the advantages of a first-rate schooling, or unusual aptitude for learning, are quite worthy of a university education. Our ancient seats of learning are open to them, and the inevitable abolition of tests will place them on an equal footing with the members of the Church of England. It is in every way to be desired that such young men should avail themselves of the advantages within their reach. The way is opening for the training of them. What will shortly be needed is a Nonconformist College or Theological Hall in Cambridge or Oxford to which Nonconformist students may resort for training special to the ministry, while they are gaining the literary advantages and social prestige of a university education. We take it that there is no good reason for removing any of our existing colleges to these seats of learning. Founded for ordinary ministerial training, they will be needed for their purpose for at least a long time to come. What we would suggest is, that since the young men most likely to go to the universities would belong to the more affluent classes, wealthy Nonconformists should take into their serious consideration the founding of such a college or hall. They would thus be making provision for the education of their sons—more of whom ought to be, and will be ere long, in the Nonconformist ministry—and at the same time they would be rendering no small service in the maintenance and extension of the kingdom of God in the world. There is to be a 'Keble College' in Oxford, why should there not be a 'Vaughan College' also?"

At the last meeting of the Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge, a proposal was brought forward to grant about £4,000 out of a recent legacy of £25,000 for Dr. Grey's purposes in the diocese of Natal. The Evangelical clergy, however, little as they like Bishop Colenso, are still less disposed to help the ritualistic Bishop Grey. It is rich to read the Church News's account:

"At one time Catholics (the name affected by the High Church party) were in a clear and decided majority; but cabs were sent off to pick up the halt and the blind, so that later in the afternoon the High and Dry, the Erastians, the followers of Mr. Maurice and the Evangelicals all having coalesced, the result was that the grant was lost by fifty-six against fifty. Dr. Miller spoke lamely and limpingly for the Evangelicals, and the spectacle was the reverse of pleasant. To know that the followers of Martyn, Simeon, and their allies should be now found actively supporting a deposed Bishop who denies that prayer should be offered to our Blessed Lord, and who is an Arian if not a Socinian, is a sight to make the angels weep."

An Irish rector and Rural Dean, the Rev. W. Anderson, writing to the Guardian, shows that the Canadian Church has passed through the same ordeal as his own will have to go through, and though the former was far poorer than the latter, the clergy, being allowed by the Government to commute their life estates, did not look on their incomes as belonging to themselves, but as given for the service of the Church, and instead of taking the value for their own individual benefits, they gave it to form a fund for diocesan purposes; and Mr. Anderson thinks, if the Irish clergy were to act in the same way, their loss in wealth would be more than repaid by their gain in liberty of action. He puts the case thus:

"Suppose that we were intrusted with the care of a certain vineyard. Our Master has commanded us to cultivate it for Him. Another person comes up and offers to find us wages for being engaged in so good a work. At the same time he says, 'You may do work for me which will not be incompatible with the allegiance you owe your Master. You may improve the quality of these grapes; you may hedge the vineyard; you may keep off intruders; you may act as a garrison for me, and you may attend to my interest as well as to the interest of your Master.' By and by this good neighbour changes his mind. He says, then, to the husbandman, 'I shall not require your services any longer. But I shall not be hard on you. You may still retain three-fifths of the property, the whole of which you have hitherto enjoyed. You may use it either for yourselves or you may employ it in the service of your Master, in order to provide that there shall be for ever hereafter a succession of husbandmen to labour for Him. You say that these grapes are tender; that they will perish if not sheltered in this cold and ungenial climate; or that, perhaps, in the remote corners of the vineyard they may fall into the hands of your Master's enemies, if there be no provision for paying husbandmen to succeed you.' What ought to be our reply to these proposals? Should we not say at once, 'We cannot resist you, but we dare not look on this property as our own. As for the three-fifths, we shall till it all the more carefully for Him, and try if we cannot by better husbandry prevent the crop from becoming less.' If we, on the other hand, were to say, 'Now we shall have all to ourselves, and let the Master do as He pleases for fruit, what words would describe the conduct of such men?'"

OLD TESTAMENT CHAPTERS FOR THE SUNDAY SCHOOL.—IX

SUBJECT: The day of Jehovah as the early Hebrew prophets looked forward to it.

Read Zephaniah i. 7, ii. 3. Here the day of Jehovah is to be a day in which the foreign tyrants shall be punished with all those who fill their masters' houses with violence and deceit. Jerusalem is to be searched with lamps, and those who are indolent and slothful are to be punished. It is to be a day of wrath, a day of trouble and distress upon those who have sinned against Jehovah. But, cries the prophet, all ye meek of the earth, ye who have executed His judgments, seek ye Jehovah; "seek righteousness, seek meekness; it may be ye shall be hidden in the day of Jehovah's anger."

Read also Joel ii. 28, iii. 2, and iii. 9—21, where we are told that on the day of Jehovah wonders will be shown in the heavens, bloodshed and war will come upon the earth, Jehovah is to sit in the valley of Jehoshaphat, and all the nations are to be gathered together and to be brought down to be judged there by Him. The sun and the moon shall be darkened, the stars shall withdraw their shining, and when He utters His voice the heavens and the earth will shake. But Judah shall be cleansed, Jerusalem shall be holy; for Jehovah dwelleth upon Zion.

The above quoted passages may be seen to give a clear and well-marked view of a future judgment, a day in which Jehovah shall settle his account with men; but it is a day of judgment upon earth, such as the millennium of the early Christians, rather than the more modern idea of a judgment in another state of existence. This subject may be continued by reading the 34th and 35th chapters of Isaiah, where the duty of Jehovah is a restoration of righteousness and holiness; but, as in the former passages, it is to come to pass upon earth.

JUST COME FROM JERUSALEM.

THE Sunday school of the Rev. Jas. Martineau had quite a treat last Sunday week. A friend came among them direct from Jerusalem, from Bethany and the Mount of Olives. The school is now held in their admirably-appointed new premises, near the Little Portland-street Chapel, where are gathered daily some five hundred pupils, and about half that number on the Sunday. We hear, by the way, that they are just paying the last instalment of the cost of the buildings, in all about £8,000. On this occasion the Rev. C. H. A. Dall, who has recently spent a month in Jerusalem and in visiting its neighbouring points of deep interest, Bethany, Bethlehem, Hebron, &c., brought, showed, and gave away to the boys and girls a variety of things appealing to them through more than one of the senses. He exhibited one photograph of the church that covers the spot on Calvary where the Cross was set up, on which Jesus cried, "Father, forgive them," with his dying breath. Another photograph showed the Mount of Olives, as it now stands, just behind Kidron from Mount Moriah, and as seen across that road to Bethany, so often trodden by the weary feet of him who loved Martha and her sister and Lazarus. Mr. Dall walked this road once and again not many weeks ago, and descended at Bethany into what is now shewn to strangers by the people of that nearly ruined village, as "Lazarus's house." Very little of it is now above ground, the dust of centuries having nearly buried the once sweet home where Mary sat at the feet of Jesus. It so chanced that Mr. Dall had also with him for distribution to the children, almonds, figs, prunes, &c., which he purchased for supplying his basket, in Jerusalem, at a shop in the Via dolorosa, on the way to Golgotha and the crucifixion hill. Besides these, which would enable his eager hearers to say that they had eaten food from, if not in the "City of God," he presented Miss Rutt, the superintendent, and the other teachers, through the hands of their director, the Rev. James Martineau, who is always present with the school to lead its afternoon session, a wreath of pressed flowers, scarlet ranunculus, buttercups, anemones, &c., which the donor had brought from Gethsemane, from the Court-yard of the Temple on Moriah, from the indubitable road to Bethany, and from the tinted slopes of the Mount of Olives—from whose top and minaret he had recently gazed on the Dead Sea and the descending waters of Jordan, splendidly backed by the abrupt and lofty crags of the mountains of Moab. The brilliant wreath will remain on the school walls, neatly framed, as a memento, helping many to realise what to the young is made far more real by such things tangible and visible. *

"THE COMEDY OF CONVOCATION IN THE ENGLISH CHURCH."—II.

THE second sitting was held in Dr. Eassey's drawing-room, where "portraits of the Misses Eassey attracted the attention of the younger clergy, and the absence of reporters imparted to their elder brethren a welcome sense of liberty." The question for discussion was: "Are English orders human or divine?" The Professor of History, who "rose from an ottoman, and then, in compliance with a general request, stood on it, for the convenience of his hearers," subjected the doctrine of apostolical succession to a destructive criticism in the aggravatingly candid style.

Dean Blunt demanded how, calling as we did the whole Catholic priesthood the "spawn of Anti-christ," we could attempt or desire to prove that our orders are manifestly divine, because we could trace them to that source?

On which Dean Primitive asked, "Of whom then are we descendants? We must be descendants of somebody."

Archdeacon Chasuble contended that, if English orders were merely human, he could conceive nothing in creation so degraded as an Anglican Bishop. If everybody was equally qualified to teach religion, it was manifest that no one required to be taught. When our Lord commanded "Go and teach" all nations, did that mean, go and let all nations teach you? or when St. Paul asks, "How shall they preach except they be sent?" were the clergy to reply, "As to teaching, I find no difficulty in it; and as to being sent, I send myself."

The subject of clerical celibacy coming up, a view different from that of most Protestants was taken by the Rev. Athanasias Benedict, "a young man of pleasant manner but wearing the robe of a monk, who advanced into the room with a quick and eager manner," and explained that he had just returned from Rome, where he had been in order to consult the Holy Father as to whether there was any Catholic precedent by which an individual might appoint himself superior of a religious order of his own creation; whether, if his Bishop was an ignorant heretic, he might treat his foolish opposition with contempt; whether in case of necessity he might teach his Church, supposing his Church to be incapable of teaching him; and whether, if he should be excommunicated by all his monks and excommunicate them all in return, it was his duty or theirs to pay the debts of the monastery? Having received permission from the company he proceeded, "without a moment's hesitation and looking straight before him with a piercing glance," to observe that our clergy from their incessant marrying and giving in marriage had become known as "types of uxorious effeminacy." It shocked the purest instinct of the soul to see a priest entangled in wedlock, but what language could do justice to the revolting spectacle of a wedded Bishop? There was a shameful incongruity in that latest invention of connubial repose, an English parsonage house, or that triumphant device of luxurious ease, an English episcopal palace. (Dean Pompous, crimson with indignation, protested that he would leave the room if the young man repeated such disgraceful language.) Mr. Benedict, whose face was illumined with smiles, continued, and asked what success would have attended the teaching of St. John Chrysostom if he had been escorted in his wanderings through Phrygia by the wife of his bosom, arrayed in a wreath of orange blossoms? He remembered the disgraceful fact that Bishop Barlow's five daughters had married five Anglican prelates—no doubt with the pious intention of keeping alive the apostolical succession in the English Church. And it was to be observed that when a clergyman once married it seemed impossible to revive in him any respect for continence. He would marry every year, if his wives would only die fast enough to allow him to do so.

The Rev. Lavender Kidds (a representative of the Exeter Hall school), who had for some time been forcibly held down by his two neighbours, here shook himself free, and rose up declaring that he would confound Mr. Benedict with the sword of the Spirit. In a high-pitched voice and scornfully waving his hand, he reiterated that "He had been in Rome, and had there witnessed the pernicious effects of unscriptural avoidance of matrimony. He had watched in the Corso those odious Franciscan degraded beings with naked feet and a rope round their waist, dirty and repulsive victims of a grovelling and humiliating superstition. That shocking spectacle had filled him with devout thankfulness for the blessed institutions of his own beloved country. He rejoiced to believe that the unnatural spectacle of an unwedded Bishop had never or very rarely been seen in their scriptural church. Long might they continue to use their 'Christian liberty,' as the late Bishop Denison powerfully observed in this matter, and to adorn the land with a comely and godly offspring."

Dr. Easy brought the Convocation to a close with the following speech, in which, it must be admitted, there is much sound good sense: "If they were content to believe with the whole nation that they were simply the representatives of the English Reformation, that they were Protestant ministers, not Catholic priests, that they were distinguished in nothing from other men except as having undertaken to remind them from time to time of truths which all were too apt to forget, they would then assume the only character which really belonged to them, or in which their own communion, or any other, would ever consent to recognise them. In that case they would no longer expose either themselves or their religion to the world's contempt, nor unwillingly furnish the unbeliever with a fatal argument against the truth and the reasonableness of Christianity. The Church of England had never been the home of the supernatural, as all mankind knew from her history, and to try to introduce so strange an element into such a receptacle would be a far more dangerous experiment than to pour new wine into old bottles. They might as well attempt to inclose the lightning which could shiver rocks in the hands of an infant as to make the English Church the shrine of mysteries which she had existed only to deny."

WHAT IS TO BECOME OF THE PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY?

WE ask this question in all seriousness, and with very great regret that it should need to be asked. There is no one of our district congregational gatherings that has such a venerable past to look back upon, and that might be so useful in quickening the religious life of our churches in the present. Representing an unbroken succession of more than two hundred and twenty years, and gathering to a focus the common life and interest of some seventy congregations, it is impossible to exaggerate the good that might accrue from its yearly meetings if they were, as they ought to be, earnest and friendly conferences on the subjects of deepest common interest in our religious life. Unfortunately, however, this is not the case. Now from one cause and now from another, they have continually failed to attain even an average standard of usefulness. Twenty years ago it was a standing reproach against them, especially on the part of our laymen, that they were mere social meetings for a service and a dinner—no work done, no practical purpose served; only great occasions for parsonic talk. Well, an attempt was made to do away with this reproach. Some twelve years ago an attempt was made to reduce the vague constitution of the Assembly to something like a practicable organisation and to utilise the corporate energy of the Assembly in practical missionary work. We are afraid, however, that this must be admitted to have failed. From that time to this the meetings have been constantly occupied with contention and debate relating to the Assembly's own organisation, conducive neither to social enjoyment nor yet to practical work; and this state of things culminated last week in a meeting upon which we are sure that the great majority of those present can only look back with regret and shame. It is perfectly true that this present state of things is caused year after year by a very few men. Certainly the complaint can no longer be made that the Provincial Assembly is either a friendly meeting or an opportunity for ministers to talk. The few men who, for some years past, have been most prominent at the Assembly have been laymen; and the result of their efforts, no doubt made with the best intentions, has been to turn the meetings into little short of an ecclesiastical bear garden. This, however, does not lessen the sadness of the result. It is a miserable thing that a masterful and litigious spirit, even if only in one man out of a hundred, should be able to destroy the religious usefulness of the day, and it behoves all those who desire that this meeting shall really fulfil a useful purpose, to take counsel as to how it may be freed from all such mere red tapeism of organisation as at present affords so ready a handle for legal bickerings.

Without entering into any minute consideration of the changes that might be advisable, and which will no doubt be anxiously considered, we hope without delay, by the committee to whom Mr. DARBISHIRE's propositions were referred, we may point out the main direction in which such alterations must tend. The central purpose and idea of the Assembly seem to be the gathering together of the most earnest and active life of our churches in the province, for brotherly conference on matters touching our common church life and work—conference in such a spirit as may be aroused by united worship and by the quickening address of some leading man. We do not enter upon the question whether it is or is not desirable that such conference should result in organised work. That there can be any objection on principle to its so doing, seems to us utterly untenable. But it will always be a question how far such work can be effectually carried out by the Assembly; and certainly the experiment of the missionary branch has shown that in that matter, at least, the actual work can be better done by smaller local organisations. The one essential thing is that a longer time should be secured for free religious conference. We apprehend that this will have to be done by greatly lessening in some way the mere routine business and the after-dinner speechifying. At the half-yearly meetings of the Congregational and Baptist Unions short papers on chosen subjects of interest are read, and are followed by free discussions, similar in kind to those which took place at the recent Educational Conference in Manchester, or to those with which many of our readers have become familiar in the sections of the Social Science Association. Why should not from two to three hours on the day of the Provincial Meeting be secured for something of this kind? It is not necessary that such discussions should result in any formal action. They might do so in cases where there appears a feeling sufficiently unanimous for action to be taken without friction and discord; but often it would be otherwise. We believe that the subject brought forward by the Rev. JOSEPH FREESTON on Thursday, would have been far more likely to have been fully and thoughtfully considered if it had not been shaped into a distinct proposal for action. The question,—what our churches are doing to promote education, either by day or by Sunday schools, is one of the very deepest importance. Brought forward in a motion for a committee to investigate and propose actual measures, it fell at once to the ground; yet it is a subject that, carefully introduced as matter for general conference, might well have been discussed during at least one of the two precious hours that were wasted upon mere matters of official business.

THE APPEAL FOR INDIA.

"An Intended Subscriber" (whose letter, being anonymous, we cannot print), writes to question "the policy" of our last leader. He says:

"When we are reminded that to offer a tentative support for three or four years is 'mere dabbling,' and that 'many of the subscriptions that have been proffered are for such short terms as to be practically almost valueless,' I would ask, with all due deference, are not such conclusions, thus expressed, more likely to lessen rather than increase the number of those who might otherwise be disposed to become contributors? Nor should it be forgotten how many appeals for pecuniary aid are now being constantly made upon the Unitarian body."

Perhaps it was not politic, yet we are afraid what we said was true. Such taking up of a great work is "dabbling." Business men would be ashamed to take up any secular enterprise in such a fashion. As to the second plea of the Unitarians having "so many appeals," the plain fact is, that English Unitarians have fewer appeals and give less for religion than any other body in Christendom.—Eds. U. HEROES.

CHILDREN, when you sat wishing,
Down last night on the sands,
Beckoning moments of glory
With little helpless hands,
I heard you saying and sighing,
As the wind went over the seas,
"There never will come knights-errant
To common days like these!"
I heard you sighing and saying,
"The beautiful time is gone
When heroes hunted for monsters,
And conquered them one by one:
And now there is nothing noble,
And we all lie safe at night,
But we would not mind a monster,
If we could have a knight!"

Then taking breath for a moment,
You all stood up and said,
"Remember Garibaldi!
Not all the knights are dead.
A chief for men to follow,
Who never lingers nor halts;
A king for women and children,
Because he has no faults.

"But he is nothing to England!
There is the thought that smarts;
We want an English hero,
To trouble all our hearts."
Ah, children! who could tell you
That hearts grow sick and cold,
Without the healing trouble
That touched the waters of old!

Shake not your heads at England,
Her soil is still of worth;
It cannot lose the habit
Of bringing heroes forth.
I met one yesterday evening,
And when you hear his tale,
You'll not be sighing and saying
That times are feeble and pale.

The wind was soft and heavy,
Where African palm-trees tower,
Hardly stirring the river,
Hardly shaking a flower;
The night was grave and splendid,
A dead queen lying in state,
With all her jewels upon her,
And trumpets at her gate.

The wild notes waved and lingered,
And fainting along the air,
Sometimes like defiance,
And sometimes like despair;
When down the moonlit mountain,
And beside the river-calms,
The line of a dismal procession
Unwound between the palms.

A train of driven captives,
Weary, weak, amazed—
Eighty hopeless faces
Never once upraised;
Bleeding from the journey,
Longing for the grave;
Men and women and children,
Every one a slave.

Lashed and crying and crouching
They passed, suspecting not
There were three or four English
Whose hearts grew very hot,—
Men who had come from a distance,
Whose lives were in their hands,
To tell the love of Jesus,
About the heathen lands.

Studious men and gentle
But not in the least afraid;
With fire enough amongst them
To furnish a crusade.
And when they saw the slave-troop
Come hurrying down the hill,
Each man looked at the other,
Unable to be still.

They did not care for treaties,
And death they did not fear;
One great wrong would have roused them:
There were eighty here.
They were not doing man's work,
They were doing the Lord's;
So they went and stopped the savages
With these amazing words:

"We are three or four English,
And we CANNOT LET THIS BE;
Get away to your mountains,
And set the people free."
You should have seen the black men,
How grey their faces turn;
They think the name of England
Is something that will burn.

They break, they fly like water
In a rushing mighty wind;
The slaves stretch out uncertain hands
By long despair made blind,
Till, in a wonderful moment,
The gasp of freedom came,
Like the leap of a tropical sunrise,
That sets the world a flame.

A blast of weeping and shouting
Cleansed all the guilty place;
And God was able to undraw
The curtain from His face.
A hundred years of preaching
Could not proclaim the creed
Of Love and Power and Pity,
So well as that one deed.

A glorious gift is Prudence;
And they are useful friends
Who never make beginnings
Till they can see the ends;
But give us now and then a man,
That we may make him king,
Just to scorn the consequence,
And just to DO THE THING.

Poems for a Child.

AN OLD TYROL STORY.

THE Emperor Maximilian was as keen a sportsman as any modern Wildschütz, and one fine morning, ever so many years ago, he was led, in the excitement of the chase, to the very edge of the great Martinswand, and while the chamois bounded away in safety, the less fortunate Emperor missed his footing, and, falling from the rocks, was just able to save himself by clinging, with the tenacity of despair, to a small ledge of rock, where he hung, head downwards, in full view of his faithful subjects. Nobles and peasants, priests and courtiers, gave him up as lost. The spot was deemed simply inaccessible to anything without wings, and unless a special miracle was wrought in his behalf, a faithful son of the Church must perish. Of course a crowd was collected and a holy abbot was summoned, who, kneeling on the ground, began solemnly chanting the prayers for the dead. The poor Emperor, hanging by his eyelids meanwhile, and looking down from his elevation of more than 700 feet, must have been rather aggravated by the performance, if, in the awful agony of the moment, he had any sight or thoughts to spare for earthly things. But help was at hand, and a brave huntsman seeing from above Maximilian's mortal peril, cried to him to be of good courage and to maintain his hold; and with wonderful skill and hardihood he swung himself down to the Emperor's side, seized him in his strong grasp, and, clinging to the rocks with their iron shod feet, they scaled the wall that seemed so utterly inaccessible, while the abbot chanted on below, and the people shouted "A miracle! an angel has come to the rescue of the Kaiser!"

WHO IS THE TEMPTER?

KRILOFF, the great Russian humourist, has the following fable, the moral of which is obvious:—A Brahmin on a fast day feels inclined to eat something nourishing. In great fear of his superior, he waits till night, lights a candle, and roasts an egg over it. He is gloating by anticipation over the feast, when the superior enters. "What is the meaning of this?" he cries; "deny it not, I find the egg in your hand." "Pardon me, holy father," exclaims the Brahmin through his tears, "I do not know how I fell into such a sin, but I was tempted by the devil." Upon this the devil himself appears from behind the stone: "Are you not ashamed," he says to the Brahmin, "to calumniate me so? I have just taken a lesson from you, for never till this moment did I know how to roast an egg over a candle."

FLOWERS FROM PERSIAN GARDENS.—VII.

In the Institutes of Ardehsheer Babegan, it is recorded that he asked an Arabian physician: "What quantity of food may one eat daily?" He answered: "A hundred dirhams' weight is sufficient." He said: "What strength can such a quantity give?" He replied: "This quantity will carry you, and whatever more you take you will have to carry."

They asked a sick man: "What does thy heart desire?" He replied: "That it might desire anything."

They asked Hatim Tai: "Hast thou ever seen in the world any one more noble-minded than thyself?" He replied: "One day I had offered a sacrifice of forty camels, and had gone out with some Arab chiefs to a corner of the desert. There I saw a thorn-cutter, who had gathered together a bundle of thorns. I said to him, 'Why goest thou not to share the hospitality of Hatim Tai, when a crowd has assembled at his feast?' He replied: 'Whoever can eat the bread of his own labour will not put himself under an obligation to Hatim Tai.' This man, in mind and in magnanimity, I consider greater than myself."

Never had I complained of the vicissitudes of fortune, or saddened my face at the revolution of the heavens, except once on a time when my foot was naked, and I had not wherewithal to purchase a shoe. Entering the great Mosque of Nufah, I saw there a man who had no feet. Then I converted my lament into gratitude and praise for the goodness of God, and bore my want of shoes with patience. A roasted fowl is less than pot-herbs in the eye of him who is already satiated. To him who is needy and fainting, a boiled turnip is a roasted fowl.

I have heard of a wealthy man who was as notorious for his stinginess as was Hatim Tai for his liberality. No one ever saw his door open or his table spread. He was sailing on the Western sea on his way to Egypt, when a contrary wind assailed the ship. Then he lifted up his hand in prayer, and began to utter vain lamentations. What advantage can the hand of supplication be to the unhappy servant raised to God in the moment of peril, but, when liberality is needed, folded under the arm?

I have heard one of the sages say: "No one confesses his own ignorance so much as the man who begins to talk whilst another is speaking, and has not yet finished."

A man with a disagreeable voice, and in a loud tone, was reading the Koran. An observant passer-by asked, "What is your stipend?"

"Nothing," he replied. "Why, then, give yourself this trouble?" "I read," he said, "for the sake of God." "Then," he replied, "for God's sake, read no longer. You mar the beauty of your religion."

THE PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY OF LAN- CASHIRE AND CHESHIRE.

THE two hundred and twenty-third anniversary of this Assembly of our congregations in Lancashire and Cheshire was held on Thursday, June 18th, at Upper Brook-street Chapel. By eleven o'clock a large congregation had gathered together, among whom were the following:—

The Rev. Dr. Bellows, of New York; the Rev. R. B. Aspland, of London; the Revs. Dr. Beard, Sale; W. Gaskell, W. H. Herford, R. Herford, S. A. Steintal, Jas. Drummond, S. Robinson, A. Rushton, J. Harrop, Manchester; C. Beard, A. Gordon, W. A. Pope, C. B. Upton, J. Shannon, T. Jones, Liverpool; J. Worthington and J. Entwistle, Bolton; W. C. Squier and J. Davies, Stand; J. Wright, Bury; J. K. Montgomery, Chester; G. Ride, Chorley; H. Green, Knutsford; D. Berry, Mossley; A. Hardy, Prescott; T. Carter and J. Freeston, Rochdale; T. Holland, Southport; J. Black, Stockport; W. Probert, Walmsley; R. C. Dendy, Flowery Field; J. Cuckson, Liverpool; F. Revitt, Mottram; L. Taplin, Todmorden; J. Gilbert, Rivington; F. Bishop, Chesterfield; J. Page Hopps, Dukinfield; C. W. Robbards, Oldham; H. E. Dowson, Gee Cross; A. M. Creery, Altrincham; H. Fogg, Ormskirk; J. K. Smith, Newchurch; J. T. Cooper, Buxton; J. Fox, Heywood; E. Allen, Lydgate; A. Payne, Wilmslow; G. Fox, Park Lane; J. C. Lunn and D. Davies, Lancaster; G. H. Wells, Gorton; J. T. Whitehead, Ainsworth; R. J. Orr, Preston; G. Beaumont, Gateacre; and W. G. Cadman, Failsword; and Messrs. Benjamin Heape, R. D. Darbishire, Edlowes, Towman, M.A., R. Aspdon, Harry Rawson, R. Nicholson, John Armstrong, Peter Bickersley, of Manchester; Thos. Avison, Liverpool; George Buckton, Leeds; Major Coppock and Alexander Thornely, Stockport; Thomas Thornely and R. M. Shipman, Gee Cross.

The Rev. C. W. ROBBARDS led the worship, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. J. PAGE HOPPS, from the two texts "God is a spirit" (St. John iv. 24), and "In Him we live and move and have our being" (Acts xvii. 28).

At the conclusion of the service, after an interval during which refreshments were hospitably provided by the congregation in the library, the chair was taken by the president, the Rev. W. GASKELL. Some little time was occupied by the calling of the roll, and by a question which arose out of it as to the admissibility thereon of some delegates whose names had not been sent in beforehand, according to the terms of the circular issued by the committee. After a speech from Major Coppock and one or two other laymen, the subject dropped, and the president proceeded to deliver his annual address to the Assembly. Striking the note of encouragement even more decidedly than last year, the address dwelt upon the various signs of the progress of the principles of religious liberty—the impotency of the Pan-Anglican Synod, the improved position of the effort for the opening of the Universities, and the unexpected strength of the movement for the disestablishment of the Irish Church. This latter conflict must, moreover, lead on to other changes, and the address proceeded to dwell very distinctly on the evil of the State Church system, and speak strongly for a free church in a free state. The address passed on to allude to the work going on in our own churches throughout the province, putting this as hardly verifying Dr. Vaughan's saying a few years ago that we were on the point of dissolution. In some of these works the missionary branch of the Assembly had rendered help, but Mr. Gaskell suggested that that branch would do more good and win wider support if it were converted into a church building fund. The address closed by appealing for closer union and fellowship among ourselves.

After the reading of the minutes of the past year, and a brief notice of the changes in the province, the officers for the past year were chosen on the motion of Mr. THOMAS AVISON.

The report of the Missionary Branch Committee was read by Rev. S. A. STEINTAL. The report stated that what the committee had done during the year was to make a few grants of £20 each.

On the motion for the printing of the report and the re-appointment of the committee, the Rev. BROOKS HERFORD opposed the motion, on the ground that the committee had really nothing to report. They had, indeed, now, nothing to do, the real missionary work of the province being more effectually done by district associations.

Rev. C. BEARD moved as an instruction to the committee that they take into consideration whether the operation of the missionary branch could be extended by the formation of a chapel building fund.

After a brief conversation this was carried.

The report of the Ministers' Salaries Committee (a committee exclusive of laymen) was read by Mr. ROBERT M. SHIPMAN, who has year after year devoted his efforts in connection with the Assembly to the advocacy of justice in the matter of ministerial remuneration. The report stated that the committee had felt that during the past year all they could do was to endeavour to influence public opinion in our congregations by articles communicated to our denominational organs, a series of which had accordingly been published in the Unitarian Herald.

As it was not proposed that the committee should be any longer continued, a vote of thanks was passed to Mr. Shipman and the other members of the committee for their services during several years.

The PRESIDENT then moved on the part of the committee certain resolutions on the subject of the propositions submitted at the last Assembly by Mr. R. D. Darbishire. Mr. Darbishire's propositions, which were widely published at the time, tended to the doing away of any actual work in connection with the Assembly, and to the abolition of the delegate system. The committee proposed that the first part was undesirable, and, with regard to the second, moved that the delegate system be retained so far as the voting for the annual election of the preacher before the Assembly, the voting on all other questions, however, to be open to all present.

Immediately after the moving and seconding of the committee's resolution, Major COPPOCK rose, and in the course of a long speech vehemently attacked the proposed compromise of the committee. He said the delegate system had never had fair play, charged the secretary (Rev. John Wright) with sending out circulars, drawn up, so as rather to discourage than encourage congregations to appoint delegates, and was proceeding to go seriatim through the congregations which had not sent delegates, making offensive imputations on the several ministers as having, in one way or another, taken care to make the system a dead letter.

Several of the ministers referred to rose and indignantly denied the truth of the speaker, and he was called to order by the chairman, the meeting generally expressing its strong sense of the impropriety of the course Major Coppock was taking. The speaker at length closed by moving that the Assembly proceed to the next business on the paper.

The motion was seconded by the Rev. W. C. SQUIRE, who, while disclaiming any sympathy with the address just made, was unwilling for the delegate system to be disturbed, and felt that to limit it to such a small part of the business as the mere voting for a preacher was virtually to do away with it.

The amendment was put and lost, and Major Coppock challenging the president's decision, it was put again, and the numbers counted with the same result.

Mr. R. D. DARBISHIRE then moved a second amendment, that the whole subject should be referred to a special committee, whom he nominated. Mr. Darbishire's amendment was accepted by the committee, and was about to be put, when Major Coppock again rose and impugned the nomination of the committee, as being almost all pledged to Mr. Darbishire's view. This was shown to be contrary to the fact, and then the resolution was carried.

The Rev. J. FREESTON moved:—"That an Educational Committee be appointed to ascertain the number and condition of our day and Sunday schools, and, if necessary, devise means by which the congregations of the Assembly may more effectually promote the cause of popular education." The resolution, however, was not seconded, the Rev. C. BEARD alone speaking on it, and contending that it was extremely undesirable for the Assembly to attempt any measure on the subject, when we were on the eve of a national system, and just as people generally were coming to the conclusion that education was one of those matters which were best attended to by men simply as citizens, and not by sects and churches. A strong resolution followed on the Irish Church, coupled with an expression of hearty sympathy with our Ulster congregations that have expressed their willingness to give up the Regium Donum in order to promote religious equality in Ireland.

The last business was a motion by the Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL:—"That a petition be signed by the chairman of this Assembly in favour of the stopping of the sale of intoxicating drinks on Sunday, and be forwarded to Mr. Bazley, M.P., for presentation to the House of Commons."—A short but animated and interesting discussion took place on this question, ending in its being carried by about thirty votes to six. The meeting then adjourned.

THE DINNER.

Shortly after four o'clock about 250 persons sat down to dinner in the Hulme Town Hall; EDWARDS BOWMAN, Esq., presided.

The CHAIRMAN, after giving a hearty welcome to the Assembly, on behalf of the Upper Brook-street congregation, proposed the usual loyal toast of "The Queen," after which he gave "Civil and Religious Liberty all the world over," to which the Rev. W. H. HERFORD responded.

The Rev. Dr. BEARD responded to the sentiment, "The Provincial Assembly." He said, in the year 1648, now 220 years ago, the first Provincial Assembly was held in Preston, and some two years earlier the first classis was formed in Manchester. They were, therefore, an ancient body of Nonconformists. But he was not quite sure that their ideal of Presbyterianism in the present corresponded to its reality in the past. Let them try to transport themselves back into the past. What would they find those Presbyterian fathers doing? Nothing? Suppose that Assembly gathered together two hundred years ago. There comes to them a report that a certain churchwarden, say at Prestwich, is unsound in doctrine—perhaps a Papist in disguise. What do they do? They issue their decree to try this man. Mark the word—to try him. Suppose he is found to be unsound in doctrine; for this time he is admonished. A second time he is accused—accused, suppose, of being inclined to Arminianism instead of Calvinism. Being found guilty, the sentence now is that he be suspended. A third time he is accused, tried, and found guilty, and now he is excommunicated, with all the terrible meaning which that word then involved. Those were the doings of the Presbyterianism of the past, from which they boasted that they were descended. Let them come down a little later, down to the time of Oliver Heywood—a man whose religion led him to give up his comfort and endanger his life, for what? for a Presbyterianism that in its corporate capacity should do nothing? No; but to preach the Gospel. He would commend to those who would do nothing, his life and the spirit of it; or, let them take the name of Richard Baxter—a man deeply versed in the whole realm of speculative philosophy and full of piety. Did he try to quench the flame? Did he say "do nothing?" Rather, said he, do everything. Is there not sin and misery around you—evil on every side? Baxter was a man of whom we may well feel proud, but he was no do-nothing man. Yet it was in the name of Presbyterianism that the spirit of "do nothing" had grown up among them, till he often felt inclined to wish that they had never known Presbyterianism. In 1825 he (Dr. Beard) entered Manchester, and found isolation and "do nothing" all around him. He tried to take up the work of the Rev. George Harris in the district, a man whom he found everywhere spoken against because he could not do nothing. He had been striving against that spirit ever since. The first provincial meeting he attended was in 1826. Mr. Peter Eckersley, who he was glad to see still with them, was present; so also was Mr. Robberds, the senior pastor at Cross-street; and Mr. Hugh Worthington, his coadjutor. There was also there the Rev. John James Taylor, aye, and S. D. Darbishire too. Did they go in for "do nothing?" No! They met for work, and thank God they had been doing work ever since, and he should have been much more pleased if at their morning meeting that day he had seen more of the same spirit. He felt that they should do not less, but more. At the bottom he believed they all loved Christ and the good of their fellow-men; but after attending these meetings for forty years, and listening to these fruitless discussions about their constitution, he felt a sense of weariness. As a Unitarian, he would ask them individually to look at the present state of society, and say whether there was not something for every one of them to do. (Applause.)

The Rev. J. PAGE-HOPPS responded to the sentiment of "the preacher and supporter of the day," proposed by Rev. G. H. Wells. He said that, with regard to Dr. Beard's eloquent address, if he read aright the intention of those to whom he alluded as the do-nothing party, as far as he could see, there was every determination to spend and to be spent for the things they believed and loved. (Hear, hear.) If they held tenaciously to their special individual ideas, it was that they might do their work all the better. For himself, he meant to join, not the do-nothing party, but the party which would do all it could for that truth which he loved. (Hear, hear.)—The Rev. C. W. ROBERDS also briefly returned thanks, after which

The Rev. WM. GASKELL rose at the call of the Chairman, to give a greeting in the name of the Assembly to Dr. Bellows. You all feel with me, he said, that there are no two nations under the sun that ought to be so closely united in the bonds of amity and friendship as our own and the great Republic on the other side of the Atlantic. (Hear, hear.) And although now and then there have been slight tiffs, which will sometimes arise even among members of the most loving families; these, I believe, have been only slight ripples on the surface, while underneath there has been a strong, deep sentiment of mutual esteem and respect. When Mr. Abbot Lawrence was the American minister in this country, I remember his telling me that, one morning as he was sitting reading his despatches, there stalked into his room, with the air of a free and independent Republican, a fine specimen of a farmer either from the state of Maine or Vermont, and seating himself down by Mr. Lawrence's side, at once began, "Well, sir, what do you think of the old country?" "Nay, sir," said Mr. L., "what do you think of it?" "Why, sir," said he, with a slap of his brawny hand on Mr. L.'s shoulder that made his back tingle for hours after, "I feel proud of my ancestors!" And I am sure, looking to the United States and their growing greatness, may we say, "We are proud of our off-spring." (Applause.) Many are the ties which bind us in a community of interest, and many the ties which should serve to keep us united in affection.

"We speak the tongue
Which Shakspeare spoke; the faith and morals hold Which Milton held."

Our literature is their literature; our laws, in great measure, their laws; those old British patriots whose names are still watchwords through our land, are uttered beyond the Atlantic with honour and reverence, hardly less true; and this Assembly carries us back in a direct line almost to those noble Puritan sires,

"Who spread their sails on oceans blue,
For lands their fathers never knew,
Rather than pray like slaves."

United by ties like these, and able, while working in harmony, to do so much for the world's welfare, a sin and a shame would it be if we were to let anything ever introduce dissension and strife between us. (Applause.) Nothing tends more to bind the two nations together than that friendly intercourse which has been so mightily accelerated and increased by the power of steam. Week by week the number is growing of those who know, and respect, and love one another on both sides of the Atlantic. (Hear, hear.) I have already not a few friends in the States dear to me, who have broken bread with me and mine; and I am truly glad to add another to them in the person of our honoured guest, Dr. Bellows, of New York. (Hear, hear.) I need not tell those of you who have read his "Re-statement of Christian doctrine" what a thoughtful and eloquent preacher he is. Nor need I say to those who have seen his letters to the Liberal Christian, or even such passages as have appeared from them in the Unitarian Herald, how gracefully and charmingly he can write. Dr. Bellows is not only highly valued throughout all the free churches of America, but esteemed and honoured far beyond them for the great services which he rendered, as president of the Sanitary Commission, to the sick and the wounded during the late sad civil strife. (Applause.) Even before that, I remember when I had the pleasure of receiving Mrs. Stowe as a guest, whilst guarding herself against agreement with him in opinion, she spoke admiringly of him both as a preacher and as a man. In proposing his health, I know I may assure him, on your behalf, how heartily we welcome him amongst us, and how sincerely we thank him for the good services he is likely to do by his visit, and at the same time request him to carry back from this Assembly the friendliest feelings and the kindest wishes we can form for those who are building up Free Churches like our own in his native land. (Loud applause.)

The Rev. Dr. BELLOW, in reply, said it was with feelings of extreme gratitude and sensibility that he received, in the name of an American citizen, the kind expression of sympathy and fraternal feeling that their president of the day had been kind enough to express towards his native land. He had been long enough away from it to have become peculiarly susceptible in regard to it. On the soil of the mother of that land, and particularly in the district where he was, he could not but feel a special sensibility; for he remembered how, during the sad and terrible struggle in which his country had been engaged, and under circumstances of great pecuniary and mercantile distress and trouble, the great working class of Lancashire, following the instincts of their own noble hearts, stood by them, and how often they had to feel that they were wiser, perhaps, in their uncultured instincts than many professedly more cultured ones, who took altogether a different view. Leaving that topic, he desired now to say a word or two about the relation which they felt to exist between them as Unitarian Christians. He could assure them their influence was not unfelt in America. He could not tell them with how much interest they read their literature—and the interest which they took in their general proceedings it would be impossible to exaggerate. Their only regret was that, with the exception of the few books which they now and then received, they were able to acquire so small a knowledge of their pulpits; for, after all, it must be humbly confessed, that they had not got rid of the habit of looking up to England, and had never ceased to feel a profound respect for all they were doing. He was not able as yet to form a very definite opinion in regard to the condition in which they (the English Unitarians) were, but one thing appeared manifest to him, and that was that in England they had the same little habit of flinging stones at each other as was displayed in America. He had thought it might be an American peculiarity, and that, as children, they might not yet have attained to their majority; but he was inclined now to think that they were nearly fledged and able to fly charmingly. (Laughter, and applause.) All seemed to be in beautiful proportion. When they came together in their meetings they seemed to be just as mischievously bent as they in America did; but after all they never allowed the effects to last for more than a very few moments. He had listened with profound interest to their proceedings that day, and had noticed that the little cow-skin applied did not seem to mean a very great deal. There were amongst them the same two great parties—always ready to shake their fists in each others' faces, and equally ready to shake hands on the spot. (Laughter.) One party, particularly busies itself in caring for personal liberty; the other is anxious about it too, but thinks it is now able to take care of itself, and that there is quite as much as they can do to cope with the evils everywhere about them—in endeavouring to promote the salvation of human souls. (Hear, hear.) They must not understand him now as taking sides with either party, for he did not wish to interfere. He wished to say that he recognised fully the importance of that body amongst them who were naturally of a sanguine temperament, and thought themselves called upon to gird their swords on their thighs in defence of the great principles of religious liberty; but without saying one word against their spirit, temper, or dutifulness in this matter, or their anxiety to take care of the liberty of coming generations, he wished to observe that there were others who felt concerned about organising for more immediate, effectual, practical results. And so it seemed to be also in England. In America they had hit upon a mode of feeding their wandering sheep upon the mountains with just such food as they could bear; and that was the peculiar source of whatever inspiration had come upon them during the last ten or fifteen years. There was a time when they made no progress, and were occupied in defending each one his own standing-ground; but that time was barren of results; but since they had determined to unite themselves, and thereby strengthen their forces, they had taken a rapid onward march, and had seen, day by day, the best practical results. (Applause.) It might be that through too much organising they might fall back; but by so organising their individual forces as to respect the personal liberty of each, they got a new power for good. Ever since, they had had twenty times the moving power, twenty times the progressive force, twenty times the results, and twenty times the ability to take their right place in a Christian community. (Loud applause.) And he thought they had got it without the sacrifice of a single iota of any one's liberty; without closing any door of usefulness, or the excision of one single man. (Hear, hear.) They were determined to retain their liberty and their organisation too. They could use their freedom and zeal for good objects, and at the same time retain their individuality. He thought they in England could do the same that they had done in America. We want, said Dr. Bellows, to get at the hearts of the people—of those who need pure bread and water of life. (Hear, hear.) We are not content to be a mere dilettante sect. (Hear, hear.) And it is because we have taken our place side by side with the other religious bodies, contending with them for influence upon the minds of the American people, that we feel the results of our steps. And we want you to stand by our side, and to fight with us, as we are doing, against the error and sin about us. (Hear, hear.) You have it in your power to do so, by ceasing to waste your time and energies, and devoting them, when associated, to great plans and methods. Shoulder to shoulder, you will gain a policy by which you can march on through these open lands of England, and come up in course of time with a rich harvest of human hearts and souls as the result of your campaign. (Loud and continued applause.)

The Rev. CHARLES BEARD responded to "Our educational institutions."

The Rev. R. BROOK ASPLAND spoke to the sentiment, "The British and Foreign Unitarian Association." After alluding to his former connection with the province, which extended over a period of twenty-seven years, and during which all his family ties originated, and expressing the pleasure he felt in again meeting Dr. Beard and Mr. Gaskell, his old college friends, after an absence from the province of ten years, he went on to say that he was conscious of the difficulty which the Association had met with in endeavouring to win the support of this district. Partly this arose from the time at which their annual meeting was held. He knew the difficulty of tempting any of their ministers to London during Whit-week, as he was aware that that week was mainly devoted to their schools. He thought, however, that the Association ought to receive a larger amount of sympathy. Its object was to promote the cause of Unitarianism, or liberal Christianity. (Hear, hear.) To him these terms were synonymous, and they had steadily refused to bind themselves down by any definitions, being determined to conduct the institution upon the most catholic principles. On one side they had had rocks, and on the other whirlpools, but they had succeeded in passing them in safety, and now they had the pleasure of welcoming all as associates. (Hear, hear.) And he wished to add that they were workers—it was a hard-working Association,—for they cared not to talk, and he thought they were now in a way for doing a larger work than ever before. (Hear, hear.) The Association would be glad to render help wherever it could be shown there was a good honest work being done, and that if latterly in London they had discouraged the wearisome discussions which had at one time weakened them, it had been because they had laid themselves out so much work to do that they had had no time to quarrel. (Applause.) The meeting was then brought to a close, about eight o'clock.

THE BOSTON ANNIVERSARIES.

Our American friends had their anniversary gatherings the week beginning May 24. On the Sunday the pulpits of the leading chapels were filled by ministers from distant parts. On Monday several meetings for conference and prayer were held.

The forty-third annual meeting of the American Unitarian Association was held in Boston, on Tuesday, May 26th, and was attended by a large number of the members and friends of the society. The meeting was called to order at about half past nine o'clock, by HENRY P. KIDDER, one of the vice-presidents of the association, and a fervent and impressive prayer offered by Rev. Dr. Osgood, of New York. The reports of the Treasurer and Executive Committee were then submitted in print, and therefore not read at length, but brief extracts from the latter were read by Rev. Chas. Lowe, the secretary.

It appeared that during the past year more than usual pains have been taken to make known the work which was being done by the Association. We subjoin the more important portions of the report under its various heads:—

Home Missionary Work.—During the year fifty-seven societies have been aided by the funds of the Association. Preaching has been supplied by the Association (through its regular agents or missionaries, or else through ministers temporarily employed for such special service) in one hundred and sixteen places where no Unitarian society existed, and in many of which Unitarian preaching had never before been heard. Forty-two ministers had been employed by the Association, for longer or shorter periods, in this missionary service.

Foreign Mission.—The India Mission has been continued as usual under Rev. C. H. A. Dall, whose faithful and efficient service has merited the grateful acknowledgment of the Association, and has been attended, it is believed, with most gratifying results.

Theological Education.—The committee have expended during the year 1,675 dollars in aid of the three theological schools (Cambridge, Meadville, and Antioch).

Publications.—During the year the following books have been published:—"Re-statements of Christian Doctrine" (new edition), by Dr. Bellows. Norton's "Evidences of the Genuineness of the Gospels." "The Life of the Saviour," by Henry Ware, jun. Greenwood's "The Lives of the Apostles," and "Sermons for Children." "Hymn and Tune Book, for the Church and the Home, and Services for Congregational Worship;" and "Homeward Path" (new edition), by Miss C. M. Haven.

They have also now in press a new translation of the whole New Testament, by the Rev. G. R. Noyes, D.D.; and an abridged edition of the Hymn and Tune Book, for the use of vestry and conference meetings. They have issued during the year twenty-two new tracts, and have distributed gratuitously three hundred and twelve thousand tracts and monthly journals. Sets of our publications have been given to thirty-eight public libraries, situated in various parts of the country, on condition of the books being so placed as to be freely accessible to all who might choose to read them.

Ladies' Commission on Sunday-school Books.—The Ladies' Commission on Sunday-school books has continued its labours, in connection with this Association, with gratifying results. Since its organisation, a little more than two years ago, some twenty-four hundred books have been read, of which six hundred and ninety-six are recommended as more or less adapted for the Sunday-schools of our denomination. A full catalogue was printed last year.

Co-operation with the African Methodist Episcopal Church.—In response to an appeal from persons connected with the African Methodist Episcopal Church, the committee were led to consider the expediency of conducting, in co-operation with that body, the work on behalf of the coloured population at the South. This African Methodist Church, by its position, its abundant supply of ministers, and its large and increasing capabilities for effective working, possessed certain opportunities that we had not, and that, by co-operation with this body, a given sum of money could do more good than if expended upon our own agencies. The committee felt that, under the circumstances, they were acting out the spirit of the denomination by regarding the matter of sectarian aggrandisement wholly subordinate to the desire of benefiting this people. Of course they were careful, while not wishing to enforce the Unitarian belief, also to insure that the money given shall not be employed in ways to encourage narrowness, or to teach what seem to us errors. The co-operation will be confined to certain specified points of clearly recognised useful effort, on what is a common ground of Christian service. The report entered into various other particulars of their agencies in different States.

The Treasurer's statement showed that the receipts during the last year amounted to $91,765, and the expenditure to $90,182.

After the election of the Executive Committee, addresses were delivered by the Rev. Dr. NATHANS, lately a Jewish Rabbi, formerly of Hungary, introduced as now a Christian brother, who urged the Association to translate into other languages the finest thoughts of Channing and Parker; by the Rev. J. F. W. WARR, of Baltimore, who recommended the publication of a paraphrased English Bible, without the divisions of chapters and verses; and by the Rev. J. RABSOCK, of Lancaster.

Paraphrase Bible.—The Rev. Mr. WARR then offered the following resolutions:—1. "That the American Unitarian Association, in annual meeting assembled, would recommend to the executive board to inquire into the possibility of publishing a paraphrased New Testament." 2. "That the American Unitarian Association, assembled in annual meeting, would approve the consolidation of the Sunday-school Society with the organisation of the Association."

A long discussion took place on the first of these resolutions, from which it appeared that the best paraphrased Testaments are out of print, and ultimately the question was then put, and the resolution adopted.

The Rev. Mr. CAPEN moved the adoption of Mr. Ware's second resolution respecting Sunday schools.

The Rev. Dr. GANNETT objected to the consolidation of the Sunday-school Society with the Unitarian Association, while conceding that the publication of books for schools might be done through or by the help of the Association. He suggested that "consolidation" should be changed to "co-operation," which was adopted; and the resolution as amended was passed.

On Tuesday afternoon the Boston Ministerial Association, on behalf of their churches, entertained the friends from a distance in the vestry of the Church of the Unity.

The Unitarian Association celebrated its forty-third anniversary, at the Music Hall, on Tuesday evening, May 26. A grand audience filled the hall and galleries, and the platform was occupied by many gentlemen, clerical and lay, prominent and active in the denomination.

Addresses were delivered by H. P. KIDDER, Esq., chairman; the Rev. C. H. BRIGHAM, of Ann Arbor, Michigan; the Rev. Dr. DEWEY; the Rev. J. F. MOORS, of Greenfield; the Rev. C. C. EVERETT, of Bangor; the Rev. R. SHIPPAN, and the Rev. ROBERT COLLYER, of Chicago.

The Doxology was then sung, the benediction pronounced by the Rev. Dr. PALFREY, of Belfast, Maine, and the great audience separated.

Wednesday began with conference and prayer meetings, lead by Dr. Gannett; among others, "Father Taylor" being present.

Wednesday afternoon the mass meeting of the Sunday schools was held.

On Thursday evening the great "Unitarian Festival" took place in the Music Hall, which was crowded by a magnificent audience.

MANCHESTER NEW COLLEGE, LONDON.

THE Annual Examination of this important institution, to which the free churches of England have long been and are under such great obligations, was held in University Hall, Gordon Square, London, on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday last. Among those present at some part or other of the proceedings were Samuel Robinson, Esq., President; Rev. J. J. Tayler, B.A., Principal; Professors James and Russell Martineau; Rev. W. Gaskell, M.A., and Rev. J. H. Thom, Visitors; Mr. Thos. Ashton, Treasurer; Mr. R. D. Darbishire, B.A., and Rev. C. Beard, B.A., Secretaries; Mr. R. Aspsden, Assistant Secretary; Revs. H. W. Bellows, D.D., of New York; T. Madge, Thos. Sadler, Ph.D., L. Lewis, H. Ierson, M.A., W. H. Channing, S. A. Steinthal, R. C. Jones, B.A., J. E. Carpenter, M.A., J. E. Odgers, M.A., R. Shoen, M.A., J. D. H. Smyth, J. Dare, B.A., A. W. Worthington, B.A., T. L. Marshall, W. J. Smyth; Messrs. Samuel Sharpe, Mark Phillips, E. Potter, M.P., R. N. Phillips, M.P., Rupert Potter, B.A., E. Enfield, C. Twamley, J. Murch, J. S. Ainsworth, M.A., E. Bowman, M.A., James Heywood, M.A., B. Heape, Professor Evans (Michigan), W. J. Lamport, A. Tozer, W. N. Coupland.

The following programme will show the subjects and course of the examination:

MONDAY.

Christian Truths and Evidences (Doctrines)
Mental Philosophy
Sermon (Mr. F. H. JONES) from Amos viii., 12

WEDNESDAY.

Practical Theology (The Church)
Senior Greek: Plato
Ethics
Sermon (Mr. C. T. POYNTING) from 1 Cor. xv., 19
Undergraduate Greek: Euripides and Xenophon
Interpretation of the New Testament (Galatians, Colossians, Philippians, &c.)
Hebrew (Senior): Psalms
Sermon (Mr. J. RUSSELL) from Matt. v., 43

At the close of the examination, a considerable number of ladies, as well as a few other gentlemen besides those above mentioned, assembled in the Common Hall, when the Rev. J. H. Thom, one of the Visitors, delivered an excellent address to the students, of which we hope to give a report next week.

Last night there was to be a Valedictory Service, for the dedication to the ministry of the retiring students, conducted by the Revs. J. J. Tayler, James Martineau, and J. H. Thom.

We cannot conclude this short report without expressing our regret that so few, comparatively, of our friends in London testify, by their presence on these occasions, their interest in an institution which is placed in the midst of them, and on the success of which, they must be conscious, the maintenance of the character which our ministers have long held for their theological attainments must in so large a measure depend.

INTELLIGENCE.

ABERDEEN.—There was a special service on Sunday morning last for the purpose of formally welcoming two of the elder scholars as members of the congregation. The chapel was tastefully decorated with flowers, and the scholars, to the number of 49, were present, and several of their parents and friends. A bible was presented to each of the two new members by the teachers of the school, and a Martineau's hymn-book by the chapel committee.

ADELAIDE, SOUTH AUSTRALIA.—The annual social meeting of the members of the Unitarian Christian Church took place on the 7th of April. There was a large attendance. The meeting was held at Hine's Assembly Rooms, and the evening was spent very pleasantly and profitably. Some beautiful music was well performed by the ladies and by Mr. Oelmann. Mr. W. Kay, J.P., gave a select reading, and the meeting was entertained by Messrs. J. H. Clark, A. M. Woods, H. M. Martin, A. Vaughan, M. S. Clark, S. E. Robert, T. Duffield, and by Mrs. Proctor in a dramatic sketch.

ASTLEY.—On the 14th inst., the Rev. John Wright, of Bury, preached two sermons in aid of the Sunday school, when the collections amounted to £13. 2s.

BRISTOL.—On Tuesday, the 16th inst., from 40 to 50 of the teachers of the Lewin's Mead Sunday Schools, accompanied by the ministers of Lewin's Mead Chapel and Oakfield Road Church, had their annual excursion. They went to Portishead. On Thursday, the 18th inst., 280 of the children of the Domestic Mission Sunday School and of St. James's Back Free School were kindly entertained by Miss Hill, at the residence of Mr. Commissioner Hill. Miss Carpenter and Mr. and Mrs. H. Thomas were present in the afternoon. On Friday, the 19th, the elder boys connected with the Lewin's Mead Free School, accompanied by Mr. Herbert, Miss Coates, and the Revs. A. N. Blatchford and J. E. Carpenter, had an excursion to Portishead by rail. All these excursions passed off very pleasantly.

DUDLEY.—The annual examination of Parsons' Schools, connected with the Unitarian congregation in this town, was held on Thursday and Friday last week. The examination was conducted by the Rev. M. Gibson, before a large number of visitors, chiefly the parents of the children, and the result was most satisfactory in both schools, showing the efficiency of the master, Mr. Mellwrath, and the mistress, Mrs. Timings. Mr. Gibson, in his address at the close of the examination, and before he distributed the prizes, 41 in number, stated his impression of the examination, how pleasant it was, and altogether satisfactory, and also how greatly the schools were appreciated in the town, which was evident from the striking fact that there are on the list of applications for admission 260 boys and girls. 155 is the full number in the schools.

SYDNEY, AUSTRALIA.—The annual picnic of the Sydney Unitarian Church came off on Good Friday last, and was in every respect a most successful reunion of the friends of liberal Christianity in this corner of the world. The day was brilliantly fine, and a steamer having been chartered for the trip, about 350 members and friends of the church landed at Cremorne Gardens, on the north shore of Port Jackson, returning to Sydney at sunset, having enjoyed themselves to a degree which will long be remembered. On landing cheers were given for the Queen, for the Governor, Earl Belmore, and for the Rev. James Pillars, minister of the church.

MISS CARPENTER'S JOURNEY TO INDIA.

To the Editors.—I am quite aware that your readers have many claims on them for pecuniary help, and as an appeal is now being made for a fund in aid of a Unitarian mission to India, in which I fully sympathise, I am reluctant to trespass on the kindness and benevolence of our body. Yet I cannot but hope for some help from them in the effort I am about to make to commence the training of teachers for Hindu women, in Bombay, on the Government principle of non-interference with religious or social customs.

It is well known that until lately there has been much opposition to the education of the female sex in India. The missionaries have done all in their power to promote it, but their means are, of course, limited, and under any circumstances they cannot reach the bulk of the people. On my recent visit to the country, I found that a strong desire had sprung up among the enlightened natives to have education extended to those who exercise so important an influence in their homes. Efforts have been made among the Hindus and Parsis themselves in many parts to promote this;—in Bombay and some other places in that Presidency this has been the case for more than fifteen years. There are, however, at present no trained female teachers to be obtained for these schools, and the fact of the necessary exclusive employment of pundits effectually prevents the desired improvement in feminine training. The enlightened natives earnestly desire to obtain trained female teachers for their girls' schools, if they can have them without any danger of attempts being made to proselytise or to interfere with their domestic arrangements. In my recent work, "Six months in India" (Longman's) I have stated what efforts have been made by the natives to obtain from the Government the establishment of a Female Normal Training School, and the regret of the inhabitants of Bombay that, owing to their present commercial depression, they cannot comply with the requirements of the Government, that they should themselves furnish half the expense. To voluntary effort in England they must therefore look for help. As any teachers who go out will necessarily require some time to learn the vernacular and the habits of the country before they can be of much use, and as it will be desirable to delay as little as possible, I purpose going out at the end of September or early in October, taking with me some certificated teachers as training mistresses, and any educated ladies who may be willing to go out to prepare themselves for the work. Though this is a purely voluntary plan, yet I should strictly adhere to the Government principle of non-interference, and, as far as possible, to the scheme of a school which I laid before the Indian Government and the Secretary of State for India. I believe that this plan would receive the co-operation and warm sympathy of the natives. Did my pecuniary means allow, I should much prefer doing this at my own charge, but as they are very limited, and will not suffice for much more than my own personal expenses, I am compelled to ask for the help of those who feel the importance of the object. To carry out the scheme effectively, there ought to be one or two certificated teachers whose passages out must be paid, and to whom a salary must be guaranteed, and the maintenance and instruction of these and the students in training must be provided. The trustees of the Gilchrist Educational Fund have kindly contributed £250 to the object, considering it calculated to promote the advancement of female education in India. Subscriptions and donations may be sent to myself, addressed as before; or to Messrs. Carpenter and Westley, 24, Regent-street, London, who have kindly consented to receive them. Any further information I shall be happy to afford, and remain, yours sincerely,

MARY CARPENTER.

THE EAST ANGLIAN CHRISTIAN UNION.

To the Editors.—Will you kindly permit me to make a short statement, not so much to correct your report of the late meeting of the East Anglian Christian Union, as to prevent a false impression which your introductory remarks are likely, I fear, to leave upon the minds of strangers.

You say the Association seems "rather vague and undecided in its character," because, while "declared by the president, at the opening of the afternoon meeting, to have for its object 'to promote closer Christian union among the congregations of the district, irrespective of all denominational distinctions,' the whole affair seems gradually to have edged off, as the day wore on, into an ordinary district Association of Unitarians."

Now the truth is simply what the president said. The East Anglian Christian Union has a constitution sufficiently wide to admit every congregation in the district, of which the trust deeds and ecclesiastical usages confess, or may in future confess, that each generation best knows its own needs, and permit its constituent members at any given time to select a minister not because he professes a traditional or stereotyped creed, whether Unitarian or Trinitarian, but because he awakens and answers natural sympathies, the freshest and most vital, in their own souls. It welcomes all such congregations without any further restriction, and aims to unite them more closely for mutual help in cultivating Christian holiness and learning Christian truth. If any other status for the society was assumed at Great Yarmouth, the assumption violated its fundamental principles.

I do not think, however, that any such violation occurred. I cannot see it, as you appear to do, either in the fact that Mr. Kirkus, who does not call himself a Unitarian, exhorted those who do to a more earnest and hopeful expression of their convictions; or in the presence of Mr. Marshall, inasmuch as his professed object was not to pledge the Christian Union to the doctrinal position of the society he represented, but simply to express the sympathy of the latter with the aims and efforts of the former, which were distinctly stated to the "British and Foreign" when the deputation was suggested, and before it was either appointed or welcomed.

I know not whether the observations in the Herald were meant as a sneer; and I do know that some few of us in East Anglia have engaged in a very difficult experiment; but I know, also, that neither sneers nor difficulties will make us forsake the broad platform we have chosen, and in choosing which we think we have only done our duty as Providence reveals it to us: neither more nor less. I am, gentlemen, yours truly, Norwich, June 22, 1868. J. D. HIRST SMYTH.

[Certainly no sneer was intended, but the straightforward pointing out of palpable inconsistency. What the president said was (as by the Inquirer's report, which is not impugned; not that "the E.A. Union has a constitution sufficiently wide to admit every congregation in the district" (this is right enough, but is only what is the case with the majority of our existing district Associations); but, that it "had for its object to promote closer union among the congregations of the district, irrespective of all denominational distinctions"—a very different thing, the meaning of which was illustrated by the statement that all the congregations had been equally invited. If all this means anything it means that the E. A. Union aims to be a general undenominational Association, in which all sects shall meet on equal terms; and in view of this we repeat that we are puzzled by finding that the speakers all dwell on Unitarianism; that Mr. Kirkus alluded to special views as held by "the members of this Union;" that a formal greeting was given to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association—it would have been quite as much in character, more so, to have given it to the Congregational Union; and that the sentiment was proposed, "The Unitarian congregation of Yarmouth;" while Rev. R. Shelley opened the evening meeting by delineating "the principles of Unitarianism in a most impartial and intelligible manner." We place ourselves in the position of the orthodox ministers invited, and who doubtless kept aloof to see whether this strange new Association was really as catholic as it looked, or whether it was, as they would naturally suspect, a Unitarian Association under a big name; and we cannot help feeling that their misgivings were not altogether groundless. The hands are the hands of Esau, but the voice is unmistakably that of Jacob!—Ed. U. H.]

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

The Roman Catholic Archbishop Leahy and Bishop Derry have addressed a letter to Lord Mayo, the Secretary for Ireland, throwing upon the Government the responsibility of having broken off the negotiations concerning a charter for a Roman Catholic University.

On the 29th ult., which is the Festival of St. Peter, the Pope was to announce the departure from Rome of the special couriers who are to convey to the various Catholic Bishops of Christendom the Papal missives convoking them for the Ecumenical Council which his Holiness, jam certes eundi, intends to hold on the 8th of December, 1869.

The Nonconformist says that among the gentlemen just admitted to priest's orders by the Bishop of London is the Rev. Henry Christopherson, formerly an Independent minister. Since his ordination to the Diaconate in the Church of England he has held the curacy of St. Clement's, Notting-hill. He has now resigned this, and is engaged for the present to assist at St. Paul's, Camden-hill, Arch-deacon Sinclair having given the title for priest's orders.

There appears to be some difficulty in finding a successor to Dr. Atlay as vicar of Leeds. The post was offered last week to the Rev. C. Lloyd, vicar of Chalfont St. Giles, rural dean, and chaplain to the Bishop of Oxford, who, after visiting the town, declined. It is now offered to the Rev. J. R. Woodford, vicar of Kempshott, and also chaplain to the Bishop of Oxford.

It is stated from Rome that a proposal to raise a battalion of 1,200 men in the United States for the Pontifical army has been abandoned, as the American Roman Catholic Bishops have been informed by the Washington Government that it would be illegal.

The question of upper-class education is being discussed in Methodist circles. Some are for instituting a Methodist University, with a hospital for medical students, and other schemes associated with it, while on the other hand it is contended that greater advantages would be gained by the inauguration of a college at Oxford so soon as the Universities are thrown open to all denominations, so far as to allow of non-subscribers to the Thirtynine Articles obtaining the higher degrees.

Illustrations of the drawing together of various sects are coming under our notice every day. The Rev. T. Baugh, minister of the Baptist Chapel in Islington, is invited to the Congregational Church, Burngreave, Sheffield, not considering baptism a sine quâ non to communion or membership.

Only a quarter of a century ago a clear, neat map was published in the Baptist Magazine, showing the Baptist chapels in the metropolitan district. The perspicuity of the area is not marred by much type, the eye can readily distinguish the few-and-far-between localities with well-known names. From Stratford to Chelsea, on the north side of the Thames, 27 chapels are enumerated, and from Battersea to New Cross 16 on the south side. The grand total of 43 appears insignificant when compared with that of 166 shown by the handbook to pertain to a slightly larger circumference in the present year.

What is called "a civil funeral," unattended with religious rites, has just taken place at Brussels. The deceased was Mme. Van Meenen, a lady of eighty-eight, the widow of a judge. The ceremonies were conducted by an association called the "Free Thought Society," and we are told that a procession of more than 200 persons, "almost all belonging to what may be called the élite of intelligent society at Brussels," followed the remains. M. Goffin, the president of the Free Thought Society, delivered a funeral oration, which we are assured was "plein de cœur et d'élévation de sentiment."

Lord Shaftesbury has introduced a bill into the House of Lords regulating clerical vestments. It provides, inter alia, that every minister, when "saying the prayers in any church," shall wear a surplice with sleeves, and shall be at liberty to wear over the surplice, as at present, a plain black silk scarf. If he be a university graduate, he may also wear the university hood; and if he be not a graduate, he may then, if he think fit, wear "some decent tippet of black." The object of the bill is to secure uniformity in the performance of church worship, and it would prohibit ornaments, incense, and lighted candles. Should it pass into a statute, for a breach of either of its provisions the Bishop shall have power to inhibit the offender from saying the public prayers for three months.

The Dean of Canterbury lately wrote an article in the Contemporary Review, which has excited a good deal of notice in clerical circles, in which he advocated fraternisation on the part of the Church of England with the unestablished Protestant Churches at home, rather than with the Roman and Oriental communions. He has now been giving a practical illustration of his views by presiding at the hundredth anniversary of Cheshunt College, founded by Lady Huntingdon, for the training of her preachers, but which is now a college for the education of Congregationalist ministers, presided over by the Rev. H. R. Reynolds. The celebration commenced with Divine service in the college chapel, which was crowded to excess. Prayers were read (the Church of England Liturgy) by the Rev. Newman Hall, of Surrey Chapel, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. Thomas Binney, not from the pulpit, but from a temporary platform erected outside, opening into the chapel on a level with the galleries, and commanding the quadrangle, which was more densely crowded than even the chapel. After the service, luncheon was served in a tent in the college grounds to more than 600 guests. Dean Alford presided. Amongst others present were the Venerable Arch-deacon Sandford, Professor Thorold Rogers, the Rev. Harry Jones, incumbent of St. Luke's, Berwick-street; the Rev. John Oakley, incumbent of St. Saviour's, Islington; the Rev. C. E. Mayo, of Cheshunt; the Rev. F. Bannister, curate of Stanstead Abbots, near Ware; Sir Fowell Buxton, Mr. T. Chambers, M.P., Mr. Cheetham, M.P., and Mr. McCullagh Torrens, M.P. Among the Nonconformist ministers present were the Revs. T. Binney, H. Allon, A. Raleigh, Newman Hall, and Dr. Mullens. The Dean of Canterbury, at a later period of the day, presented the prizes and certificates to the students; and in doing so, spoke of the importance of a classical education, declaring that the man who was unable to read the New Testament in the language in which it was given to men was not fit to be a Christian teacher, and urging that, as the controversies of the time related chiefly to the Old Testament scriptures, a knowledge of Hebrew was also necessary.

The irrepressible Murphy has published the following advertisement in the Birmingham Gazette, knowing tolerably well that the authorities of that city, who care nothing whatever about the details of his father's death, and who do care about preserving the public peace, will not grant him the use of the Town Hall:—

I, William Murphy, am prepared, on condition that the authorities do grant me the use of the Town Hall, and that Dr. Ullathorne, Father O'Sullivan, Father Sherlock, or any of the Romish priests, meet me on the platform, to give the full account of my father's death, which shall be corroborated by my mother and brothers; and I further challenge any of the priests to disprove my statements. Admission to the meeting, 1s. each. The profits to be handed over to the hospitals of the town.

A despatch from Berlin announces that Queen Victoria sent to the King of Prussia, at Worms, a telegram requesting him to congratulate the committee on the completion of the Luther Memorial, and adding, "Protestant England cordially sympathises with an occasion which unites the Protestant Princes and peoples of Germany." This will be a nice pill for those Ritualist romancers who are always abusing the name of Protestantism, and who lately have been affirming the Reformers to be villains!

A line from Jaffa to Jerusalem was surveyed by a German engineer in 1863 and 1864, and strongly supported by the whole missionary body in Palestine. The Ottoman Government, however, refused to give the guarantee demanded of them of 8 per cent., having found out that the capital was expected to be raised in £5 shares from each believer in the millennium in Europe and America, the engineer and projector and his colleagues believing that the great sign of the millennium is to be a railway to Jerusalem, so as to take up the multitudes on that occasion. The Ottoman Government, afraid of embroilment with such fanatics, has preferred to make a common road, and the railway is in abeyance until the Turks acquire more confidence in the millennium.

The Feast of Dedication was observed on Thursday at St. Matthias', Stoke Newington. The celebrations were at seven, eight, and eleven. The Pall Mall Gazette states that the Rev. C. J. Le Geyt, the incumbent, issued the following very objectionable announcement:—"The incumbent begs to express the hope that strangers who have breakfasted and done the Standard or Times will abstain from communicating at the late celebration of the festival."

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

It is hard times for Mr. Disraeli just at present! To catch the Church he has thrown the nation overboard, and now the Church is far from cordial. The fact is, Churchmen seem to be not quite sure how deep his ecclesiastical principles go, and whether they might not be thrown overboard, if need were, like his old Tory principles. It is refreshing to find the High Church Guardian criticising his late speech in this fashion:

"He is bound, therefore, to trace the connection between Mr. Gladstone's Irish policy and English disestablishment according to some definite law of results. If he has resolved to make 'Church and State' the electioneering cry of the autumn, he ought to prove his opponents to be hostile to their union, not merely by implication and remote consequence, but out of their own mouths. No one has ridiculed so happily as Mr. Disraeli himself the unfairness and insincerity of a 'cry.' It is the more incumbent on him to show in an argumentative way what is the principle which he rallies his adherents to support, and in what respects that principle has been, or is, impugned by politicians on the other side. This he did not succeed in doing, if indeed he attempted it, at the Merchant Taylors' feast. His rhetoric was happy; but it was only rhetoric after all. It did not so much as suggest an Irish policy: it did not deal with the arguments which have been advanced in support of the Irish policy of his rival. Nor did it at all help us to discover what, in its author's opinion, is now the effect and meaning of the alliance between Church and State which he so loudly eulogised. The one act of his own Government which has had an important bearing on this subject has certainly produced no favourable impression on the minds of Churchmen. The relations between Church and State expressed in the Duke of Buckingham's first Natal despatch would be, in the opinion of nine Churchmen out of ten, an intolerable wrong."

Two correspondents, Dr. Cromwell and "A Unitarian Minister," have letters in the Christian World correcting the statement that the Unitarians deny that "Atonement is reconciliation of man to God." The editor subjoins a note, saying that it was a "slip of the pen made by the writer of the article, which makes him say the very opposite of that which he intended. Of course the writer knew properly well that it is the doctrine of the reconciliation of God to man which the Unitarians deny, and not the converse opinion."

The Freeman has the following:—

"Amongst the election news we note the declarations of one candidate, or rather of a gentleman who had been invited to become one for Bedford, which we should like to think the illustration, or the precursor, of many changes of opinion similar to that which it describes. Mr. James Howard, of the well-known firm of agricultural implement makers, had been invited by 300 Conservatives to contest the representation of Bedford. He replies that, though a traditional Tory, the link which united him with the party was his belief that a large extension of the franchise was fraught with danger to the country. This link broken, he feels released from his allegiance. He had recently visited America, and the visit, he says, 'contributed much to this conviction, and satisfied him that the fears he entertained of democracy were groundless. In the States manhood suffrage had long been established, but neither anarchy nor disrespect for law had followed in its wake. He found a country in which public order, wise and just laws, and good government existed, and his former prejudices against an extension of the suffrage no longer continued.' He now objects to the ratapaying clauses, desires a wider scheme of redistribution, and, always has been, an advocate of the ballot, is in favour of the disestablishment of the Irish Church, and 'thinks it will be a happy day for the Church of England when she is released from the shackles of the State.' He is in favour of 'perfect religious equality,' throwing open the Universities, abolition of the purchase system in the army, complete reform in the law of tenure in Ireland, and of election of working men as members of Parliament. What an answer to a Conservative requisition! America seems to be a wonderful school for educating politicians. We remember Lord Morpeth, as he then was termed, came home from it at heart a 'Liberationist.'"

The Daily News thinks the contrast between responsible and irresponsible legislation came out very clearly in the great Irish Church debate in the House of Lords. Their lordships have no fear of constituencies before their eyes, and are inclined to legislate rather from their own inward light than from any reflection from the opinion of the outer world. There is something melancholy in the obstructive attitude of the House of Lords. It is a rising tide against which they are contending, not one of the storms of fate; and it is not the potent wand of omnipotent justice with which they bid it defiance, but Mrs. Partington's mop.

The Telegraph observes that when the Episcopal Church of Canada was disendowed and disestablished, the Tory party uttered exactly the same kind of denunciation that they express now. The prediction was confidently made, that such a revolutionary change would endanger private property, and sap the foundations of public peace. Yet the very opposite results have followed. Every sign of discontent has disappeared from Canada, and the last letter which Mr. D'Arcy M'Gee wrote to the Secretary for the Colonies contained the declaration that Canada was profoundly loyal to the mother country because the mother country had listened to Canada's just claims. Would any member of the Upper House re-enact the law which gave supremacy and State endowments to one of the Canadian sects? The idea is too monstrous to be even mooted. It is somewhat difficult to understand how it was ever seriously entertained by eminent statesmen. A generation hence we may be equally at a loss to understand how such statesmen could ever have believed the existence of the Irish Establishment to be bound up with the peace and prosperity of Ireland.

OLD TESTAMENT CHAPTERS FOR THE SUNDAY SCHOOL.—X.

SUBJECT: The belief in a Future State that was held by the nations living round the Jews.

Read Ezekiel, chap. xxxii. 17—32. The whole chapter is a prophecy against Egypt that the sword of the King of Babylon shall come upon it. The verses quoted above give a description of the gloomy future that awaits the Egyptians and the rest of the nation's enemies when they shall be overthrown. Here are picturesquely described "the famous nations" cast down into the world below. Assyria is there with all her company; their graves are set in the back of the pit; they are all of them slain, fallen by the sword; they who caused a terror of themselves in the land of the living. Persia is there, and Meshach, or the Muscovites; Tubal and the warriors who have gone down to hell with their weapons of war, and have laid their swords under their heads. There is Edom with her kings and all her princes, the Sidonians put to shame away from their might, and Pharaoh himself with all his multitude.

Read also from Isaiah, chap. xiv. 3—20, part of the burden of Babylon. Here it is the Babylonians who are in the dark world of the pit. Belshazzar, king of Babylon, is to die. Hell from beneath shall be moved for him to meet his coming. The departed spirits shall be raised up for him, even all the chief ones of the earth. The kings of the nations shall rise up from their thrones; they shall speak to him. All they that see him shall gaze upon him and say, "Is this the man that made the earth to tremble, that did shake kingdoms?"

In reading these passages, it may be observed that the Hebrew writers have not included the Jews among the inhabitants of the gloomy pit. The whole picture is taken from the mythology of their eastern neighbours, and was part of a set of opinions very much disliked by the Jews. In these two instances their writers have adopted the imagery in order to paint a hateful fate for their foreign invaders.

REVIEW.

"An Open Bible." A Popular Lecture. By the Rev. J. E. Vaux, M.A. Third thousand. London, 1868.

WHEN knives fall out, honest men come by their own. When a particular kingdom, be it of politics or polemics, is divided against itself, outsiders generally profit by the division. When the two schools of orthodoxy—the school of authority and the school of mingled authority and reason—fall to disputing, heterodoxy (if consistent Protestantism must be so called) is sure to be strengthened by their recriminatory confessions. When the worship of the Church and the worship of the Book have refuted each other, they leave the field clear for the worship of conscience—the worship of the Living God.

Thus Ritualism, in itself a step backwards, is a means of ultimate progress. In advocating Purgatory and Prayers for the Dead, it does much to bring before men's minds the horrible incredibility of an eternal hell. In trying to frighten orthodox Protestants into the acceptance of the Church's authority, it points out to them the impossibility of supporting their favourite doctrines by any fair interpretation of Scripture. And it gives a general blow to the current theories of Bibliolaters.

The able little pamphlet before us endeavours to vindicate Catholicism from the charge of hostility to the circulation of Bibles, and urges that their indisputable increase at the period of the Reformation was due to "the invention of the printing press rather than the labours of the Reformers." The author points out that Christ wrote nothing, and gave no command to write; and that the books of the New Testament are not so many treatises on Christian doctrine—as some seem to fancy—but simply works written for some special object of the moment, and with some special class or person in view. That a Bible was so far from being looked upon in the early ages as a necessity, that the earliest book of the New Testament was not written till nearly a quarter of a century after Christ's ascension; and the latest not until after the end of the first century. That "there is no trace of a collection of apostolic writings, or the formation of a New Testament canon, being attempted in the apostolic age." "Even now, we do not possess all that the Apostles wrote. Two of St. Paul's epistles—one to the Corinthians and one to the Laodiceans—were lost in very early days of the church. Nor do we hear that they or their immediate successors took any steps to provide all churches with accurate copies of the apostolic writings."

"How do you know that the Book, which you call the Bible, is the inspired, written Word of God? You go into a shop and purchase a book which the title page informs you has been 'translated out of the original tongues by His Majesty's special command.' Below will be the name of the Queen's printer, or that of the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, or of the British and Foreign Bible Society; and over the leaf a dedicatory letter to 'the Most High and Mighty Prince James, by the grace of God, King of Great Britain, France, and Ireland,' containing some fulsome adulation of that 'bright occidental star, Queen Elizabeth of happy memory,' the brightness of whose memory, by the way, has been a little blown upon since then. Without disrespect to any of these persons or societies, it must be allowed that, even taken all together, they do not furnish us with any very satisfactory imprimatur. What we want to know is, that this Book contains the written Word of God. The Bible is made up of a number of detached portions; how can you be sure that each one was certainly written under the inspiration of the Holy Ghost? And further, how can you be sure that no really inspired book has been omitted? For instance, St. Paul (1 Cor.) quotes a book known to the learned under the title of 'The Revelation of Elias.' Why was this not preserved in the Old Testament canon? Again (Eph. v. 14) the same apostle quotes a passage from some lost religious document, prefacing the quotation with the usual formula, 'Wherefore he saith.' Again, St. Jude, in one short epistle quotes (verse 9) from 'The Anabasis of Moses,' and (verse 14) from 'The Book of Enoch.' How is it these do not form a part of our present Scriptures?"

"Again, as I have already remarked, at least two epistles were written by St. Paul, which are not in the New Testament. St. Barnabas, as everybody knows, wrote an epistle, which in the earliest ages was read in churches. Now St. Barnabas is not only called in Holy Scripture an 'Apostle,' but is expressly said also to have been 'full of the Holy Ghost.' If any writing, therefore, could reasonably be supposed to be inspired, it would be that which came from his pen; why does it not form a part of the Sacred Volume? The same question may be asked respecting the 1st Epistle of St. Clement to the Corinthians, and of the Shepherd of Hermas, of both which books the early Christian writers speak in the highest praise, and both of which were read in the services of the Church in primitive times. Again, there were many spurious Gospels circulated at a very early period. How came it that these were rejected? How happened it that one book was taken and another book was left? How do you account for the fact that now all Christendom has one uniform Bible? Scripture cannot prove itself, nor does the New Testament bear testimony to its own inspiration. The authors never tell us what they thought of their own writings."

The tract concludes with a lengthy quotation from the Rev. J. M. Rodwell, to show that "there is scarce any phrase in the whole compass of theology more commonly misunderstood or misused" than the Word of God, and that it "cannot by any possibility mean, in Holy Scripture itself, the written Word of God." He insists, too, that γραφη, whether used in the singular or plural,

"Always refers to the writings of the Old Testament, known to the Jews as Torah, Nevim, Kethubim, i.e., the law, prophets, and historical books, but never to the writings of the New Testament, much less to the Bible as a whole. The well-known text of St. Paul to Timothy, 'All Scripture is given by inspiration of God,' cannot refer to the books of the New Testament, as there is no evidence that any one of the Gospels was written at the time when St. Paul penned that epistle in (perhaps) the year 63 or 64, while the canon of the New Testament was not closed till the death of St. John. Graphé occurs fifty-one times in the New Testament.

"It is clear that the writers of the New Testament nowhere use the expression 'Word of God' of the Bible as a whole, or as a written rule of faith, and that the expression 'Word of God,' as used in the New Testament, can only mean the great Christian tradition, the history of the Founder of the faith and of His doctrines, as handed down by Himself to His first disciples, and by them to us, and to which the writings of our present Scriptures lend a most important, but still only an incidental testimony. It would have been quite possible for Christianity to have come down to us, as it is, without any written books at all."

Our readers may remember that Mr. Vaux, in a former work on the Doctrine of the Atonement, conceded (p. 21) that

"The fathers and doctors of the Church . . . seem to have had, comparatively speaking, very little definite theory about the atonement at all, beyond the fact that it was, in some sort, a sacrifice."

And (p. 37) that the theory of Socinus, as to the life and death of Christ, "in point of morality, certainly has much the advantage over either the Lutheran or Calvinistic systems."

CYRIL.

CONCERNING CHRISTIAN PEOPLE.

I don't mean Unitarians, nor Church-of-England people, nor even Baptists, Wesleyans, or any "ans" or "isms," but just Christian people; all who profess "and call themselves Christian," be they of any or no sect soever. There are a great many kinds of Christian people, some readily discoverable, others hid under shady places and requiring much search after. Perhaps the best are least readily found. They who make the most noise in the world are often those who are the least like Christ; and conversely they who are not called Christian are frequently found to be living a most Christ-like life, whether in moral perfectness or philanthropic usefulness.

There is my friend Jones, of the Make-a-noise-in-the-world Society. Jones is an active, bustling man. He is said to be a "most useful" member of society; attends all parish meetings, committee meetings, and religious meetings; is a tract distributor, district visitor, secretary to clothing club, coal club, and penny savings' bank, &c., &c. Jones never goes to chapel; he can't, for he has an "appointment" every Sunday. He seldom goes to prayer-meeting for a like reason. Jones is in business, a married man with a large family. He ought to be in his business, for there is much competition around him. He ought to be, I say; he is not; how can he? Has he not religious duties to attend to? Are they not of the first importance, even though his wife be gradually going down to her grave through the over-much care and anxiety entailed upon her by her husband's absence from business? Ay, Jones forgets that a man's religious life—his Christian life—comprises his home duties, and that in so far as he neglects those he falls short of being a Christian. The "Gazette" awaits him—"These things do not trouble me; if my business suffer through the Lord's work, He will see me safely through my trials." Jones, my friend, the apostle Paul did not neglect his tent-making because he was an apostle, and the Master in no wise would have you neglect one duty for the sake of what you think a higher and more sacred, self-chosen vocation.

My friend Gideon is also a man of business, a class leader, secretary to temperance society, and other societies and bodies of religion-workers. Gideon prides himself upon his many offices—not upon the work he does for them. In truth, he does little besides accepting the posts. Gideon does meet his class, and receive their experience, giving in turn his counsel and help. He also preaches the Word from Sunday to Sunday, and across his counter daily to such as will hear it. But 'tis in a "sort of a fashion," to use a Dorset idiom. For my part, I don't understand him. His teaching is not Wesleyan, not orthodoxy, nor heterodoxy, but so very comforting!

George Edmunds is a better fellow, is more liberal-minded, has a larger knowledge of human nature, and somewhat larger sympathies with the wants of the age. George is a Wesleyan local preacher, but is not too well liked. Wherefore? Because his sermons have not enough of the "blood" in them. The truth must be said—George is imbued with the heresy of the day à la George Macdonald. But George is a good Christian man, lives a straightforward honest life, loves God and his neighbours, and hopes to go home because he believes in God, because of Jesus, and lives a life of devotedness to his service.

Johnson lives in a back court. He goes to chapel regularly; his children go to Sunday school and to chapel. Johnson is not a member of the society, is not a preacher, nor tract distributor. "Johnson is a poor sort of a Christian. He does nothing; hardly pays his seat rent." Johnson, my friend, has hard work to be a Christian. His temptations, his tendencies to evil, derived from drunken, sensual parents, leave him little time for so-called Christian work. The little time he has he devotes to his children, and to quiet homely conversation with a friend or two. The day cometh when this man's Christian work shall be revealed.

There are certain other of my friends who live a Christian life in their own peculiar fashion. They are not much alike. They differ in all save this—that they love God, love Christ, and wish to live a godly life. They have no bond of union worth the name, for they have not learned how much they are alike, "how little difference there really is between the Christian sects." They quarrel and snarl one with the other, each refusing to the other the name he cherishes for himself. The more the pity!

How shall we recognise Christian people? By this—that they call each other names. In sad truth, that appears to be at this hour the distinguishing feature which is most clearly defined. We really must change all this. How? By learning each for himself that Christians are not this or that sect, but individual members of the one great family in heaven and earth. Let us once feel that Jones is brother to Johnson, that Mr. Martineau and Mr. Punsdon are members with Christ in the family of God, and our petty quarrels and little differences will be swallowed up or swept away by the waters of that river whose streams make glad the city of our God, the life-giving river of the Eternal Love.

LANCASHIRE MARTYRS.

In his "Lancashire and Cheshire" just published, Mr. Thomas Baines gives the following account of some of those who laid down their lives for their Protestantism in the reign of Queen Mary:

"John Rogers, a Lancashire man by birth, was the first martyr in this persecution. He was educated at Cambridge, and was one of the first scholars of the age, having assisted in translating the Bible into English in the reign of Henry VIII. He was tried on a charge of heresy before a court composed of the bishops of Winchester, London, Durham, Salisbury, Norwich, and Carlisle, in company with Hooper, bishop of Gloucester, and was sentenced to be burnt at the stake, after being first degraded from the priestly office. When brought before Bonner, Bishop of London, to be degraded, he begged permission to take leave of his wife; but was refused, with the brutal taunt, that being a priest he could not have a wife. When brought to the stake he was offered his life if he would recant his opinions, but he firmly refused to do so, and died with dauntless courage, being burnt to ashes in Smithfield.

"The next Lancashire martyr was John Bradford, born at Manchester. In his early life he had filled the office of secretary to Sir John Harrington, treasurer of Henry VIII. and Edward VI. but subsequently he became a minister of religion, and a steady adherent of the reformed faith. He rose to the rank of Prebendary of St. Paul's, but preached often in his native county. He was tried along with Dr. Taylor for denying the doctrine of transubstantiation, and was sentenced to be burnt as a heretic. His life was spared for some time, in the hope that he would recant; but far from doing so, he seized that last opportunity of addressing letters to the people of the different towns of Lancashire and Cheshire, urging them to be true to the faith which they had adopted. He was burnt in Smithfield, in the month of July, 1555, along with a youth of nineteen, named John Leese.

"A third Lancashire martyr who lost his life in the Marian persecution was George Marsh, a native of the parish of Dean, a poor curate and an instructor of youth. Having become an object of suspicion, he surrendered himself to the Earl of Derby, at Latham House, and was by him subjected to various examinations, in the course of which he addressed the Earl with the following reproof:—'It is strange that your lordship, being one of the honourable council of the late King Edward, consenting and agreeing to acts concerning faith towards God and religion, should so soon after consent to put poor men to a shameful death for embracing the same religion.' After several attempts to shake his firmness, Marsh was committed to Lancaster Castle, and confined in irons with common felons. After being confined some time at Lancaster, he was removed to Chester, where he was tried before the bishop on the charge of having preached most heretically and blasphemously in the parishes of Dean, Bury, and Eccles, as well as in other parishes of the bishop's diocese, not only against the Pope's authority, but against the Church of Rome, the holy mass, the sacrament of the altar, and the articles of the Romish faith. To these charges Marsh answered that he had preached neither heresy nor blasphemy, but only the doctrines sanctioned by authority of the king and his Parliament in the reign of Edward VI. With regard to the Pope, however, he did not hesitate to declare that the Bishop of Rome ought to exercise no more authority in England than the Archbishop of Canterbury ought to exercise at Rome. The Bishop of Chester, on hearing this, stigmatised the prisoner as 'a most damnable, irreclaimable, and unpardonable heretic,' and proceeded to pronounce sentence of death upon him as a heretic. For some time he was confined in the Northgate prison at Chester, and on the 4th April, 1555, he was led out to the place of execution at Spittal, Boughton, within the liberties of the city. When brought to the stake, a desperate attempt was made to rescue him by the people, headed by Sheriff Cooper; but they were beaten off by the other sheriff and his retainers, and in the end George Marsh was added to the martyrs whose blood truly proved to be the seed of the church."

INDIVIDUALISM.

It has been often said that the great difficulty which hinders, among Unitarians, the union which is strength, is our too intense individualism—by which we suppose is meant an individualism not balanced and supplemented as it should be by wise, modest, and reverent consideration for the judgments of others. We believe this is truly the great difficulty to which, if we would succeed as a church, we must seriously direct our attention. Much has been said about our proneness, as a body, to self-study. Well, we need to carry this self-study a little farther and really understand ourselves; go down to the essential principle of individualism which makes us what we are, determines the whole cast of our theology, and separates us from so large a portion of the Christian world; and then go on to see how this principle has to be exercised, in order to enable us to attain to the noblest, largest form of character.

Individualism is the trust of the individual in his own conscience to reveal to him what is right, and his own reason to bring him to what is true. And it is because men have this trust in the guidances within that they become or remain Unitarians, and not that they have the trust because they are Unitarians. Many minds seem, through constitution or education, to be without this trust. That conscience tells them an act is holy, or that reason assures them a proposition is true, is not to them a sufficient satisfaction that the one is really holy and the other really true. They need something above and beyond, and must look to an external authority, an infallible book or infallible church, before they can rest in contented faith.

To this class resting on external authority all the orthodox sects belong. And we need go no farther than our own columns, week by week recording what the churches are doing and what is saying on church matters, in order to see to what absurdities this slight to the individual conscience and reason, and this trust in external authority leads men, and in what an unamiable light it permits them to present both themselves and their religion. We see weak, narrow-minded men placing themselves under the shadow of their supposed infallible authority, and forthwith assuming infallibility and giving themselves all the airs of Popes—God's vicegerents upon earth. They utter their own poor, narrow dogmas as if they were oracles of Heaven. They denounce, or pity, or pray for those who differ from them as if they were the undoubted enemies of God.

These exhibitions are sad enough, and yet if any of the other sects were to watch ourselves, we fear they could point out but too many examples in which our opposite principle, individualism, leads Unitarians to faults quite as great, and to exhibitions of character quite as unamiable, though of a different character.

The truth is, too many Unitarians exercise their individualism without observing the conditions which properly belong to it.

Trust in the individual reason and conscience does not mean, with the wise individualist, trust that his reason has attained for him all of truth, that his conscience has grasped for him all of right. Nor is it a trust that he can of himself, and in a moment, as it were, by a flash discover the true and the good. The trust is more negative than positive—a trust that whatever is true must be able to stand the test of reason—that whatever is right must be able to stand the test of conscience. To work out truth and right, he knows his own powers can help him but a little way. He turns with gratitude to the stores of wisdom worked out in the past, to the Scriptures, to the lives and thoughts of the great and wise, to the common experience and consciousness of our race. He listens not only with patience, but with a certain reverence to the thoughts which every sincere and earnest man may offer him. Not that he regards all this as authority to which he is slavishly to bow, making his judgment blind; but as, at least, treasures of valuable suggestion, to which he is to apply the test of his own individual reason and conscience to discover which are the jewels of eternal truth, and which the pebbles, mistaken for truth, of human error.

But there are too many individualists who are not wise, and whom trust in their individual faculties leads to self-conceit. They mistake the trust in what their nature is capable of, for trust in the opinions which they have already formed. Where the wise man is content to have faith that after calm and patient attention his faculties are competent to lead him to truth, they seem to fancy their minds are capable of forming a judgment on the most difficult questions, as if by a single flash. Such unwise individualists are the misfortune of our church. Occasionally they are found in the pulpit, speaking in their flippant way, as if they had taken the length and breadth and depth of great subjects, which exercise the deepest and most reverent minds among us. Now they are found in the pew, heard at the very door of the church, uttering their scornful and self-complacent criticisms on the services to which they have just listened. It may have been one of the profoundest minds among us who has been uttering thoughts which have made some souls thrill as if they had heard a prophet's voice. No matter, the hearer pronounces it "all bosh," and wonders "what the fellow has been driving at"—never remembering that the defect may be in himself—in his own incapacity or inattention. At most Unitarian meetings these unwise individualists are found springing up the moment a proposition has been uttered, prepared to confute it before they have had time to consider it, or even to understand its drift. They waste the time of the meeting talking around some accident or detail of the subject; turn away attention from the main principle, and hinder the more thoughtful and modest minds from speaking.

What we want in our Unitarian individualists is a wiser and more modest estimate of themselves in relation to others—a reverence for other minds, and a recognition of the fact that they may learn from others that all the wisdom and all the mental power in the world are not with themselves. We want them to learn when it is more befitting them to take the place of the disciple than the critic, and to cherish a disposition to see in the views of their co-religionists the great common principles in which they can agree rather than the mere accidental details about which they may be tempted to wrangle.

THE CULTIVATION OF THE HABIT OF GIVING.

[Communicated: No. V., by the Ministers' Salaries Committee.]

WHEN Unitarians are spoken of as cold and apathetic, and their doctrinal system as the "North Pole of Christianity," they are naturally prone to give to both the allegations a prompt denial. And undoubtedly in respect to the inherent capacities of their views for the fostering of a warm and devout, if not a demonstrative state of mind, they can emphatically claim for them an unqualified confidence and a high regard.

It is universally admitted that, considering the numbers of the denomination, Unitarians, whether ministers or laymen, contribute their fair share of sympathy, pecuniary means, and personal co-operation, to all those efforts for the promotion of education, social improvement, and political reform, which are so pre-eminently characteristic of the age. At the boards of our atheneums and mechanics' institutions, as founders and directors of reading-rooms and other means of intellectual recreation, as guardians of the poor, members of our town councils, occupants of the bench of justice, and representatives in Parliament, they are generally found amongst the most intelligent, earnest, and laborious.

This is neither the place nor the time for ascertaining (were it possible) why the same generous activity should fail, in the service of those agencies and institutions which are destined to propagate religious truth, and cultivate the devotional affections. Unfortunately, no argument is needed to establish the fact. The same men who respond with alacrity to the call of the general weal, seem slow to appreciate the claims of their particular church, and unwilling to admit that its service has an inalienable right to a considerable share of their efforts and their cares.

It is possible enough that some radical defect in the early training of our fellow-worshippers may account for this singular state of things. The surrender of a portion of either our time or our means is in great measure a habit, more or less fixed in proportion to the extent of early influences and training. In the majority of Unitarian families, the influence of parental example in some departments of public service is sensibly felt; but in very few does the maintenance of our denominational position hold anything like the same prominence. It is possible enough that, especially in the homes of our wealthier members, the suggestion of sacrifice on its behalf is seldom if ever heard. Literature, politics, social ameliorations, may form the staple-matter of conversation; but sympathy with specific agencies for religious progress is rarely expressed, and the subtle but powerful influence of example in this direction seldom experienced by the young.

In this paper, however, we are mainly concerned with that particular direction of private effort which consists in the appropriation of pecuniary aid to purposes of piety and benevolence. Now it is notorious that amongst orthodox bodies the young are led, in a variety of ways, to cultivate a strong personal interest in denominational aims. Every large organisation has its juvenile branches and departments, with complex machinery adapted skilfully and even artfully to captivate youthful attention, conciliate sympathy, and ensure support. There are juvenile missions, juvenile Bible societies, juvenile associations of various kinds, in almost every one of the thousand sects into which the religious life of our country is sub-divided. Philanthropic societies have not failed to take a hint so suggestive; and it is astonishing to observe the large amounts contributed by juvenile life-boat associations and juvenile temperance unions. These become, in fact, a species of moral savings banks. The budding efforts of the child are thus sedulously cultivated, the habit of benevolent frugality fostered, and the tender twig inclined in the direction of the future tree.

It may with little qualification be asserted that in the Unitarian body there is not even an approximation to such means of educating the laity in the giving habit, as are absolutely essential to the true life either of the individual or of the church. As a rule, our young people are rarely called upon to devote a portion of their pecuniary means to the sustentation of their public religious interests. The father pays his pew-rent when, whether quarterly or otherwise, the collector calls for it, just as he meets the demands of the poor-rate collector. So much accommodation in church or chapel for so much money; and the stipulated obligation is discharged with more or less of business-like punctuality. Look through the subscription lists of our schools, our Ministries to the Poor, our organisations for the spread of our principles, and you will find the contributions only of the heads of families. Young men, arrived at the privileged period of independent incomes; young women, enjoying their regular allowances,—when are they taught the duty, or trained to the practice, of devoting a portion of their resources to the service of religion? That, they consider, is the sole duty of the parent—a duty in which they have no share, and which entails on them no responsibility. As a rule, they recognise few claims save those imposed by custom, society, and fashion, in the provision of personal adornment, amusement, and pleasure.

In all this a radical reform is urgently needed. Our hard-worked ministers will still remain unrecompensed, our institutions languid, and our church life weak, until those who, in the course of nature, will assume the position and responsibilities of their fathers, are taught the duty of devoting, from their early years, a portion of their resources to the maintenance of their church.

It is possible enough that the whole theory of the duty of giving is narrow and degraded as compared with the practice of earlier and devout times. There are abundant evidences in the evangelical records of the fact, that the sacrifice of personal means was an essential primal principle of the early church. Undoubtedly such was the case throughout the Jewish history. The priesthood and the temple with all its rites and ceremonies, were based on the injunction "to bring an offering." It is thought by many a mistake of modern days rudely to sever the practice of sacrifice from that of worship. In the older times they invariably went hand in hand, and each reflected dignity and value on the other. Now we worship at one time, and at quite another, and under purely secular influences, contribute to its support. Formerly the offering testified to the sincerity of the worship, and the worship ennobled and sanctified the gift. In these respects our customs are in marked contrast. Instead of the unrestrained and free-will offering, contributed amidst the hallowing associations of the temple and the exalting influence of worship, we make a bargain for a pew in the same spirit as that in which we take a house; and the claims of the chapelwarden are met in the hard, legal way, in which those of the landlord are recognised and discharged.

However this may be, it is clear that some decided change must be effected in the general tone of our younger people in respect to their sense of personal obligation to religious agencies. They should be led to sanctify their accession to independent means, however small these may be, by a willing devotion of some portion of them to the service of the temple. There is no other time of their life so favourable as this to the formation of the habit of conscientious giving. A little kindly counsel is all they require, together with the influence of parental example. They should be taught that as religion is a strictly personal, individual thing, so should be the services offered in its behalf; that the sacrifice must be alike a willing and a true one; that the surrender of mere superfluities is not sufficient; and that to meet the full demands of duty and satisfy the claims of an enlightened conscience, they should not offer "of that which costs them nothing."

The application of this principle to the question of ministerial remuneration is sufficiently obvious. A laity thus trained to a habit of conscientious giving, would not look with indifference on any matter which vitally affected their religious interests. It has been shown in the preceding papers of this series how manifestly the Unitarian body has been guilty of serious laches in respect to their ministers' salaries, and how much has to be done to repair the injustice of past generations. It should never be forgotten that, by the peculiar nature of his position, the minister is debarred from those direct methods of securing a due recompense for his labours which other—especially non-professional men—enjoy. Etiquette has, in many cases, the power of law. Surely it should be the prompt and generous duty of the layman to supply, by unasked justice, the compensations which the minister is conventionally denied the liberty to demand.

FIRESIDE READINGS.

WHY DO I LIVE?

Why do I live? The years roll on,
And millions sink in death,
Falling as fall the withered leaves,
Swept by the north wind's breath.
Why do I live? 'Tis not because
My mortal life is firm;
It trembles constantly above
Corruption and the worm.
Why do I live? I look in vain
To find the loved and lost.
They who with me life's course began
Long since the dark stream crossed.
'Tis not because exalted worth
Has purchased a reprieve;
For many nobler, purer ones
Have died, while still I live.
Why do I live? Ah! let me think:
How solemn is this life;
What endless meaning it enwraps,
With mighty issues rife.
I live to live when I am dead,
To mingle in the strife,
To throw within the balances
A false or upright life.
I live to be a leaden weight
For truthful men to bear,
Or, bend my nobler powers with theirs,
Their toilsome work to share.
I live to yield to low desires,
To serve the law of sin,
Or, kindle with a purer flame,
And nobler victories win.
I live to die, but die to live
When thrones and kingdoms cease,
To mourn the harvest past and gone,
Or chant the song of peace.
I live to act—my day is short—
Right onward rolls my sun;
When it shall set in shades of night,
Lord, may my work be done.
The golden moments, as they pass,
Fill up the warp of life;
The germs of endless growth are they,
With joy or sorrow rife.
I live—'tis not a choice of mine,
A heritage inborn—
I only may give colouring
To that which must be worn.
God of my life! my wisdom fails—
Life is a fearful thing;
Oh, lead me till my ear shall catch
The songs the seraphs sing.
Lead me, my Father, till my feet
Shall walk the golden street,
And there with deathless joys and loves
My ransomed soul shall meet.

F. DAY.

THE DUOMO OF MONTE ROTONDO.

THE lively authoress of "From Rome to Mentana," visiting the places in the neighbourhood of the latter shortly after the battle there, made her way to the old city of Monte Rotondo, in a convent of which had been Garibaldi's head quarters; and the following is her description, a little abridged, of the state in which she found the Duomo, or cathedral:

The doors were closed, and going round a back lane, we knocked at a side entrance; a priest, evidently in a great state of alarm, popped his head out of the window.

Our guide said, "The Duomo door is locked; can we come in this way?"

"Oh, yes, yes," said the priest; "let the noble Signor and Signora see the saccayo (sack) there has been."

We entered, and ascended a most narrow, rickety wooden staircase; the priest met us at the top, and asked us into what had been the room of a gentleman. He welcomed us with the most polished courtesy, gracefully apologising for the state of things around him, and his inability to give us a better reception—saying, as he held up his threadbare soutane, "This, Signor and Signora, is all the clothes I have left in the world—this, and the shoes and stockings I have on." Then, turning up his sleeves and showing a coarse peasant's shirt, he added, "and this is borrowed, and I have no pocket-handkerchief."

He took us down into the church. It was a large and handsome one, with carved oak seats in the choir, and presented a sad scene of desecration. The holy water stoups had been dashed to pieces, the font destroyed; the side chapel, in which the Host was reserved, had its altar all broken by bayonets. The Host had been placed on the point of one, and carried in mock procession. There is a strange legend that it was found a week after in the pocket of a dead Garibaldian; the pieces were collected by a Zouave who was searching the bodies of the dead; they were brought to the vicar, and that was all they had to communicate with for several days, for the church would have to be re-consecrated before it could be used, so that no celebration of mass could take place; and all the holy oil for baptism having been spilt, and likewise at Mentana, no babe could be baptised nearer than Rome.

Being joined by the vicar himself and the sacristan, who apologised for their strange dress on the ground that they had been hiding twenty-four hours in a cave, they told us they had something more dreadful to show us than the vestments which they had displayed all in strips and filthy dirty, and took us upstairs through a long passage filled with the wreck of church ornaments, among which was the Christmas bambino—the little doll which is always brought out at that time only. It was dressed in swaddling clothes of blue and silver, but headless; and the sacristan placed it in my arms, with a bitter lamentation over its sad fate.

We at last arrived in a sort of loft, and there a priest, disguised in a grey shooting coat and trousers, dashed into a closet, and wheeled out a hideous lay figure the size of life, with very little dress. "Oh, la bellissima," they cried and wept; it was their Madonna—their miraculous Madonna!

Apparently struck by the fact that she was but lightly clothed, he dashed back again and brought out a very coarse, dirty crinoline, which he popped on, and then wept again—"All that is left of our bellissima Madonna's most gorgeous robes!"

I suffered severely in trying not to laugh, and one of my friends remarked to me quietly, "A Madonna in crinoline is somewhat of an anachronism."

"Look, look at her," said the canon; "she was lovely! fetch her head," addressing the sacristan severely. "Yes, yes, we have saved that—a cruel Garibaldian had it on a bayonet. I offered him a hundred litres of wine; he took it, and gave me back the lovely head of our most beautiful Madonna!" This was almost too much for our gravity, though we could not but appreciate the unselfishness with which he had sacrificed his worldly goods for the sake of his religion.

OBSTA PRINCIPIS.

THE following little story, from "Byeways in Palestine," illustrates the wisdom of checking wrong at the outset:

An old Sheikh of Yabneh had five sons. When very old, a complaint was brought to him that some one had stolen a cock; so he called together his sons and ordered them all to search for the cock; but it was not found. Some time afterwards it was represented to him that a sheep was stolen; he then commanded his sons to go and search for the cock. They replied, "O our father, it is not a cock but a sheep that is stolen;" but he persisted in his command, and they did what they well could, but without success. After that he was told that a cow was missing; he again commanded his sons to look after the cock. They thinking he had lost his senses cried, "Salem 'akalak ya Abuna (May God perfect thy understanding, O our father), it is not a cock but a cow that is missing." "Go look for the cock," persisted the old man; they obeyed, but this time again without success. People wondered and thought him in a merestage of dotage. Next came the news that a man was killed. The father pertinaciously adhered to his first injunction, and ordered his sons to look for the cock. Again they returned without finding it, and in the end it came to pass that the killing of the man brought on a blood feud with his relations; the factions of several villages took up the case for revenge, and the whole town was destroyed, and lay long in a state of desolation, for want of sufficient zeal in discovering and punishing the first offence, the stealing of the cock, which thus became the root of all the rest.

NEWCHURCH.—About 70 members of the Acerrington Sunday-school Union met at this place on Saturday, June 20th. The Rev. J. K. Smith presided, and the Rev. J. W. Rodgers, of Burnley, read a paper on "What should Sunday schools aim at?" in which he urged that the religious and moral faculties should be cultivated, and showed how to give a religious tone to secular instruction. In the discussion which followed Messrs. Farn, Turner, Mills, Hargreaves, Rawstrone, Ashworth, Aiken, McLaughlin, Holt, and Rev. T. Harrison took part. A cordial vote of thanks was passed to Mr. Rodgers for his paper, and one also to the chairman for presiding.

MANCHESTER NEW COLLEGE, LONDON.

REV. J. H. THOM'S ADDRESS.

THE following is a very full report of the address given by Mr. Thom at the close of the examinations on Wednesday afternoon the 24th ult:

Gentlemen, the Theological Students of Manchester New College,—After a three days' continuous examination, closing, though far from representing, the toil of a long session, I think I shall best supply what belongs to this time if I briefly set before you the great end you have in view, which may be pursued alike in your seasons of tension, when your studies are all directed by others; and in your seasons of relaxation, when you naturally take to the pastures on which, with the discipline you have received, you can range for yourselves with intellectual delight and spiritual sympathy.

You are here to acquire an initiation into that learning, which is most needful to instruct and to equip those higher gifts of wisdom and of insight, which alone can enable you to be Ministers of God to your fellow-men. I use that old prophetic expression as the only one that is adequate to express the office you aspire to fill, knowing at the same time that, attaching to no one profession, it is an office which in his place and measure God requires every man to fill. It can be yours pre-eminently, only in as far as—by your privilege of deliverance from other cares—to you may belong pre-eminently the Divine power of spiritual mediation. As theology is queen of the sciences, so the minister of religion is placed by society in an equal and independent relation to the various callings of men, that he may be able to discern the Divine operation in them all without himself being under the bent and blinds of any. This is the theory—the idea; how far it falls short of being perfected in practice I need not say. We know that nothing can save men from exposure to the temptations incident to the functions they discharge; but let us at least understand what a wretched perversion it is of the purposes of man and God when an office designed to deliver from the narrowing power of castes and special callings becomes itself the narrowest and least human of them all.

The primary, the deepest qualifications of this office are not of an intellectual nature, but in the felt nearness of God to your own heart and conscience. Remember, however, the vast difference there is between the possession of spiritual experience and the gift of its conveyance; that the peculiar service men will require from you, without which your office will be unfilled, your lives a weary and oppressive failure, is not that you should be vicariously religious, for all men should be religious and in equal measures; but that when by privilege of your place, of your instruction, of your secured and consecrated time, you have mused before God, in the untroubled light your knowledge gives, till the fire burns, you should be able so to speak as to kindle like fire in the seeking, desiring hearts of earnest men. Spirituality is the aim of every man alike, whatever be his calling; but in addition you aim, if by the grace of God it is in you, at prophetic speech and spiritual interpretation, the power of displaying God, of bringing Him to discernment, in His works and in His ways, in the order of nature and within the life of men. No intensity of spirituality, alone and of itself, without knowledge, without culture, will confer this faculty of teaching; for if you are to reveal God to other men, you must know the steps and follow the methods of His self-revealing—how He has lived in union with our humanity, how He shows Himself, as we are able to bear it, to the unfolding spirit, from the uncorrupted child to the chastened saint—the ways of His own approaches to the soul in nature and in history—until a Son was found who could receive Him face to face, and be what he received.

There is no kind of learning, using the word in its largest sense, that is not instrumental to the perception, and, through the perception, to the communication of God. There is the symbolism of nature in its æsthetic and in its scientific aspects. No great teacher of religion can be without this sensibility—cut off from this medium of personal intercourse with the spirit that lives in Creation. Why are not we able, like our Master, the great Minister of God, to speak parables of nature? Why does not the spiritual significance of the aspects and processes of the universe, of all common things, come as easily to us as it did to Him? I know that these natural organs of spiritual discernment and communion, like every other, are according to the measure of the gift of God; but they are living powers in all, and all may strengthen them by converse with the exalted minds in which they have existed with something of the clearness and directness of organs of sense—with the great poets of all ages—with the psalmists and the prophets—and pre-eminently with Christ. In learning this language, let the natural faculty be trained and quickened only by His greatest interpreters, whose reality makes itself felt, who tell what they have seen, and speak what they do know. Catch up no borrowed and second-hand expressions through which God has not spoken to yourselves.

Of all that learning which can be definitely taught, the most available results for the religious teacher are not so much in deposits of knowledge as in the instruments furnished with light, preserved from ignorance and error, instructed in facts, disciplined, and supplied with the needful aids for the recognition of God in history, in Scripture, in the life of nations. For the perfecting of these instruments knowledge and learning are indispensable, else we lose the vantage ground of all that God has done with man. Yet they are the living instruments themselves, not the knowledge that equips them, that can arrive at any fresh understanding of God either in the concrete life we have to deal with, or in the records of His teaching. The true religious scholar is not he who knows what other men can teach, but he who has learned by aid of this to track God in His own ways.

Indeed, in these days it is one of the noblest offices of a true learning to deliver us from the tyranny of learning, from servitude to the shell of an erudition in whose name and pretensions—

"Blind authority beats with his staff the child who would have led him."

In nothing does a generous learning more delight than when it comes to the aid of our most common yet deepest wants, our most universal instincts, and subverts the work of God in the natural life of man. It is a genuine learning that, against the menaces and mutterings of masters in Israel, authorises us to live as we are moved by the Divine Spirit in our being; whilst, limited as severally we are in range and insight, it extends to us the instructions of the past as helps, suggestions, warnings, enlargements. Learning is thus the best ally of the spiritual freedom wherewith God has made us free. We are children of the All-perfect Spirit, and there are progressive growths of man's conceptions of God, of man's understanding of Christ; and a misdirected learning has been stereotyping the formulas of one or more of those stages as if they were absolute and final. A presumptuous erudition is occupied with the authoritative expression, as though men possessed in it the last perfection of religious knowledge; a true learning, by all the help that man can give to man, clears the mirror that is to receive, illumines the eye that is to see. It is a pretentious and arrogant learning that has so long been making God in the image of man; it is a modest and true learning that is more and more to help man to be in the image of God. Learning, and the most legitimate exercise of our spiritual freedom, cannot be separated. Without learning a man has only his own life and experience, without means of understanding them, not knowing his place and continuity, as though the past had never been. Without freedom, without a fresh spring and growth of conscious being, learning is but a bundle of traditions, tied together by some string of chronology or system—not the feeder, but the suppresser of life.

Freedom, indeed, at least intellectual freedom, is not itself an end. It has its end in more truth and more enlargement; and therefore we must not pull down the tree the more surely or speedily to get at the fruit, that once for all we may store it for ever, but through all the seasons of God look for fresh fruit and for better fruit as the tree grows. The only freedom that deserves the name is a spirit of individual life developing itself according to the law of its nature and the direction of God, growing by feeding upon, and assimilating, that which is its proper food. The higher limit of that liberty is the measure of the inspiration of God, moving us this way or that; its lower limit is the equal right of every man to follow and work out what God works in him. Without liberty there is no individuality, without individuality there is no variety, without variety there is no unity. Truth is our object, freedom the essential condition of our means, without which we can gain no new truth, and such truth as we have, separated from the living stream, becomes stagnant water. But there are two kinds of truth. There is the lower realm of intellectual truth concerned with "the formation and publication of opinions;" there is the higher realm of spiritual truth, concerned not with opinion, but with experience and reality, when the soul in living communion with God feels itself to touch the real ground of our being. And there are two kinds of freedom: freedom to use our own faculties, to employ our own being, according to our own will, without injuring the freedom of others; and the perfect liberty, the fulness of life, activity, and peace, when God's will rules in us as our own. It was of this highest truth, of this highest freedom, that our Lord spoke when he said, "Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free." In fellowship with God there is no bondage. If ye are sons ye shall be free indeed. "Where the spirit of the Lord is there is liberty." And in proportion as we have of this absolute truth and freedom, in a real communion with Him who is our life, and in the love of His service, shall we be in a condition fervently and reverently to pursue intellectual truth through intellectual liberty, for we have no fear that we can be carried away from our rock, and we have faith that the more we know Him, in His laws and in His ways, in His methods and in His acts, we shall be more willing, and less unworthy, to rest upon His bosom, and to live in His light.

To those of you with whom the calls of duty are changing their forms, from whom the shelter of college walls is even now falling away, who henceforth are yourselves to speak for God, if without presumption I might venture upon what this age of His church seems most to need, I would say, use your learning not for its own sake—there may be times when it will be your duty to let it appear in its own shapes—but, in your ministrations use it to save from the intercepting blinds that prevent our seeing Divine things as they are and as they were—simply to remove what would obstruct or distort the pure rays of light coming to us from past or present, by its aid to reach unclouded heights of contemplation, and from those heights to keep the communication open between the soul and God. For there is a higher function of all the great spirits that can give you help, even of Christ himself, than to report to us what God disclosed to him—and that is, to bring ourselves into the immediate presence—through the action of his words, his person, and his life, to form in us the frame of soul to which God himself can impart the same revelations of His truth that He was able to communicate to the receiving heart of Christ. The preacher—if the preacher and the prophet are one—must speak from himself, that which he doth know, that which is given him to see and feel in his purest moments. The most effective preaching is not from the boldest mind, but from the most trembling and self-distrustful spirit that yet is forced by its vivid sense of God to overcome the trembling and the self-distrust. And no one who is without this deep confidence in the impulses which the spirit of God can impart to all the springs of life has the calling of a preacher.

Yet do not be continually laying over again your religious foundations, as if you were in doubt whether or not God had already laid them for us all—and suggesting the doubt to others. Let your metaphysical or psychological knowledge appear rather in the precision, and illuminating clearness, of your affirmative statements, than in the exhibition of analytical processes. If you really believe that faith in God is a natural growth in every healthy heart and mind, assume it heartily, proceed unhesitatingly, and build upon it; but do not, on the vain supposition that you are going down to the roots—for we are rooted in God—lay bare its merely logical aspects, to leave only the intellectual impression that, after all, it is a matter of doubtful disputation.

To all of us alike, whatever be our place in God's church, one thing, and one thing only, is needful—to love God with all our heart, and all our mind, and all our soul, and all our strength, and our neighbour as ourselves. But it will be for you to make men feel that this is no light thing; that to love God with all the heart is to know the spiritual passion of gratitude for loving-kindness, of self-devotion to goodness; that to love God with all the mind is to know the passion for truth that is the enthusiasm of science, the passion for beauty that moves the poet and the artist, when all truth and beauty are regarded as the self-revealing of God; that to love God with all the soul is to know the saint's consecration to holiness—the saint's penitential self-knowledge in the light of the heavenly presence—the saint's abhorrence of sin—the saint's agony of desire to save a sinner's soul; and that to love God with all the strength is the test of all the other loves—the passion for Reality, for Spirit, and for Truth, that makes Worship a living offering, and keeps the majesty of the Will behind every spiritual desire to force it forwards to its end, through every colder hour steadfast to that which we knew to be good and from God when we were aglow.

Those of you whose years of preparation are not yet run, we hope to welcome here again in health and strength of spirit. For the months in which you are free to choose your own mental food, and yet cannot return to us unaffected by what you choose, I have only one earnest word of advice—avoid, as far as possible, all second and third-rate literatures. Read in this your seed-time the works of genius themselves, rather than criticisms and literary histories. It will affect your whole position. It will give you the modesty, the depth, the raciness, the weight of those who have sought the great thinkers on their own ground, who know the great poets in their own music; and it will save you from one of the growing offences of our day, the easiness, the confidence, the sharply-defined deliverances of those whose impressions and judgments are all at second-hand.

To those of you with whom the season of silent preparation expires to-day, who henceforth are to prove what you are before the world, I will only add now that it will be a delight to all of us, the purest reward of those to whom you owe most, if we can watch your course with eyes of pride and joy. We pray God for you that He will make you a blessing to mankind, that you will make such an offering of yourselves in His service that he can use the sacrifice, and do the work of His spirit through you.

TRUSTEES' MEETING.

The annual meeting of trustees was held at the University Hall on Thursday morning, when twenty-three trustees were present; S. ROBINSON, Esq., president, in the chair. The proceedings were of a purely formal character. The Principal read a satisfactory report of the conduct and progress of the students, a vote of thanks was voted to the Rev. J. H. Thom for his admirable address, and six applications were read from candidates for admission, all of whom, their testimonials being satisfactory, were admitted on condition of passing the usual entrance examination.

VALEDICTORY SERVICE.

On Thursday evening a valedictory religious service was held in Little Portland-street Chapel, dedicating to the Christian ministry the two senior students, Mr. Russell and Mr. Poynting, who had completed their course of study. After a hymn, Mr. Martineau read a Scripture lesson (1 Cor. chaps. ii. and iii.), and offered prayer. Mr. Tayler delivered an address to the young men; and Mr. Thom gave them a welcome into the Christian ministry, concluding the service by an address rich in every quality of pastoral piety, experience, and wisdom, leaving a lasting impression on all who were privileged to hear it. We only regret that a larger congregation was not present.

UNIVERSITY HALL, LONDON.

THIS Hall was established about twenty years ago, in commemoration of the passing of the Dissenters' Chapels Bill. It was considered that the worthiest monument of that event, so memorable to our body, would be to erect a permanent institution calculated to advance the progress of liberal education and to promote the free exercise of individual judgment in matters of religion. It was determined, therefore, to found a hall of residence especially for students attending at University College. When Manchester New College was removed to London, it was located in this Hall, part of which is now permanently occupied by its library and lecture-rooms, some of the Manchester New College students being also residents, though the greater number of them live in private houses.

The annual meeting of the proprietors of University Hall was held on Thursday week, and was one of special interest, owing to the fact that two important resolutions affecting the duties and position of the Principal were to be brought forward. The present Principal, as is pretty well known, is Professor Beesly, who is understood to be a Comptist in theology, and whose strongly expressed opinions on trades union and political questions have, during the last year or two, more than once excited public attention. The first proposition was by Mr. EDWARD ENFIELD, and was to this effect—That whereas hitherto the rules have required that a religious service, consisting of the reading of Scripture and prayer, shall be "conducted or superintended by the Principal," henceforth the requirement should be that it shall be "conducted by such person as the Council shall, after conferring with the Principal, from time to time appoint." A long and animated discussion took place, which ended by Mr. Enfield's motion being carried by a majority of 32 to 15.

The other notice of motion was one of which Mr. P. WORSLEY had given notice:

"That University Hall, being by its constitution a place 'for the academical residence of students, under the superintendence of a resident Principal,' it is essential to its welfare that such Principal should aim to promote among the students feelings of reverence towards God, and an habitual sense of religious obligation. That the present Principal of University Hall, though possessing many valuable qualifications for the office which he holds, appears to this meeting to have ceased to recognise the duty of endeavouring to exert such religious influence over the students; and to have also manifested a want of forbearance and discretion in the public discussion of exciting political topics, which cannot but act injuriously on the interests of the Hall. That this general meeting would therefore earnestly recommend the Council to take the necessary steps for terminating Professor Beesly's engagement as Principal at the earliest fitting season."

Before, however, this motion was read, Mr. FIELD and Mr. SHAEN appealed to the Chairman on the point of order, protesting that such a resolution could not be entertained, and ought not to have been printed and circulated by the Council. The question, if mooted, was one purely for the Council to consider. Considerable further discussion again took place, but ultimately it was decided by 24 against 22 that Mr. Worsley's motion should not be entertained.

About fifty proprietors were present, among whom we observed the Revs. Dr. Sadler, T. L. Marshall, R. C. Jones, W. James, and R. Shaen; R. N. Philips, Esq., M.P., W. P. Price, Esq., M.P., James Yates, Esq., F.R.S., James Heywood, Esq., F.R.S., Dr. Carpenter, F.R.S., Dr. Davison, Dr. Barham, Alderman J. C. Lawrence; Messrs. Mark Philips, P. Worsley, C. Paget, H. A. Palmer, W. Shaen, C. Twamley, H. W. Bask, E. J. Nettlefold, Berkeley Hill, H. Greg, R. Greaves, T. R. Cobb, W. A. Case, T. Smith Osler, E. Lawrence, Manning Needham, R. H. Hutton, W. S. Cookson, Russell Scott, T. P. Cobb, E. W. Field, Talfourd Ely, Rogers Field, Herbert Thomas, F. Swanwick, and J. Robson, secretary.

REMONSTRANT SYNOD OF ULSTER.

ANNUAL MEETING.

On the 16th ult., the Remonstrant Synod of Ulster commenced its annual sittings in the First Presbyterian Church, Belfast. There was a good attendance of members. The outgoing Moderator (the Rev. JOHN M'CAW) preached from Galatians iv. 18: "But it is good to be zealously affected always in a good thing." The Synod was then constituted by prayer, after which the Rev. J. A. Crozier was unanimously elected Moderator for the ensuing year. The Rev. Mr. Porter (Ballee) was elected as clerk of the Synod from 1st January next, and the Rev. John M'CAW (Glenarm) was chosen to the office of assistant clerk.—The CLERK read the reports of the Presbyteries of Armagh, Templepatrick, and Bangor, which were adopted. The great interest of the meeting was the discussion of the endowment question, on which the Rev.

R. CAMPBELL had given notice for a petition. He accordingly moved a series of resolutions, taking the ground that, while not opposed in theory to national grants and endowments for religious purposes, "we regard the equal and impartial endowment of all churches in Ireland as being in the existing state of public opinion utterly impracticable," and petitioning for the complete and impartial disendowment of all churches, as the only solution of the Irish ecclesiastical difficulty.—The resolutions were seconded by the Rev. THOS. SMYTH, but Professor ORR and the MODERATOR both spoke strongly in favour of a system of general endowment, and eventually a committee was appointed to draw up a fresh series of resolutions to be presented the following day.

The Synod resumed on Wednesday morning, and after the passing of a resolution in memory of the late Rev. Henry Alexander, of Newry, and the late Rev. Samuel Moore, of Warren-point, the endowment question was re-opened. Professor ORR moved the resolutions which had been drawn up by the committee in favour of general endowment. Considerable discussion took place upon these; various amendments being moved; and ultimately the resolutions appeared as follow, some suggestions of the Rev. F. McCammon being embodied in order to meet as far as possible the views of the different parties:

"Whereas, the great question of the present day is that of religious endowments, and whereas serious changes in the allocation of the ecclesiastical revenues of our country appear to be impending, it is resolved—

"1. That this church has uniformly supported the principle of religious equality, and cannot but rejoice in any prospect that may offer of its ampler recognition.

"2. That we record our deep sense of the gross injustice of the present ecclesiastical state of things in this country, and our most decided conviction that the Established Church in Ireland, embracing as it does only a small minority of the population, should be disestablished.

"3. That, while we should approve of placing all professing Christian churches in this country on a footing of perfect equality by giving to all denominations unfettered by any doctrinal conditions grants in proportion to their numbers, yet as our Roman Catholic fellow-Christians, who constitute the large majority of the Irish people, and the Methodist and other churches are undeniably opposed to all endowments, we think that the only course now open to our Government is to disendow all churches in our land, due regard being had to existing interests.

"4. But that, in the event of disendowment being only partially carried out in the case of the Established Church, we should consider it an injustice that it should be completely carried out in our own case.

"5. That the fixed committee be instructed to watch over the interests of our church in this matter."

These resolutions were unanimously carried, and the Synod shortly afterwards adjourned.

THE EXETER ASSEMBLY OF DIVINES.

THIS venerable Assembly, founded in the year 1655, held its 213th annual meeting on Wednesday last, at George's Meeting, Exeter. The devotional service was conducted by the Rev. J. SPILSBURY, Independent minister of Uffculne, and an appropriate discourse was delivered by the Rev. J. O. SQUIER, of Collumpton, from John xiv. and part of the second verse, "My Father's house." After the religious service, the usual annual business of the Assembly was conducted, the Rev. J. SPILSBURY, moderator.—The SCRIBE reported that the vacant pulpits at Moretonhampstead and Sidmouth are now occupied by the Revs. Kentish Bache and T. R. Dobson. The pulpits at Topsham and Gulliford are still vacant, but the trustees are desirous of obtaining a minister, and have hopes, through the medium of the scribe, of succeeding in their wishes. In consequence of the increasing years of the Assembly's much esteemed treasurer, B. P. POPE, Esq., who has filled the office for thirty-four years with fidelity and advantage to the society, it was unanimously resolved to solicit the aid of John Hill, Esq., Moreton, as joint treasurer. New trustees were also proposed for the Assembly Fund, subject to the approval of the survivors, B. P. POPE, Esq., and Sir John Smale, Chief Justice of Hong Kong.—The SCRIBE having introduced the subject of the disendowment of the Irish Church, and the measure for opening the Universities, petitions were drawn up, adopted, and sent off the same evening for presentation—one to the Lords, in favour of Mr. Gladstone's resolutions, presented by Earl Fortescue, the other to the Commons, presented to Mr. Coleridge.—The following notice of motion was recorded in the minute book, to be considered at the next annual meeting:—"That the rule which excludes ministers from receiving annual grants, whose congregational incomes do not exceed fifty pounds a year, be rescinded, and that in future all ministers be allowed to participate who have no other resources for livelihood but their congregational incomes, and whose ministerial stipends are less than £100 a year, provided also that their congregations contribute annually to the Assembly Fund."—At the conclusion of the business meeting, the ministers, joined by a few lay friends, dined together at the Clarence Hotel; the Rev. T. W. CHIGNELL presided, when a most instructive and pleasant evening was spent in friendly converse and remarks on local memories and historical incidents in reference to the Assembly.—The SCRIBE informed the meeting that he was preparing a history of the Assembly, from its formation in Cromwell's time to the present period, which was received with approbation.

THE FREE CHRISTIAN UNION.

The first annual business meeting of this society was held yesterday afternoon, Friday, June 26th, at Freemasons' Hall. The meeting had not been advertised, but was convened by circular; and our readers will be surprised to learn that none but members were permitted to attend. We understand that two articles in the constitution, to which strong exception was taken at the time of its publication in our columns, were revised. Persons are henceforth permitted to become members by the payment of a simple registration fee of 2s. 6d., instead of a guinea subscription; and the article which gave to a committee the power of admitting or rejecting members, was abrogated. What other business was transacted we have had no means of ascertaining. In the evening a conference of members, "with others who, amid varieties and changes of doctrinal belief, desire to promote the communion of a common piety and charity," was held in one of the smaller rooms at Freemasons' Tavern. It was expressly stated by the chairman at the commencement of the meeting that the conference was strictly private. We are, therefore, precluded from giving any account of the proceedings, or even mentioning the names of the speakers. We all the more regret this as some of the speeches were of a remarkably interesting character, and the meeting was no more of a private nature than are the annual conferences of the Congregational Union, or the meetings of the Unitarian Association.—The Inquirer.

INTELLIGENCE.

LONDON: FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH, KENTISH TOWN.—We are requested to state that in consequence of the illness of the Rev. William Forster, the special anniversary discourses, announced for next Sunday, will be postponed.

HINDLEY.—The annual school sermons were preached on Sunday, June 28th, by the Rev. C. W. Robberds, of Oldham. The collections and donations amounted to upwards of £11.

LONDON: AUXILIARY SUNDAY-SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.—The annual meeting of our London schools, which was held last Sunday afternoon at Unity Church, Islington, was a great success. Every seat in the building was filled, the visitors present being accommodated in the gallery and on the raised place in front of the communion table. Among these were the Revs. Dr. Sadler, H. Terson, M.A., and Robert Spears; Alderman J. C. Lawrence, Messrs. S. Sharpe, H. Taylor, and H. J. Preston. The schools represented were Brixton, Carter-lane, Chapel-street, Clerkenwell, Hackney, Islington, Mile End, Newington Green, Stamford-street, and Worship-street. Before entering the church, the children who had walked some distance were refreshed with a cup of milk each, which, thanks to the forethought and generosity of a member of the Unity Church congregation—Mr. Henry Taylor—had been provided for them. This little attention was much appreciated. The first part of the service was conducted by the Rev. Joseph Heywood, and the address was given by Dr. Bellows, of New York, who claimed the attention of his young audience as one that had travelled some 3,000 miles before he could speak to them. The address was one which will be long remembered by all who heard it. The assembling and departure of the children was managed with great order and quiet. The number present was about 600.

ROTTERHAM.—The school sermons were preached on June 21st by the Rev. John Owen, of Whitby, when the collections exceeded those of any previous year. Several kind friends from Sheffield were present. On the Thursday previous the boys and girls of the day school were examined by the Rev. W. Blazey, John Hobson, Esq. of Sheffield, and Messrs. Tasker and Hattersley, resident trustees.

SALE.—In the evening of Sunday, the 21st ult., the Rev. Dr. Bellows preached at Sale, Cheshire, on behalf of the Sunday school. The small chapel and schoolroom were crowded in every part. The contributions, which are not yet completed, amount to about £12.

SEATON DELAVAL.—On Sunday last, religious services were conducted at this place in the open air. About 400 persons were present in the afternoon, and 500 in the evening. Except about 40 who went from Newcastle, they were pitmen and their families, who came from the surrounding villages within a circuit of seven miles. Addresses were delivered from a wagon by the Revs. J. C. Street and E. W. H. Parkinson, and Messrs. Lucas, Watson, Brown, Pilkington, and Paton.

SOUTHAMPTON.—The Sunday-school children, with their parents and friends, connected with the Church of the Saviour, Southampton, had their annual treat at Portwood Lawn, Southampton, on Thursday afternoon, June 25th. The pleasure of the meeting was much enhanced by the presence of the Rev. C. H. A. Dall, of Calcutta, who kindly exhibited an interesting collection of Indian photographs. The Rev. C. H. A. Dall preached on the following Sunday, at Southampton, on "The progress of the Gospel in India, and the duties of Unitarians in regard to it." After the discourse in the evening, which was numerously attended, the Rev. Mr. Dall invited the audience to remain and to put any questions in relation to the subject which might require further elucidation, and a very interesting conversation ensued. Among the audience were a considerable number of persons of other denominations.

THE PROVINCIAL MEETING.—We have received several communications on the subject of the Provincial Assembly, but as they do not impugn the correctness of our report, and tend in the same direction as our own remarks, we do not publish them, thinking it better not to continue personal discussions, which have had time enough wasted on them at the meeting.

ADVANCED SUNDAY-SCHOOL TEACHING.

To the Editors.—While the subject of our Sunday schools is before the public, both in London and Lancashire, I think I cannot do better than describe the school belonging to the congregation with which I have the pleasure of being connected. Our methods seem to us to be working well; and a statement of the facts may be useful to others. The average number of scholars in attendance is 36 in the morning, and 158 in the afternoon. Of those, some who can read English sufficiently well, have been allowed to begin studying the New Testament in French and some in Greek. At the present time 28 are learning to read the French Testament, and 14 the Greek Testament. In addition to this, six of those who themselves teach English and French form an extra class to read the Greek Testament between the morning service and the afternoon school. Thus the total number of our Greek scholars is 20. The usefulness of what we are doing is, in our eyes, shown by the result. Listlessness and inattention are banished from those classes. The elder scholars, like the younger, have now a difficulty to grapple with; and they are all equally interested in what they are about. Elder scholars, who had left us, have come back to profit by the higher teaching now offered to them; and new scholars have joined the school, and new teachers the congregation, for the sake of what is going forward,—the scholars for the pleasure of learning, the teachers for the pleasure of teaching. Our teachers, as may be supposed, are by no means all thorough masters of the languages they teach; but those who have some knowledge are willing to teach those who have less, or have none; and in this way teachers and learners are equally improving themselves; and the cheerfulness with which learners study under the guidance of a fellow-student will sometimes make amends for the want of a more accomplished tutor. In the case of the Greek Testament the lesson is made theological, by pointing out some of the most important of Griesbach's various readings, and of the mistranslations in the Authorised Version. But it is with the moral results of this teaching that we are chiefly pleased. The children readily buy Greek Testaments out of their own pocket money. If the knowledge of the languages that has yet been gained is but slight, it is enough to make the pupils wish for more, and it has made them grateful to the teachers, who treat them as beings worthy of the same education as that which they value for themselves. Our plan of reading the New Testament in foreign languages has already been copied in the Sunday schools of three at least of our smaller London congregations. The larger congregations, which possibly have their schools already full, and the seats in the chapels all occupied, very naturally do not so readily admit a novelty. While describing the above, I ought to add that I am not one of those who take a part in this useful work, which is naturally left to the younger people.—Yours, &c., SAM'L SHARPE.

MISS CARPENTER'S INDIAN SCHEME.

To the Editors.—More than a quarter of a century since the Rev. George Armstrong, in a speech at a congregational meeting, said: "I wish I knew how to awaken in you the enthusiasm of the Methodists." I forget now for what especial purpose he desired this alternative, but you will not wonder that this expression, more easily understood now, coming from such a quarter, created quite an unusual sensation, though the evidences were very properly subdued, for were we not satisfied with ourselves as we were? Alas! the consequences of our coldness are too plain. Thousands pass our almost deserted temples who could have found in them the spiritual haven they seek; and we cannot but lament our inability to attract the multitude of earnest thinkers who are drifting into other and often dangerous channels. Our talented friend was right—we want enthusiasm.

I doubt if at that meeting there was more than one or two who thoroughly knew the workings and full extent to which this enthusiasm was available. I had been behind the scenes for many years, and could readily testify to the results. The comfortables in our select society could scarcely imagine the excitement of a missionary meeting where, to secure seats, it was necessary to wait for hours before the doors of a chapel, and stand a good chance of bodily injury to gain ingress. Those who were fortunate in securing places at the morning meeting (commencing at ten a.m.) remained during the interval, fearing to lose their hard-earned chance of hearing. I have seen the ladies not only empty their pockets, but take off their jewels, and then give promissory notes to express their faith in the movement. I fear some, however, very unkindly suggested, at each extra demonstration, the possibility of extra indulgence in some quarters. It would not be fair to discuss this heresy now.

Now, sir, even we specimens of Frigids have a cause for enthusiasm, never before so worthily offered as an object for zeal in the mission form. No need of caution, no ideal of misapplication or official pets to be pampered to restrain our free gifts. I believe we all feel that Miss Carpenter possesses, in an unusual degree, the peculiar graces for such a work. I do hope the women in each congregation will testify their sympathy and full appreciation of the efforts so nobly made to elevate their sisterhood in other lands.

UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN CHURCH AND SCHOOLS, STEPNEY, LONDON.

By a Sub-committee of the London District Unitarian Society assembled in Conference with the Committee of the Rev. J. Phillips's Congregation, on Tuesday, 12th May, 1868, at Stamford-street Chapel, it was resolved that assistance should be rendered to that congregation in obtaining a Permanent Place of Worship at Stepney Green.

In pursuance of such resolution, and through the kind instrumentality of members of the Sub-committee, a suitable site has been obtained on which to erect a Church, School, &c., at Stepney Green.

It has been determined at present to erect a neat and substantial Schoolroom, capable of accommodating about 250 persons, and that religious worship shall be conducted therein till the funds are raised for the Church.

The Congregation, consisting for the most part of working men, appeal most earnestly to the Unitarian public to supplement their efforts to open the School free of debt.

Subscriptions will be thankfully received by Mr. GEORGE RITCHIE, 34, Bread-street, London, E.C.; Mr. F. M. WALLER, 100, Turner's Road, Burdett Road, London, E.; and The East London Bank, Cornhill, E.C.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

The recent Papal Allocution, which is occupied with the new Austrian laws respecting mixed and civil marriages, public worship, &c., seems to have caused much irritation in Austria, and to have strengthened the determination of the people to throw off the fetters of priestly rule. The Tagblatt announces that the municipal council of Vienna is about to protest in the most strenuous manner against the pretensions of the Papal Government to interfere in the domestic legislation of an independent foreign power, and it is expected that a similar step will be taken throughout the country. The French Liberal papers likewise comment severely on the fact that the Pope openly incites the Austrians to a violation of the laws of their country, which are denounced as "odious" and "abominable," though they are precisely the same as those already established in France, and to which Rome has assented by the Concordat. They also notice with considerable bitterness that Cardinal Patrizzi, when speaking of the "marvellous" intervention of Providence in favour of the Papacy, does not make the slightest allusion to the instrumentality of France in the matter. According to the Roman correspondent of the Pall Mall, Antonelli has overcome his difficulties at the Vatican, and his enemies too; and will retain his post, unless removed by death. A few days ago the Pope said, "I am too old to change my minister, and, after all, I have accustomed myself to Antonelli. It is not worth while for me to take a new counsellor for the time that remains to me."

The Pontifical Bull, summoning a General Council of the Roman Catholic Church, to meet on the 8th of December, 1869, was formally promulgated on the 30th ult. at the Vatican. The Bull states that the object of the Council is to assure the integrity of the faith, respect for religion and the ecclesiastical laws, the improvement of public morals, the establishment of peace and concord, and the removal of the ills afflicting civil and religious society. Also adverts to the necessity for maintaining the temporal power, the sanctity of matrimony, and the religious education of youth, and deplores the efforts of the enemies of the church to overthrow those principles.

Cardinal Cullen has published a letter to his clergy insisting upon "the Catholic dogma" of the Pope's spiritual authority "over the whole earth." He deems it expedient "to dwell upon this important truth on account of the many assaults which are made at the present day by bad Catholics, and false friends, and open foes, on Rome, the central see of the Catholic Church."

Lord Shaftesbury's Bill for regulating clerical vestments provides that every minister, when "saying the prayers in any church," shall wear a surplice with sleeves, and shall be at liberty to wear over the surplice, as at present, a plain black silk scarf. If he be a university graduate, he may also wear the university hood; and if he be not a graduate, he may then, if he think fit, wear "some decent tippet of black." The object of the bill is to secure uniformity in the performance of church worship, and it would prohibit ornaments, incense, and lighted candles. Should it pass into a statute, for a breach of either of its provisions the Bishop shall have power to inhibit the offender from saying the public prayers for three months.

The following paragraph, which appears in the Telegraph, might make us fancy we had been stepping a few centuries backwards in our sleep:

"The English Langue of the Order of St. John of Jerusalem held their chapter-general at noon on Wednesday at the Chancery of the Order, in St. Martin's Place. Before the meeting Divine service was celebrated in the church of St. Martin-in-the-Fields, which had been kindly placed at the disposal of the order by the vicar. A sermon was preached by the Rev. Thomas Hugo, one of the chaplains of the order, and an offertory was made for the hospital funds of the Langue. In the evening the knights and ladies and other members of the order dined together, in accordance with the custom of former years, at the Inns of Court Hotel. His Grace the Duke of Manchester, the Grand Prior, and Lord Leigh were unavoidably absent."

At the annual meeting of the Clergy Mutual Assurance Society the report stated that, for the year ended the 31st of May, 277 proposals, assuring £243,220, had been completed; that the total sums assured under 4,972 life policies amounted to £4,293,610, the total income to £160,236, and the accumulated fund to £1,605,492.

A meeting of Conservatives was held last week, the Dean of York in the chair, "to oppose the policy of Mr. Gladstone and Dr. Pusey," the latter having given offence to many High Churchmen by his undisguised predilection for "free church" principles. It was resolved by those present, among whom were the Archdeacons of Taunton, Ely, and Oxford, Dr. F. G. Lee, and other High Churchmen, to form a new "Church and State Association," and not only to obtain a monster Declaration in favour of the principle of "Establishment and Endowment," but "to render active support to the head of Her Majesty's Government at the ensuing elections, by urging upon the clergy to take a more active part in political questions than has been their custom." The friends of religious liberty have evidently a hard fight before them, and should be girding themselves up for the battle.

Convocation has been talking for several days, but of course it was vox et præterea nihil. A gravamen, presented by Archdeacon Denison, and signed by 28 of his confrères, complained of Mr. Gladstone's Church-rate Bill, and urged the Bishops to resist it. An address to the Queen, praying her not to assent to the disestablishment of the Irish Church was agreed to. The usual kind and brotherly attention was given to the Bishop of Natal, and both Houses came to the conclusion that the Church, as a spiritual body, might rightly accept the spiritual validity of the sentence passed upon him by the Bishop of Capetown, but what effect that was to have, in this world or the next, was left unstated. The Bishop of Rochester was added to the committee appointed to inquire into the heresy of the Rev. Mr. Voysey, and the Primate, instigated by the Bishop of Salisbury, undertook to prosecute the inquiry at once. An address to the Crown for licence to provide for a larger representation of the clergy in Convocation was agreed to. The report of the committee on intercommunion with Eastern churches was adopted, the principle on which this is based being that "all churches which are one in the possession of a true episcopate, one in sacraments, and one in creed" are bound to receive one another to communion in prayers and sacraments; which, of course, excludes all Protestant Dissenters at home, as well as those foreign Protestants with whom Her Majesty has assured the King of Prussia Protestant England so willingly joins in honouring Luther. And that was about all that was done, and Convocation was prorogued.

At a recognition service, the other day, Mr. Spurgeon stated that he believed it would be found that the increase to his church at the Tabernacle had been upwards of 600 in the past year, which was probably the largest number ever added to a Christian church, since Pentecostal days, in the course of twelve months.

The English Independent gives the following description of the monument to Luther, which, on Midsummer-day, in the ancient city of Worms, was unveiled in the presence of the sovereign Princes of Protestant Germany and 100,000 of his countrymen:

"A granite platform, forty feet square, enclosed on three sides by a battlemented balustrade, is the basis of the monument. In the centre stands pre-eminent a statue of Luther. He has for himself a pedestal sixteen feet high, and on this his statue rises ten and a half feet. The face is turned upward. The clenched fist rests on the closed Bible. The features—massive, calm, and earnest—are true to the well-known portrait of Kranach. The pedestal is of syenite. All its four corners are four-pillared seats, on each of which is a figure. The first of these is Wickliffe, a reverend sage, 'gently stroking his beard as a man wrapped in contemplation.' The second is Peter Waldo, represented as a poor wanderer, with torn cloak and staff, preaching, with the Bible before him, to a congregation, as we may suppose, of simple dwellers among the hills. The third is Savonarola, the precursor of the reformation in Italy, the vehement and high-hearted preacher of Florence. 'He lifts his right hand to heaven, and beats his heart with his left, looking down on the spectator from his cowl with eyes flashing fire.' The fourth is John Huss, whose martyr-death sowed the seed which afterwards sprang up in the Reformation. 'Weighed down with bodily weakness and prolonged imprisonment, he sits a harrowing picture of misery. But his sharp and emaciated features are lit up by an inspired look, as if light fell upon his face from the eye of a Saviour whom he can see through the darkness. These all, it will be observed, are represented either as in a wistful and waiting attitude, or in the strife on which victory has not yet dawned. Luther stands above in 'colossal calm.' The light of victory has streamed down upon him. To his triumphant repose 'these sorrow-laden harbingers of a better day form a contrast alike beautiful from an artistic as it is satisfactory from an intellectual point of view.'"

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

The Italian correspondent of the Temps, M. Erdan, an intimate friend of the late Cardinal Andrea, gives, as left in his handwriting, sundry notes, which are not very flattering to his colleagues in the Sacred College. After remarking on the Cardinals in general that "They are almost all black," and absolutist in opinion, he says:

"Cardinal Reisach: In respect for the Jesuits he is one of the blackest of all. He is one of the principal authors of the syllabus. Cardinal Barnabo: Has an eye to the Papacy, but will never succeed. Mattei: Hard, hypocritical, and mediocre. Patrizzi: In reality an arrant fool. Torsi: Archbishop of Pisa, essentially black, and a downright enemy of Italy. Pannebianco: Is extremely anxious for the Papacy; but Guidi, who is an abler man, has a better chance. There is reason to believe that the next Pope will be a monk—Guidi the Dominican, or Pannebianco the Cordelier. This Pannebianco is a Sicilian. He is a Sixtus Quintus. He keeps himself in the background, and in reserve. Of all the sacred college, he is the member whose secret intrigues require most watching. He says he is quite black, but in reality he is capable of becoming a Clement XIV. He does not like the Jesuits. In fact, no monk does; that is the rule. There are two men in the household who are indispensable to the Pope: Mgr. Cenni, his trainbearer, and Filippini, a laic. Antonelli has always the same confessor as the Pope. If the Pope changes, he changes also. The present confessor [1866] is the Jesuit father Mignardi; a good man, cold, a censor of the prelates whose little scandals he ferrets out, in conjunction with Mgr. Cenni. The Pope listens to the gravest charges of immorality, requires to be told the minutest details, but never takes severe measures. There are at least twenty prelates whose lives are a scandal. In general, the clergy are more pure than is believed. The prelates who give most scandal by their eccentric immoralities are three. The Pope is perfectly aware of this."

In a sermon delivered a fortnight ago, Mr. Spurgeon expressed his belief that the providence of God might yet make Mr. Disraeli the instrument of dissolving the unholy union of Church and State.

One of the points which the Bishop of London laboured to make in the debate on the Suspensory Bill, was that religious equality by disestablishment was impossible, since a powerful Roman Catholic body, with a foreign prince at its head, able to confer titles of honour, would be placed in a position which the clergymen of a disendowed Protestant church could not assume. Whereas the Bishop of Killaloe held an opinion just the reverse, and contended that the measure would fail because circumstances make it impossible that the Catholic clergy should ever be raised to the social position of the Anglicans. But, as the Freeman observes:—

"The wonder is, that a really Christian man, like the Bishop of London, should so publicly display the cloven foot of hierarchical ambition as to ask virtually for State rank and dignity for Christian clergymen, that they might compete in these factitious things with the ecclesiastical grandeurs of Papal superstition. Is it come to this, that Bishops of the best class plead for Establishments that, in the contest with Popery, Anglican clergymen may be able to say to Catholic clergymen, I am greater than you? A more remarkable illustration of the perverting influence of Establishments on a fine mind we do not remember to have met with."

Both the Nonconformist and the English Independent have articles on the fraternisation of Broad Churchmen and Congregationalists, which we mentioned last week. What the former especially values in the speeches made by Churchmen on the occasion is "the absence of the Pharisaical tone of patronage which has been so customary amongst Evangelical clergymen." Churchmen and Dissenters met upon really equal ground. There was neither contemptuous superiority, disguised by unctuous flattery, on the one side, nor natural servility, disguised by the assumption of extreme indifference and independence on the other. It was worth holding a whole anniversary to hear a Dean utter the words "Give us fair play all round," and to hear an Archdeacon cheer them. The Nonconformist is inclined to believe that Dissenters and Broad Churchmen will get on together a great deal better than ever Dissenters and Evangelicals have done. The English Independent says "The visit was on both sides designed and accepted as an indication of future alliances in prospect of impending change;" the impending change being the probable disruption of the Church of England. The John Bull in an article on the proceedings at the same meeting says: "Earnestly desiring the reconciliation of Dissenters, we can imagine no course more calculated to prevent that most desirable end."

Referring to the new Act of Uniformity which, as lay-leader of the Evangelicals, Lord Shaftesbury has introduced into the Upper House for the regulation of the worship of the Church, the Freeman offers him the following advice:
